To the Garden at Owthorpe<sup>1</sup>

Poor desolate garden, smile no more on me
To whom glad looks rude<sup>o</sup> entertainments be.
While thou and I for thy dear master mourn
That's best becoming that doth least adorn.<sup>2</sup>
Shall we for any meaner eyes be dressed
5 Who had the glory once to please thee best?
Or shall we prostitute<sup>o</sup> those joys again
Which once his noble soul did entertain?
Forbid it honor and just gratitude,
'Tis now our best grace to be wild and rude.<sup>o</sup>
10 He that impaled<sup>o</sup> thee from the common<sup>o</sup> ground,<sup>3</sup>
Who all thy walls with shining fruit trees crowned,
Me also above vulgar<sup>o</sup> girls did raise
And planted in me all that yielded praise;
He that with various beauties decked thy face,
15 Gave my youth lustre and becoming grace;
But he is gone and these gone with him too.
Let now thy flowers rise charged<sup>o</sup> with weeping dew
And, missing him, shrink back into their beds;
So my poor virgins<sup>o</sup> hang their drooping heads
20 And, missing the dear object of their sight,
Close up their eyes in sorrow's gloomy night.
Let thy young trees which sad and fading stand
Dried up since they lost his refreshing hand,
Tell me too sadly how your noblest plant
25 Degenerates<sup>o</sup> if it usual culture<sup>o</sup> want.
There spreading weeds which, while his watchful eyes
Checked their pernicious<sup>o</sup> growth, durst never rise;
Let them o'errun all the sweet fragrant banks,

30 And hide what grows in better ordered ranks.<sup>o</sup>
 Too much, alas, this parallel<sup>o</sup> I find
 In the disordered passions of my mind
 But thy late loveliness is only hid,
 Mine like the shadow with its substance fled.
 35 Another gardener and another spring
 May into thee new grace and new luster bring,
 While beauty's seeds do yet remain alive.
 But ah, my glories never can revive
 No more than new leaves or new smiling fruit
 Can reinvest that tree that's dead at root.
 40 When to his worthy memory thou then
 Hast offered one year's fruit,<sup>4</sup> thou mayst again
 In gaudy dresses to thy next lord shine<sup>5</sup>
 And show weak semblance<sup>o</sup> of his grace in thine.
 For all that's generous, healthful, sweet and fair,
 45 Imperfect emblems<sup>o</sup> of his virtue are.
 But could I call back hasty flying time
 The vanished glories that decked once my prime,<sup>o</sup>
 To me that resurrection would be vain
 And like ungathered flowers would die again.
 50 In vain would doting<sup>o</sup> time, which can no more
 Give such a lover, loveliness restore.

- Note 1:
 Hutchinson wrote her elegies after the death of her husband, John Hutchinson. This is Elegy 7. Despite having escaped death for his part in the regicide, he was arrested again in 1663 on charges of participating in a republican conspiracy and died in prison in September 1664. In the 1650s and 1660s, the Hutchinsons remodeled their Nottinghamshire estate, Owthorpe, and the elegies are haunted by John's absence from this once-shared landscape. In Elegy 12, "Musings in My Evening Walks at Owthorpe," the garden joins Lucy in mourning, even as she reflects on how her sorrow "glads [her] enemies."

- Note 3:
Hutchinson refers here to the process of enclosing the commons, the public grounds to which the people had rights and access under common law. In her Memoirs, she distinguishes between the massive enclosures of the nobility and the lesser enclosures of the gentry who guarded the landscape both from the incursions of the king and from the leveling democracy of common land. (The Hutchinson family behaved "as if there had been an Agrarian law in the family," following John Harrington's prescription to limit the size of landed wealth.)

From Order and Disorder<sup>1</sup>

Canto 5

Sad Nature's sighs gave the alarms,
And all her frightened hosts stood to their arms,
Waiting whom the great Sovereign would employ
His all-deserted rebels to destroy,
5 When God descended out of heaven above<sup>2</sup>
His disobedient viceroy<sup>o</sup> to remove.
Yet, though himself had seen the forfeiture,<sup>o</sup>
Which distance could not from his eyes obscure;
To teach his future substitutes how they Should judgments execute in a right way,
10 He would not unexamined facts condemn,
Nor punish sinners without hearing them;
Therefore cites to his bar<sup>3</sup> the criminals,
And Adam first out of his covert calls.
    'Where art thou, Adam?' the Almighty said.
15 'Here, Lord,' the trembling sinner answer made,
    'Amongst the trees I in the garden heard
Thy voice, and being naked, was afeared,
Nor durst I so thy purer sight abide,
Therefore myself did in this shelter hide.'
20 'Hast thou,' said God, 'eat the forbidden tree,
Or who declared thy nakedness to thee?'
    'She,' answered Adam, 'whom thou didst create
To be my helper and associate
Gave me the fatal fruit, and I did eat.'
25 Then Eve was also called from her retreat.
    'Woman, what hast thou done?' th'Almighty said;
    'Lord,' answered she, 'the serpent me betrayed

And I did eat.' Thus did they both confess
Their guilt, and vainly sought to make it less 30 By such extenuations<sup>o</sup> as, well weighed,
The sin, so circumstanced, more sinful made:
A course which still half-softened sinners use:
Transferring blame their own faults to excuse,
They care not how, nor where, and oftentimes
35 On God himself obliquely charge their crimes,
Expostulating<sup>o</sup> in their discontent
As if he caused what he did not prevent;
Which Adam wickedly implies, when he
Cries, ' 'Twas the woman that thou gavest me';
40 Oft-times make that the Devil's guilt alone,
Which was as well and equally their own.
His lies could never have prevailed on Eve
But that she wished them truth, and did believe
A forgery that suited her desire,
45 Whose haughty heart was prone enough t'aspire.
The tempting and the urging was his ill,
But the compliance was in her own will.
And herein truly lies the difference
Of natural and gracious penitence:
50 The first transferreth and extenuates<sup>o</sup>
The guilt, which the other owns and aggravates.
While sin is but regarded slight and small
It makes the value of rich mercy fall,
But as our crimes seem greater in our eyes,
55 So doth our grateful sense of pardon rise.
Poor mankind at God's righteous bar was cast
And set for judgment by, when at the last
Satan within the serpent had his doom,<sup>4</sup>
Whose execrable<sup>o</sup> malice left no room 60 For plea or pardon, but was sentenced first:
'Thou,' said the Lord, 'above all beasts accursed,
Shalt on thy belly creep, on dust shalt feed;

Between thee and the woman, and her seed
And thine, I will put lasting enmity;
65 Thou in this war his heel shalt bruise, but he Thy head shall break.' More various mystery
Ne'er did within so short a sentence lie.
Here is irrevocable<sup>o</sup> vengeance, here
Love as immutable.<sup>o</sup> Here doth appear 70 Infinite wisdom plotting with free grace,
Even by man's fall, th'advance of human race.
Severity here utterly confounds,
Here Mercy cures by kind and gentle wounds,
The Father here the gospel first reveals,
75 Here fleshly veils th'eternal Son conceals.
The law of life and spirit here takes place,
Given with the promise of assisting grace.
Here is an oracle foretelling all
Which shall the two opposèd seeds befall.
80 The great war hath its first beginning here,
Carried along more than five thousand year,
With various success<sup>o</sup> on either side,
And each age with new combatants supplied.
Two sovereign champions here we find,
85 Satan and Christ contending for mankind.
Two empires here, two opposite cities rise,
Dividing all in two societies:
The little Church and the World's larger State,<sup>5</sup>
Pursuing it with ceaseless spite and hate.
90 Each party here erecting their own walls,
As one advances, so the other falls.
Hope in the promise the weak Church confirms,
Hell and the World fight upon desperate terms:
By this most certain oracle they know
95 Their war must end in final overthrow.
Some little present mischief they may do,
And this with eager malice they pursue.

The angels whom God's justice did divide
Engage their mighty powers on either side:
100 Hell's gloomy princes the World's rulers made,<sup>6</sup>
Heaven's unseen host the Church's guard and aid;
Till the frail woman's conquering son shall tread
Beneath his feet the serpent's broken head.
105     Though God the speech to man's false foe address,
The words rich grace to fallen man express,
Which God will not to him himself declare
Till he implore it by submissive prayer;
Sufficient 'tis to know a latitude
For hope, which doth no penitent exclude.
110 Had death's sad sentence passed on man before
The promise of that seed which should restore
His fallen state, destroying death and sin,
Cureless as Satan's had his misery been.
But though free grace did future help provide,
115 Yet must he present loss and woe abide
And feel the bitter curse, that he may so
The sweet release of saving mercy know.
Prepared with late-indulgèd hope, on Eve
Th'Almighty next did gentler sentence give.<sup>7</sup>
120 'I will,' said he, 'greatly augment thy woes,
And thy conceptions, which with painful throes
Thou shalt bring forth, yet shall they be to thee
But a successive crop of misery.
Thy husband shall thy ruler be, whose sway
125 Thou shalt with passionate desires obey'.
Alas! How sadly to this day we find
Th'effect of this dire curse on womankind;
Eve sinned in fruit forbid,<sup>8</sup> and God requires
Her penance in the fruit of her desires.
130 When first to men their inclinations move,
How are they tortured with distracting love!

What disappointments find they in the end;
Constant uneasinesses which attend
The best condition of the wedded state,
135 Giving all wives sense of the curse's weight,
Which makes them ease and liberty refuse,
And with strong passion their own shackles choose.
Now though they easier under wise rule prove,
And every burden is made light by love,
140 Yet golden fetters, soft-lined yokes, still be
Though gentler curbs, but curbs of liberty,
As well as the harsh tyrant's iron yoke;
More sorely galling<sup>o</sup> them whom they provoke
To loathe their bondage, and despise the rule
145 Of an unmanly, fickle, froward<sup>o</sup> fool.<sup>8</sup>
Whate'er the husbands be, they covet fruit,
And their own wishes to their sorrows contribute.
How painfully the fruit within them grows,
What tortures do their ripened births disclose,
150 How great, how various, how uneasy are
The breeding-sicknesses, pangs that prepare
The violent openings of life's narrow door,
Whose fatal issues we as oft deplore!
What weaknesses, what languishments ensue,
155 Scattering dead lilies where fresh roses grew.<sup>9</sup>
What broken rest afflicts the careful nurse,
Extending to the breasts the mother's curse;
Which ceases not when there her milk she dries,
The froward child draws new streams from her eyes.
160 How much more bitter anguish do we find
Labouring to raise up virtue in the mind
Than when the members<sup>1</sup> in our bowels<sup>o</sup> grew:
What sad abortions, what cross births<sup>2</sup> ensue:
What monsters, what unnatural vipers come
165 Eating their passage through their parent's womb;
How are the tortures of their births renewed,

Unrecompensed with love and gratitude.
Even the good, who would our cares requite,
Would be our crowns, joys, pillars, and delight,
170 Affect us yet with other griefs and fears,
Opening the sluices of our near-dried tears.
Death, danger, sickness, losses, all the ill
That on the children falls, the mothers feel,
Repeating with worse pangs the pangs that bore
175 Them into life; and though some may have more
Of sweet and gentle mixture, some of worse,
Yet every mother's cup tastes of the curse,
And when the heavy load her faint heart tires,
Makes her too oft repent her fond desires.
180 Now last of all, as Adam last had been Drawn into the prevaricating<sup>o</sup> sin,
His sentence came: 'Because that thou didst yield,'
Said God, 'to thy enticing wife, the field,
Producing briars and fruitless thorns to thee,
185 Accursèd for thy sake and sins shall be.
Thy careful brows in constant toils shall sweat,
Thus thou thy bread shalt all thy whole life eat
Till thou return into the earth's vast womb,
Whence, taken first, thou didst a man become;
190 For dust thou art, and dust again shalt be
When life's declining spark goes out in thee.'
In all these sentences we strangely find
God's admirable love to lost mankind;
Who, though he never will his word recall
195 Or let his threats like shafts at random fall,
Yet can his wisdom order curses so
That blessings may out of their bowels flow.
Thus death the door of lasting life became,
Dissolving nature to rebuild her frame
200 On such a sure foundation as shall break
All the attempts Hell's cursèd empire make.
Thus God revenged man's quarrel on his foe,

To whom th'Almighty would no mercy show,
Making his reign, his respite, and success,
205 All augmentations of his cursedness.
Thus gave he us a powerful Chief and Head,
By whom we shall be out of bondage led,
And made the penalties of our offence
Precepts and rules of new obedience,
210 Fitted in all things to our fallen state
Under sweet promises that ease their weight.
Our first injunction is to hate and fly
The flatteries of our first grand enemy;
To have no friendship with his cursèd race,<sup>3</sup>
215 The interest of the opposite seed t'embrace,
Where though we toil in fights, though bruised we be,
Yet shall our combat end in victory,
Eternal glory healing our slight wound
When all our labours are with triumph crowned.
220 The next command is, mothers should maintain
Posterity, not frightened with the pain,
Which, though it make us mourn under the sense
Of the first mother's disobedience,
Yet hath a promise that thereby she shall 225 Recover all the hurt of her first fall
When, in mysterious manner, from her womb
Her father, brother, husband, son shall come.
Subjection to the husband's rule enjoined
In the next place: that yoke with love is lined,<sup>4</sup>
230 Love too a precept<sup>o</sup> made, where God requires
We should perform our duties with desires;
And promises t'incline our averse<sup>o</sup> will,
Whose satisfaction takes away the ill
Of every toil and every suffering
235 That can from unenforced submission spring.
The last command God with man's curse did give

Was that men should in honest callings live,
Eating their own bread, fruit of their own sweat,
Nor feed like drones<sup>o</sup> on that which others get:
240 And this command a promise doth imply
That bread should recompense<sup>o</sup> our industry.
One mercy more his sentence did include,
That mortal toils, faintings and lassitude
Should not beyond death's fixèd bound extend,
245 But there in everlasting quiet end.
When men out of the troubled air depart,
And to their first material dust revert,
The utmost power that death or woe can have
Is but to shut us prisoners in the grave,
250 Bruising the flesh, that heel whereon we tread;
But we shall trample on the serpent's head.
Our scattered atoms shall again condense,
And be again inspired with living sense;
Captivity shall then a captive be,<sup>5</sup>
255 Death shall be swallowed up in victory,
And God shall man to Paradise restore,
Where the foul tempter shall seduce no more.
How far our parents, whose sad eyes were fixed
On woe and terror, saw the mercy mixed
260 We can but make a wild uncertain guess,
As we are now affected in distress,
Who less regard the mitigation still
Than the slight smart of our afflicting ill;
And while we groan under the hated yoke,
265 Our gratitude for its soft lining choke.
But God, having th'amazèd sinners doomed,
Put off the judge's frown and reassumed
A tender father's kind and melting<sup>o</sup> face,
Opening his gracious arms for new embrace,
270 Taught them to expiate<sup>o</sup> their heinous guilt
By spotless sacrifice and pure blood spilt,

Which, done in faith, did their faint hearts sustain
Till the intended Lamb of God was slain,
Whose death, whose merit, and whose innocence
275 The forfeit paid and blotted out th'offence.
The skins of the slain beasts God vestures<sup>o</sup> made
Wherein the naked sinners were arrayed,
Not without mystery, which typified<sup>o</sup>
That righteousness that doth our foul shame hide.
280 As when a rotting patient must endure
Painful excisions to effect cure,
His spirits we with cordials<sup>o</sup> fortify,
Lest, unsupported, he should faint and die,
So with our parents the Almighty dealt:
285 Before their necessary woes they felt,
Their feeble souls rich promises upheld
And their deliverance was in types<sup>6</sup> revealed.
Even their bodies God himself did arm
With clothes that kept them from the weather's
290 harm;
But after all, they must be driven away,
Nor in their forfeit Paradise must stay.
Then said the Lord with holy irony,
Whence man the folly of his pride might see,
'The earthly man like one of us is grown,
295 To whom, as God, both good and ill is known.
Now lest he also eat of th'other tree,
Whose fruit gives life, and an immortal be,
Let us by just and timely banishment
His further sinful arrogance prevent.'
300 Then did he them out of the garden chase
And set a cherubim to guard the place,
Who waved a flaming sword before the door
Through which the wretches must return no more.
May we not liken to this sword of flame
305 The threatening law which from Mount Sinai<sup>7</sup> came,

With such thick flashes of prodigious fire
As made the mountains shake and men retire,
Forbidding them all forward hope that they Could enter into life that dreadful way?
310 Whate'er it was, whate'er it signifies,
It kept our parents out of Paradise,
Who now, returning to their place of birth,
Found themselves strangers in their native earth.
Their fatal breach of God's most strict command
315 Had there dissolved all concord, the sweet band
Of universal loveliness and peace,
And now the calm in every part did cease;
Love, though immutable, its smiles did shroud
Under the dark veil of an angry cloud,
320 And while he seemed withdrawn whose grace upheld
The order of all things, confusion filled
The universe. The air became impure
And frequent dreadful conflicts did endure
With every other angry element;<sup>8</sup>
325 The whirling fires its tender body rent.
From earth and seas gross vapours did arise,
Turned to prodigious meteors in the skies;
The blustering winds let loose their furious rage
And in their battles did the floods engage.
330 The sun confounded was with Nature's shame
And the pale moon shrunk in her sickly flame;
The rude congressions<sup>o</sup> of the angry stars
In heaven begun the universal wars,
While their malicious influence from above
335 On Earth did various perturbations move.
Droughts, inundations, blastings, killed the plants;
Worse influence wrought on th'inhabitants,
Inspiring lust, rage, ravenous appetite,
Which made the creatures in all regions fight.
340 The little insects in great clouds did rise

And, in battalias<sup>o</sup> spread, obscured the skies;
Armies of birds encountered in the air,
With hideous cries deciding battles there;
The birds of prey, to gorge their appetite,
345 Seized harmless fowl in their unwary flight.
When the dim evening had shut in the day,
Troops of wild beasts, all marching out for prey,
To the resistless<sup>o</sup> flocks would go, and there
Oft-times by other troops assailèd were,
350 Who snatched out of their jaws the new-slain food
And made them purchase it again with blood.

Thus sin the whole Creation did divide
Into th'oppressing and the suffering side.
Those, still employing craft and violence
355 T'ensnare and murder simple innocence,
True emblems were of Satan's craft and power
In daily ambuscado<sup>o</sup> to devour;
Nor only emblems were, but organs<sup>o</sup> too,
In and by whom he did his mischiefs do,
360 While persecuting cruelty and rage
Them in his cursèd party did engage.
Love, meekness, patience, gentleness, combined
The tamer brood with those of their own kind;
Wherefore God chose them for his sacrifice
365 When he the proud and mighty did despise,
And his most certain oracles declare
They man's restored peace at last shall share.

But to our parents then, sad was the change
Which them from peace and safety did estrange,
370 Brought universal woe and discord in,
The never-failing consequents<sup>o</sup> of sin;
Nor only made all things without them jar<sup>o</sup>
But in their breasts raised up a civil war.
Reason and sense maintained continual fight,
375 Urging th'aversion and the appetite,
Which led two different troops of passions out,

Confounding all in their tumultuous rout.<sup>o</sup>
The less world with the great proportion held:
As winds the caverns, sighs the bosoms filled;
380 So flowing tears did beauty's fair fields drown,
As inundations kept within no bound.
Fear earthquakes made, lust in the fancy whirled,
Turned into flame and, bursting, fired the world:
Spite, hate, revenge, ambition, avarice.
385 Made innocence a prey to monstrous vice.
The cold and hot diseases represent
The perturbations of the element.
Thus woe and danger had beset them round,
Distressed without, within no comfort found.
390 Even as a monarch's favourite in disgrace
Suffers contempt both from the high and base,
And the most abject most insult o'er them
Whom the offended sovereigns condemn;
So after man th'Almighty disobeyed,
395 Each little fly durst his late king invade
As well as the wood's monsters, wolves and bears,
And all things else that exercise his fears.<sup>9</sup>
Methinks I hear sad Eve in some dark vale
Her woeful state with such sad plaints<sup>o</sup> bewail:
400 'Ah! why doth Death its latest stroke delay?<sup>1</sup>
If we must leave the light, why do we stay
By slow degrees more painfully to die,
And languish in a long calamity?<sup>o</sup>
Have we not lost by one false cheating sin
405 All peace without, all sweet repose within?
Is there a pleasure yet that life can show,
Doth not each moment multiply our woe:
And while we live thus in perpetual dread,
Our hope and comfort long before us dead,
410 Why should we not our angry Maker pray
At once to take our wretched lives away?

Hath not our sin all Nature's pure leagues rent<sup>o</sup>
 And armed against us every element?
 Have not our subjects their allegiance broke,
 415 Doth not each worm<sup>o</sup> scorn our unworthy yoke?
 Are we not half with griping<sup>o</sup> hunger pined<sup>o</sup>
 Before we bread amongst the brambles find?
 All pale diseases in our members<sup>o</sup> reign,
 Anguish and grief no less our sick souls pain.
 420 Wherever I my eyes or thoughts convert,<sup>o</sup>
 Each object adds new tortures to my heart.
 If I look up, I dread Heaven's threatening frown,
 Thorns prick my eyes when shame hath cast them
 down,
 Dangers I see, looking on either hand,
 425 Before me all in fighting posture stand.
 If I cast back my sorrow-drownèd eyes,
 I see our ne'er to be recovered Paradise,
 The flaming sword which doth us thence exclude,
 By sad remorse and ugly guilt pursued.
 430 If on my sin-defilèd self I gaze,
 My nakedness and spots do me amaze.<sup>o</sup>
 If I on thee a private glance reflect,<sup>o</sup>
 Confusion doth my shameful eyes deject,
 Seeing the man I love by me betrayed,
 435 By me, who for his mutual help was made,
 Who to preserve thy life ought to have died,
 And I have killed thee by my foolish pride,
 Defiled thy glory and pulled down thy throne.
 O that I had but sinned and died alone!
 440 Then had my torture and my woe been less,
 I yet had flourished in thy happiness.<sup>2</sup>
 If these words Adam's melting soul did move,
 He might reply with kind rebuking<sup>o</sup> love:
 'Cease, cease, O foolish woman, to dispute,
 445 God's sovereign will and power are absolute.

If he will have us soon or slow to die,
Frail worms must yield, but must not question why.
When his great hand appears, we must conclude
All that he doth is wise and just and good;
450 Though our poor, sin-benighted souls are blind,
Nor can the mysteries of his wisdom find,
Yet in our present case we must confess
His justice and our own unrighteousness.
He warned us of this fatal consequence,
455 That death must wait on disobedience;
Yet we despised his threat and broke his law,
So did destruction on our own heads draw;
Now under his afflicting hand we lie,
Reaping the fruit of our iniquity;
460 Which, had not he prevented when we fell,
At once had plunged us in the lowest Hell;
But by his mercy yet we have reprieve,
And yet are showed how we in death may live,
If we improve our short-indulgèd space
465 To understand, prize, and accept his grace.
    'Did all of us at once like brutes expire
And cease to be, we might quick death desire:
But since our chief and immaterial part,
Not framed of dust, doth not to dust revert,
470 Its death not an annihilation is,
But to be cut off from its supreme bliss:
Whatever here to mortals can befall
Compared to future miseries is small.
The saddest, sharpest, and the longest have 475 Their final consummations<sup>o</sup> in the grave;
These have their intermissions and allays,<sup>o</sup> Though black and gloomy ones, these nights have days.
The worst calamities we here endure
Admit a possibility of cure.
480 Our miseries here are varied in their kind,

And in that change the wretched some ease find.
Sleep here our pained senses stupefies
And cheating streams in our sick fancies rise,
But in our future sufferings 'tis not so,
485 There is no end, no intermitted<sup>o</sup> woe,
No more return from the accursed place,
No hope, no possibility of grace,
No sleepy intervals, no pleasant dreams,
No mitigations of those sad extremes,
490 No gentle mixtures, no soft changes there,
Perpetual tortures heightened with despair,
Eternal horror and eternal night,
Eternal burnings with no glance of light,
Eternal pain. O, 'tis a thought too great,
495 Too terrible, for any to repeat
Who have not 'scaped<sup>o</sup> the dread. Let's not to shun
Heaven's scorching rays, into Hell's furnace run:
But having slain ourselves, let's fly to him
Who only can our souls from death redeem.
500 'To undo what's done is not within our power,
No more than to call back the last fled hour.
To think we can our fallen state restore,
Or without hope our ruin to deplore,
Are equal aggravating crimes; the first
505 Repeats that sin for which we were accursed,
While we with foolish arrogating<sup>o</sup> pride
More in ourselves than in our God confide;<sup>o</sup>
The last is both ungrateful and unjust,
That doth his goodness or his power distrust,
510 Which wheresoe'er we look, without, within,
Above, beneath, in every place is seen.
Doth Heaven frown? Above the sullen shrouds
God sits, and sees through all the blackest clouds
Sin casts about us, like the misty night,
515 Which hides his pleasing glances from our sight;
Nor only sees, but darts on us his beams,

Ministering comfort in our worst extremes.
When lightnings fly, dire storm and thunder roars,
He guides the shafts, the serene calm restores.
520 When shadows occupy day's vacant room,
He makes new glory spring from night's dark womb.
When the black prince of air lets loose the winds,
The furious warriors he in prison binds.
If burnings stars do conflagrations threat,<sup>o</sup>
525 He gives cool breezes to allay the heat.
When cold doth in its rigid season reign,
He melts the snows and thaws the air again;
Restoring the vicissitude of things,
He still new good from every evil brings.
530 He holds together the world's shaken frame,
Ordaining every change, is still the same.
If he permit the elements to fight,
The rage of storms, the blackness of the night;
'Tis that his power, love and wisdom may 535 More glory have, restoring calm and day;
That we may more the pleasant blessings prize,
Laid in the balance with their contraries.
    'Though dangers, then, like gaping monsters stand
Ready to swallow us on either hand,
540 Let us despise them, firm in this faith still,
If God will save, they can nor hurt nor kill;
If by his just permission we are slain,
His power can heal and quicken<sup>o</sup> us again.
If briars and thorns which from our sins arise,
545 Looking on earth, pierce through our guilty eyes,
Let's yet give thanks they have not choked the seed
Which should with better fruit our sad lives feed.
If discord set the inward world on fire,
With haste let's to the living spring retire,
550 There quench and quiet the disturbèd soul,
There on Love's sweet refreshing green banks roll,
Where, ecstasied with joy, we shall not feel

The serpent's little nibblings at our heel.
If we look back on Paradise, late lost,
555 Joys vanished like swift dreams, thawed like a frost,
Converting pleasant walks to dirt and mire,
Would we such frail delights again desire,
Which at their best, however excellent,
Had this defect, they were not permanent?
560 If sin, remorse, and guilt give us the chase,
Let us lie close in Mercy's sweet embrace,
Which when it us ashamed and naked found,
In the soft arms of melting pity bound,
Eternal glorious triumphs did prepare,
565 Armed us with clothes against the wounding air,
By expiating sacrifices taught
How new life shall by death to light be brought.
If we before us look, although we see
All things in present fighting posture be:
570 Yet in the promise we a prospect have
Of Victory swallowing up the empty grave;
Our foes all vanquished, Death itself lies dead,
And we shall trample on the monster's head,
Entering into a new and perfect joy
575 Which neither sin nor sorrow can destroy:
A lasting and refined felicity,
For which even we ourselves refined must be.
Then shall we laugh at our now childish woes,
And hug the birth that issues from these throes.<sup>3</sup>
580 'Let not my share of grief afflict thy mind,
But let me comfort in thy courage find;
'Twas not thy malice, but thy ignorance
That lately my destruction did advance;
Nor can I my own self excuse; 'twas I
585 Undid myself by my facility.<sup>o</sup>
Let's not in vain each other now upbraid,<sup>o</sup>
But rather strive to'afford each other aid,

And our most gracious Lord with due thanks bless,
Who hath not left us single in distress.
590 When fear chills thee, my hope shall make thee warm,
When I grow faint, thou shalt my courage arm;
When both our spirits at a low ebb are,
We both will join in mutual fervent prayer
To him whose gracious succour never fails
595 When sin and death poor feeble man assails,
He that our final triumph hath decreed
And promised thee salvation in thy seed.
Ah! can I this in Adam's person say,
While fruitless tears melt my poor life away?
600 Of all the ills to mortals incident,
None more pernicious is than discontent,
That brat of unbelief and stubborn pride
And sensual lust, with no joy satisfied,
That doth ingratitude and murmur nurse,
605 And is a sin which carries its own curse;
This is the only smart of every ill.
But can we without it sad tortures feel?
Yes; if our souls above our sense remain,
And take not in th'afflicted body's pain;
610 When they descend and mix with the disease,
Then doth the anguish live, reign, and increase,
Which when the soul is not in it, grows faint
And wastes its strength, not nourished with complaint.
Submissive, humble, happy, sweet content
615 A thousand deaths by one death doth prevent,
When our rebellious wills, subdued thereby
Into th'eternal will and wisdom, die;
Nor is that will harsh or irrational,
But sweet in that which we most bitter call,
620 Who err in judging what is ill or good,
Only by studying that will understood.

What we admire in a low paradise,
If they our souls from heavenly thoughts entice,
Here terminating our most strong desire
625 Which should to perfect permanence aspire,
From being good to us they are so far
That they our fetters, yokes and poisons are,
The obstacles of our felicity,<sup>o</sup>
The ruin of our souls' most firm healths be,
630 Quenching that life-maintaining appetite
Which makes substantial fruit our sound delight.
The evils, so miscalled, that we endure
Are wholesome medicines tending to our cure;
Only disease to these aversion breeds,
635 The healthy soul on them with due thanks feeds.
If for a prince, a mistress, or a friend,
Many do joy their blood and lives to spend,
Wealth, honour, ease, dangers and wounds despise,
Should we not more to God's will sacrifice
640 And by free gift prevent that else-sure loss?
Whate'er our will is, we must bear the cross,
Which freely taken up, the weight is less
And hurts not, carried on with cheerfulness.
Besides, what we can lose are gliding streams,
645 Light airy shadows, unsubstantial dreams,
Wherein we no propriety<sup>o</sup> could have
But that which our own cheating fancy gave.
The right of them was due to God alone,
And when with thanks we render him his own
650 Either he gives us back our offerings
Or our submission pays with better things.
Were ills as real as our fancies make,
They soon must us, or we must them forsake;
We cannot miss ease and vicissitude
655 Till our last rest our labours shall conclude.
Natural tears<sup>4</sup> there are which in due bound

Do not the soul with sinful sorrow drown;
Repentant tears, too, are no fretting brine,<sup>9</sup>
But Love's soft meltings, which the soul refine;
660 Like gentle showers that usher in the spring,
These make the soul more fair and flourishing.
No murmuring winds of passions here prevail,
But the life-breathing spirit's sweet fresh gale,
Which by those fruitful drops all graces feeds
665 And draws rich extracts from the soaked seeds;
But worldly sorrow, like rough winter's storms,
All graces kills, all loveliness deforms,
Augments the evils of our present state
And doth eternal woes anticipate.
670 Vain is that grief which can no ill redress
But adds affliction to uneasiness,
Unnerving the soul's powers then when they should
Most exercise their constant fortitude.
With these most certain truths let's wind up all:<sup>5</sup>
675 Whatever doth to mortal men befall
Not casual<sup>6</sup> is, like shafts at random shot,
But Providence distributes every lot,
In which th'obedient and the meek rejoice,
Above their own preferring God's wise choice.
680 Nor is his Providence less good than wise,
Though our gross sense pierce not its mysteries.
As there's but one most true substantial good,
And God himself is that beatitude:
So can we suffer but one real ill,
685 Divorce from him by our repugnant will,
Which when to just submission it returns
The reunited soul no longer mourns,
His serene rays dry up its former tears,
Dispel the tempest of its carnal fears,
690 Which dread what either never may arrive,
Or not as seen in their false perspective;

For in the crystal mirror of God's grace
All things appear with a new lovely face.
When that doth Heaven's more glorious palace show,
695 We cease t'admire a Paradise below,
Rejoice in that which lately was our loss,
And see a crown made up of every cross.
Return, return, my soul, to thy true rest,
700 As young benighted<sup>7</sup> birds unto their nest;
There hide thyself under the wings of Love
Till the bright morning all thy clouds remove.

- Note 1: Hutchinson likely wrote her epic poem on Genesis in the 1660s, when a manuscript of twenty cantos circulated among her peers. The first five cantos were printed anonymously in 1679. The twenty-canto version was not published until 2001. Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
In the printed text, references to scriptural texts in the left-hand margin accompany many lines of verse, offering meaningful, and often politicized, intertexts for readers steeped in scripture. The marginal note here, for example, "Gen. 3.8," indicates the moment at which God arrives in the garden to punish Adam and Eve and they hide from him among the trees. These marginal references do not appear in the manuscript and have been omitted here for ease of reading.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Summons formally to appear in a court of law. Hutchinson often invokes the rule of law in her presentation of divine punishment. See also line 57. The marginal reference at line 11 is to 2 Samuel 23:3: "The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Tradition, not Genesis, identifies the serpent with Satan.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The contrast here is between what Luke 12:32 (cited in the margin) calls God's "little flock" and the secular world. Hutchinson also suggests a smaller congregation of God's elect.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The marginal reference here is to Revelation 12:7–9, which describes the war in heaven, but Hutchinson also signals her defiant republicanism.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Hutchinson ranges far beyond the description of Eve's punishment in Genesis (the marginal reference reads "Gen. 3.16 etc."), describing women's experiences as wives and mothers in terms at once sympathetic and indignant.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The marginal reference here is to 1 Samuel 25:25, in which Abigail pleads with David not to countenance her husband, the tyrant Nabal.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Compare with Hester Pulten's "Upon the Death of My Dear and Lovely Daughter, Jane Pulten" (p. 1228).Return to reference 9

- Note 2: Births in which neither the feet nor head of the fetus lies in the direction of the birth canal. "Abortions" here refers to the expulsion or removal from the womb of developing embryos or fetuses.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Children or descendants (poetic). See Paradise Lost 10.385.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The marginal reference here, "Eph.5.25 etc.," enjoins husbands to "love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it," a line that Hutchinson, like other defenders of women, chooses as a counterbalance to Ephesians 22, enjoining wives to "submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: See Paradise Lost 10.188 and Donne's "Death Be Not Proud."Return to reference 5

- Note 6: People, objects, and events from the Hebrew Bible that Christians read as prefiguring new Christian dispensations.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The peak in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula where Moses received the Ten Commandments (Exodus 19:10–20:18).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: One of the substances out of which all material bodies are made (earth, water, air, and fire); the atmosphere.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The simile compares the disgraced favorite, hated by both high and low, to man, who after his fall is tormented both by "every little fly" and by the worst beasts of his fears.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: See Paradise Lost 10.771–73.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Writing in the 1730s, Julius Hutchinson notes that "these verses were writ by Mrs. Hutchinson on the occasion of the Colonel her husband's being then a prisoner in the Tower, 1664."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The "birth" that issues from the "throes" of death is the final judgment and resurrection.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See Paradise Lost 12.645.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
 "Wind up all" (sum up or bring to a close) suggests that cantos 1–5 were originally conceived as a complete work. Hutchinson's twenty-canto poem circulated in the manuscript form associated with more politically controversial matters, but its first five cantos were printed anonymously in 1679 as Order and disorder, or, The world made and undone, being meditations upon the creation and fall, as it is recorded in the beginnings of Genesis.

KATHERINE PHILIPS

1632–1664

The most famous woman poet of her own and the next generation, Katherine Philips was honored as “the Matchless Orinda,” the classical name she chose for herself in her poetic addresses to a coterie of chiefly female friends, especially Mary Aubrey (M. A.) and Anne Owen (Lucasia). Sometimes reminiscent of Donne’s love lyrics, and sometimes of the ancient Greek Sappho’s erotic lyrics to women, these poems develop an exalted ideal of female friendship as a Platonic union of souls. If souls “no sexes have,” she writes in one poem,

for men t’exclude
Women from friendship’s vast capacity,
Is a design injurious and rude,
Only maintained by partial tyranny.

Two prose treatises, including Jeremy Taylor’s Discourse of the Nature, Offices, and Measures of Friendship (1657), were dedicated to Philips, indicating the seriousness with which her theories of friendship were considered in the period.

Born to a well-to-do Presbyterian family and educated at Mrs. Salmon’s Presbyterian School in Hackney, Philips was taken to Wales when her mother remarried. In 1648, at age seventeen, she was married to James Philips, a prominent member of Parliament. They lived together twelve years, chiefly in the small Welsh town of Cardigan. The death of her son, Hector, a few days after birth prompted one of her most moving poems. A royalist despite her Puritan family connections, Philips forged connections with other displaced royalists. Her poems circulated in manuscript and elicited high praise from Henry Vaughan, among others. They include elegies, epitaphs, poems at parting, and friendship poems to women and men, but also poetry on political themes: a denunciation of the regicide, "Upon the Double Murder of King Charles," and panegyrics on the restored Stuarts.

After the Restoration, James Philips barely escaped execution as a regicide, had his estates confiscated, and lost his seat in Parliament. Katherine, however, became a favorite at court, promoted by her friend Sir Charles Cotterell ("Poliarchus"), who was master of ceremonies. Attempting (unsuccessfully) to redeem an investment, in Ireland, Philips translated Corneille's Pompey, which she and her friend the Earl of Orrery produced and printed in Dublin in 1663. The first edition of her poems, apparently pirated, appeared in 1664, the same year she died of smallpox. Her friend Cotterell brought out an authorized edition in 1667 titled Poems by the Most Deservedly Admired Mrs. Katherine Philips, the Matchless Orinda. The many extant manuscript collections of her poems suggest the popularity and wide circulation of her work both during her lifetime and after.

A Married State<sup>1</sup>

A married state affords but little ease
The best of husbands are so hard to please.
This in wives' careful<sup>o</sup> faces you may spell<sup>o</sup>
Though they dissemble their misfortunes well.
5 A virgin state is crowned with much content;<sup>2</sup>
It's always happy as it's innocent.
No blustering husbands to create your fears;
No pangs of childbirth to extort your tears;
No children's cries for to offend your ears;
10 Few worldly crosses to distract your prayers:
Thus are you freed from all the cares that do
Attend on matrimony and a husband too.
Therefore Madam, be advised by me
Turn, turn apostate to love's levity,
Suppress wild nature if she dare rebel.
15 There's no such thing as leading apes in hell.<sup>3</sup>

- Note 1: In a manuscript (Orielson MSS Box 24 at the National Library of Wales) this poem appears with another by Philips, addressed to Anne Barlow (whom she probably met in 1646); this one is probably also for Barlow. Both are signed by her maiden name, C. Fowler, so were evidently written before her marriage in 1648.Return to reference 1

An Answer to Another Persuading a Lady to Marriage

1

Forbear, bold youth, all's Heaven here,
And what you do aver,
To others, courtship may appear,
'Tis sacrilege to her.

2

5 She is a public deity,
And were't not very odd
She should depose her self to be
A pretty household god?

3

10 First make the sun in private shine,
And bid the world adieu,
That so he may his beams confine
In complement to you.

4

15 But if of that you do despair,
Think how you did amiss,
To strive to fix her beams which are
More bright and large than this.

Upon the Double Murder of King Charles

In Answer to a Libelous Rhyme made by V. P.<sup>1</sup>

I think not on the state, nor am concerned
Which way soever that great helm<sup>2</sup> is turned,
But as that son whose father's danger nigh
Did force his native dumbness, and untie
His fettered organs: so here is a cause
5 That will excuse the breach of nature's laws.<sup>3</sup>
Silence were now a sin: nay passion now
Wise men themselves for merit would allow.<sup>4</sup>
What noble eye could see (and careless pass)
The dying lion kicked by every ass?
10 Hath Charles so broke God's laws, he must not have
A quiet crown, nor yet a quiet grave?
Tombs have been sanctuaries; thieves lie here
Secure from all their penalty and fear.
Great Charles his double misery was this,
15 Unfaithful friends, ignoble enemies;
Had any heathen been this prince's foe,
He would have wept to see him injured so.
His title was his crime, they'd reason good
To quarrel at the right they had withstood.
20 He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die,
And what shall then become of thee and I?
Slander must follow treason; but yet stay,
Take not our reason with our king away.
Though you have seized upon all our defense,
25 Yet do not sequester<sup>o</sup> our common sense.
But I admire<sup>o</sup> not at this new supply:
No bounds will hold those who at scepters fly.

30

Christ will be King, but I ne'er understood,
His subjects built his kingdom up with blood
(Except their own) or that he would dispense
With his commands, though for his own defense.
Oh! to what height of horror are they come
Who dare pull down a crown, tear up a tomb!<sup>5</sup>

1649? Endnotes

1664

- Note 1:
The itinerant Welsh preacher Vavasour Powell was a Fifth Monarchist and an ardent republican who justified the regicide on the ground that Christ's second coming was imminent, when he would rule with his saints, putting down all earthly kings. His poem and Philips's answer were likely written shortly after Charles I's execution (January 30, 1649). Powell's poem has been published by Elizabeth H. Hageman in English Manuscript Studies. Compare this poem with Marvell's "An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland."

Come, my Lucasia, since we see
That miracles men's faith do move,
By wonder and by prodigy
To the dull angry world let's prove
There's a religion in our love.

2

For though we were designed t' agree,
That fate no liberty destroys,
But our election is as free
As angels, who with greedy choice
Are yet determined to their joys.<sup>2</sup>

Our hearts are doubled by the loss,
Here mixture is addition grown;
We both diffuse,<sup>o</sup> and both engross:<sup>o</sup>
And we whose minds are so much one,
Never, yet ever are alone.

4

We court our own captivity
Than thrones more great and innocent:
'Twere banishment to be set free,
Since we wear fetters whose intent
Not bondage is, but ornament.

25

Divided joys are tedious found,
And griefs united easier grow:
We are selves but by rebound,
And all our titles shuffled so,
Both princes, and both subjects too.<sup>3</sup>

Our hearts are mutual victims laid,
While they (such power in friendship lies)
Are altars, priests, and off'rings made:
And each heart which thus kindly<sup>o</sup> dies,
Grows deathless by the sacrifice.

To Mrs. M. A.<sup>1</sup> at Parting

I have examined and do find,
Of all that favor me
There's none I grieve to leave behind
But only only thee.
5 To part with thee I needs must die,
Could parting separate thee and I.

But neither chance nor compliment
Did element<sup>o</sup> our love:
'Twas sacred sympathy was lent
Us from the choir above.
10 (That friendship fortune did create,
Still fears a wound from time or fate.)

Our changed and mingled souls are grown
To such acquaintance now,
That if each would resume their own,
15 Alas! we know not how.
We have each other so engrossed<sup>o</sup>
That each is in the union lost.<sup>2</sup>

And thus we can no absence know,
Nor shall we be confined;
20 Our active souls will daily go
To learn each other's mind.
Nay, should we never meet to sense,<sup>o</sup>
Our souls would hold intelligence.<sup>o</sup>

Inspired with a flame divine,
25 I scorn to court a stay;<sup>3</sup>
For from that noble soul of thine

I ne'er can be away.
But I shall weep when thou dost grieve;
Nor can I die whilst thou dost live.

30

By my own temper I shall guess
At thy felicity,
And only like my happiness
Because it pleaseth thee.
Our hearts at any time will tell
If thou or I be sick or well.

35

All honor, sure, I must pretend,<sup>o</sup>
All that is good or great:
She that would be Rosania's<sup>4</sup> friend
Must be at least complete.
If I have any bravery,<sup>o</sup>
'Tis cause I have so much of thee.

40

Thy leiger<sup>o</sup> soul in me shall lie,
And all thy thoughts reveal;
Then back again with mine shall fly,
And thence to me shall steal.
Thus still to one another tend:
Such is the sacred name of friend.

Thus our twin souls in one shall grow,
And teach the world new love,
Redeem the age and sex, and show
A flame fate dares not move:
And courting death to be our friend,
Our lives, together too, shall end.

A dew shall dwell upon our tomb
Of such a quality
That fighting armies, thither come,
Shall reconcilèd be.

55

We'll ask no epitaph, but say:
ORINDA and ROSANIA.

Epitaph: On Her Son H. P. at St. Syth's Church, Where Her Body Was Interred<sup>1</sup>

What on earth deserves our trust?
Youth and beauty both are dust.
Long we gathering are with pain,
What one moment calls again.
5 Seven years childless, marriage past,
A son, a son is born at last;
So exactly limned<sup>o</sup> and fair,
Full of good spirits, mien,<sup>o</sup> and air,
As a long life promised;
10 Yet, in less than six weeks dead.
Too promising, too great a mind
In so small room to be confined:
Therefore, as fit in heav'n to dwell,
He quickly broke the prison shell.
15 So the subtle alchemist,
Can't with Hermes' seal resist
The powerful spirit's subtler flight,
But t'will bid him long good night.<sup>2</sup>
And so the sun, if it arise
20 Half so glorious as his eyes,
Like this infant, takes a shroud,
Buried in a morning cloud.

ANDREW MARVELL

1621–1678

Andrew Marvell's finest poems are second to none in this or any other period. He wrote less than did Donne, Jonson, and Herbert, but his range was in some ways greater, including in poetry and prose both the private worlds of love and religious devotion and the public worlds of politics and satire. His overriding concern with art, his limpid style, and the cool balance and reserve of some poems align him with Jonson. Yet his paradoxes and complexities of tone, his use of dramatic monologue, and his witty, dialectical arguments associate him with Donne. Above all, he is a supremely original poet, so complex and elusive that it is often hard to know what he really thought about the subjects he treated. Many of his poems were published posthumously in 1681, some thirty years after they were written, by a woman who claimed to be his widow but was probably his housekeeper. So their date and order of composition are often in doubt, as is his authorship of some anonymous works.

The son of a Church of England clergyman, Marvell grew up in Yorkshire and attended Trinity College, Cambridge (perhaps deriving the persistent strain of Neoplatonism in his poetry from the academics known as the Cambridge Platonists). Falling under the influence of Jesuits, he ran off to London and converted to Roman Catholicism until his father put an end to both ventures. He returned to Cambridge, took his degree in 1639, and stayed on as a scholar until his father's death in 1641. During the years of the civil wars (1642–48), he traveled in France, Italy, Holland, and Spain. While his earliest poems associate him with royalists, those after 1649 celebrate the Commonwealth and Oliver Cromwell; although he is sometimes ambivalent, Marvell recognizes divine providence in the political changes. From 1650 to 1652 he lived at Nunappleton, in rural Yorkshire, as tutor to the twelve-year-old daughter of Thomas Fairfax, who had given over his command of the parliamentary army to Cromwell because he was unwilling to invade Scotland. In these years of retirement, Marvell probably wrote most of his love lyrics and pastorals as well as Upon Appleton House. Later he was tutor to Cromwell's ward, William Dutton, and traveled with him on the Continent; in 1657 he joined the blind Milton, at Milton's request, in the post of Latin secretary to Cromwell's Council of State. After the restoration of Charles II, Marvell maintained his own independent vision and his abiding belief in religious toleration, a mixed state, and constitutional government. He helped his friend Milton avoid execution for his revolutionary polemics, as well as helping to negotiate Milton's release from a brief imprisonment. Elected a member of Parliament in 1659 from his hometown, Hull, in Yorkshire, he held that post until 1678; on two occasions he went on diplomatic missions to Holland and Russia. His (necessarily anonymous) antiroyalist polemics of these years include several verse satires on Charles II and his ministers, as well as his best-known prose work, The Rehearsal Transposed (1672–73), which defends Puritan dissenters and denounces censorship with verve and wit.

Many of Marvell's poems explore the human condition in terms of fundamental dichotomies that resist resolution. In religious or philosophical poems like "The Coronet" or "The Dialogue Between the Soul and Body," the conflict is between nature and grace, body and soul, poetic creation and sacrifice. Love poems such as "The Definition of Love" or "To His Coy Mistress" contrast flesh and spirit, physical sex and platonic love, idealized courtship and the ravages of time. In pastorals like the Mower poems and "The Garden," the opposition is between nature and art, or the fallen and the Edenic state, or violent passion and contentment. Marvell's most subtle and complex political poem, "An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland," sets stable traditional order and ancient right against providential revolutionary change, and the goods and costs of retirement and peace against those of action and war. Upon Appleton House also opposes the attractions of retirement to the duties of action and reformation.

Marvell experimented with style and genre to striking effect. Many of his dramatic monologues center on naive personas like the Mower or the Nymph, whose opinions may or may not voice those of the author. In "To His Coy Mistress," perhaps the best known of the century's carpe diem poems, an urbane narrator speaks in balanced and artful couplets. But the poem's rapid shifts from the world of fantasy to the charnel house of reality raise questions as to whether this is a clever seduction poem or an articulation of existential angst, and whether Marvell intends to endorse or to critique this speaker's view of passion and sex. Upon Appleton House transforms the mythic features of Jonson's country house poem "To Penshurst" by assimilating history and the conflicts of contemporary society. The poem incorporates into providential history the topographical features of the Fairfax estate, the Fairfax family myth of origin, the progress of the poet-tutor around the estate, and the activities and projected future of the daughter of the house. The poem's rich symbolism of biblical events—Eden, the first temptation, the Fall, the Israelites' journey in the wilderness—resonates with the experiences of the Fairfax family, the speaker, the history of the English Reformation, and the wanton destruction caused by the recent civil wars.

The Coronet<sup>2</sup>

When for the thorns with which I long, too long,
With many a piercing wound,
My Savior's head have crowned,
I seek with garlands to redress that wrong,
Through every garden, every mead,
5 I gather flowers (my fruits are only flowers),
Dismantling all the fragrant towers<sup>o</sup>
That once adorned my shepherdess's head:
And now, when I have summed up all my store,
Thinking (so I myself deceive)
10 So rich a chaplet<sup>o</sup> thence to weave
As never yet the King of Glory wore,
Alas! I find the serpent old,<sup>3</sup>
That, twining<sup>o</sup> in his speckled breast,
About the flowers disguised does fold
15 With wreaths of fame and interest.<sup>4</sup>
Ah, foolish man, that wouldst debase with them,
And mortal glory, heaven's diadem!
But thou who only couldst the serpent tame,
Either his slippery knots at once untie,
20 And disentangle all his winding snare,
Or shatter too with him my curious frame,<sup>o</sup>
And let these wither, so that he may die,
Though set with skill and chosen out with care;
That they, while thou on both their spoils dost
25 tread,<sup>5</sup>
May crown thy feet, that could not crown thy head.

Bermudas<sup>1</sup>

Where the remote Bermudas ride
In th' ocean's bosom unespied,
From a small boat that rowed along,
The listening winds received this song:

5        "What should we do but sing His praise
That led us through the wat'ry maze
Unto an isle so long unknown,
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where He the huge sea monsters wracks,<sup>2</sup>
That lift the deep upon their backs;
10      He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms, and prelate's rage.<sup>3</sup>
He gave us this eternal spring
Which here enamels everything,
And sends the fowls to us in care,
15      On daily visits through the air;
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pomegranates close
Jewels more rich than Ormus<sup>4</sup> shows;
20      He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet;
But apples<sup>o</sup> plants of such a price,
No tree could ever bear them twice;
With cedars, chosen by his hand
25      From Lebanon, he stores the land;
And makes the hollow seas that roar
Proclaim the ambergris<sup>5</sup> on shore;
He cast (of which we rather<sup>o</sup> boast)

30 The gospel's pearl upon our coast,
And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple, where to sound his name.
O let our voice his praise exalt
Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
35 Which, thence (perhaps) rebounding, may Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."◊

Thus sung they in the English boat
An holy and a cheerful note;
And all the way, to guide their chime,
40 With falling oars they kept the time.

A Dialogue Between the Soul and Body<sup>1</sup>

SOUL O, who shall from this dungeon raise
A soul enslaved so many ways?<sup>2</sup>
With bolts of bones, that fettered stands
In feet, and manacled in hands.
Here blinded with an eye, and there
5 Deaf with the drumming of an ear;
A soul hung up, as 'twere, in chains
Of nerves, and arteries, and veins;
Tortured, besides each other part,
In a vain head and double heart.
10

BODY O, who shall me deliver whole
From bonds of this tyrannic soul?
Which, stretched upright, impales me so
That mine own precipice<sup>3</sup> I go;
And warms and moves this needless<sup>o</sup> frame
15 (A fever could but do the same),
And, wanting where<sup>o</sup> its spite to try,
Has made me live to let me die.
A body that could never rest
Since this ill spirit it possessed.
20

SOUL What magic could me thus confine
Within another's grief to pine?
Where, whatsoever it complain,<sup>o</sup>
I feel, that cannot feel,<sup>4</sup> the pain;
And all my care itself employs,
25 That to preserve which me destroys;
Constrained not only to endure
Diseases, but, what's worse, the cure;
And, ready oft the port to gain,

30 Am shipwrecked into health again.

BODY But physic<sup>o</sup> yet could never reach
 The maladies thou me dost teach:
 Whom first the cramp of hope does tear,
 And then the palsy shakes of fear;
 The pestilence of love does heat,
 35 Or hatred's hidden ulcer eat;
 Joy's cheerful madness does perplex,
 Or sorrow's other madness vex;
 Which knowledge forces me to know,
 And memory will not forego.
 40 What but a soul could have the wit
 To build me up for sin so fit?
 So architects do square and hew
 Green trees that in the forest grew.

The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn<sup>1</sup>

The wanton troopers<sup>2</sup> riding by
Have shot my fawn, and it will die.
Ungentle men! They cannot thrive
To kill thee. Thou ne'er didst alive
5 Them any harm; alas, nor could
Thy death yet do them any good.
I'm sure I never wished them ill,
Nor do I for all this, nor will:
But if my simple prayers may yet
Prevail with heaven to forget
10 Thy murder, I will join my tears
Rather than fail. But, O my fears!
It cannot die so. Heaven's king
Keeps register of everything,
And nothing may we use in vain.
15 Even beasts must be with justice slain,
Else men are made their deodands.<sup>3</sup>
Though they should wash their guilty hands
In this warm lifeblood, which doth part
From thine, and wound me to the heart,
20 Yet could they not be clean; their stain
Is dyed in such a purple grain.
There is not such another in
The world to offer for their sin.
Unconstant Sylvio, when yet
25 I had not found him counterfeit,<sup>o</sup>
One morning (I remember well),
Tied in this silver chain and bell,
Gave it to me; nay, and I know

What he said then, I'm sure I do.
30 Said he, Look how your huntsman here
Hath taught a fawn to hunt his dear.
But Sylvio soon had me beguiled;
This waxèd tame, while he grew wild,
And quite regardless of my smart,
35 Left me his fawn, but took his heart.<sup>4</sup>
Thenceforth I set myself to play
My solitary time away
With this; and very well content
Could so mine idle life have spent.
40 For it was full of sport, and light
Of foot and heart, and did invite Me to its game. It seemed to bless
Itself in me; how could I less Than love it? O I cannot be 45 Unkind t' a beast that loveth me.
Had it lived long, I do not know
Whether it too might have done so
As Sylvio did; his gifts might be Perhaps as false or more than he.
50 But I am sure, for aught that I
Could in so short a time espy,
Thy love was far more better than
The love of false and cruel men.
With sweetest milk and sugar first
55 I it at mine own fingers nursed.
And as it grew, so every day
It waxed more sweet and white than they.
It had so sweet a breath! and oft
I blushed to see its foot more soft
60 And white—shall I say than my hand?—
Nay, any lady's of the land.
It is a wondrous thing how fleet
'Twas on those little silver feet,

65 With what a pretty skipping grace
It oft would challenge me the race;
And when it had left me far away,
'Twould stay, and run again, and stay.
For it was nimbler much than hinds,<sup>5</sup>
And trod, as on the four winds.

70 I have a garden of my own
But so with roses overgrown
And lilies that you would it guess
To be a little wilderness.
And all the springtime of the year
75 It only loved to be there.
Among the beds of lilies, I
Have sought it oft where it should lie,
Yet could not, till itself would rise,
Find it, although before mine eyes.

80 For in the flaxen lilies' shade
It like a bank of lilies laid.
Upon the roses it would feed,
Until its lips ev'n seemed to bleed;
And then to me 'twould boldly trip
85 And print those roses on my lip.
But all its chief delight was still
On roses thus itself to fill,
And its pure virgin limbs to fold
In whitest sheets of lilies cold.

90 Had it lived long, it would have been Lilies without, roses within.
O help! O help! I see it faint,
And die as calmly as a saint.
See how it weeps.<sup>6</sup> The tears do come
95 Sad, slowly dropping like a gum.
So weeps the wounded balsam, so
The holy frankincense doth flow.<sup>7</sup>
The brotherless Heliades

100 Melt in such amber tears as these.<sup>8</sup>
       I in a golden vial will Keep these two crystal tears, and fill
       It till it do o'erflow with mine,
       Then place it in Diana's shrine.<sup>9</sup>
 105 Now my sweet fawn is vanished to
       Whither the swans and turtles<sup>o</sup> go,
       In fair Elysium<sup>1</sup> to endure
       With milk-white lambs and ermines pure.
       O do not run too fast, for I
       Will but bespeak<sup>o</sup> thy grave, and die.
 110 First my unhappy statue shall
       Be cut in marble, and withal,
       Let it be weeping too; but there
       Th' engraver sure his art may spare,
       For I so truly thee bemoan
 115 That I shall weep, though I be stone:<sup>2</sup>
       Until my tears, still dropping, wear
       My breast, themselves engraving there.
       There at my feet shalt thou be laid,
       Of purest alabaster made;
 120 For I would have thine image be White as I can, though not as thee.

- Note 1: The lament for the death of a pet is an ancient topic dating back to Catullus and Ovid; the closest analogue may be Virgil's story of Sylvia's deer killed wantonly by the Trojans (Aeneid 7.475ff). John Skelton has a mock-heroic poem on "Philip Sparrow." There are also echoes of the Song of Songs, which have prompted critical debate as to whether Marvell uses them with serious allegorical import or the nymph uses them quite inappropriately. ## To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
5 Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Shouldst rubies find; I by the tide
Of Humber would complain.<sup>1</sup> I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
10 Till the conversion of the Jews.<sup>2</sup>
My vegetable love should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow;
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
15 Two hundred to adore each breast,
But thirty thousand to the rest:
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,<sup>o</sup>
Nor would I love at lower rate.
20 But at my back I always hear
Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found,
25 Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long-preserved virginity,
And your quaint<sup>3</sup> honor turn to dust,
And into ashes all my lust:
30

The grave's a fine and private place,
 But none, I think, do there embrace.
 Now therefore, while the youthful hue
 Sits on thy skin like morning dew,<sup>4</sup>
 And while thy willing soul transpires
 35 At every pore with instant fires,<sup>5</sup>
 Now let us sport us while we may,
 And now, like amorous birds of prey,
 Rather at once our time devour
 40 Than languish in his slow-chapped<sup>6</sup> power.
 Let us roll all our strength and all
 Our sweetness up into one ball,
 And tear our pleasures with rough strife
 Thorough<sup>o</sup> the iron gates of life:<sup>7</sup>
 45 Thus, though we cannot make our sun
 Stand still, yet we will make him run.<sup>8</sup>

The Definition of Love

My Love is of a birth as rare
As 'tis, for object, strange and high;
It was begotten by Despair
Upon Impossibility.

5 Magnanimous Despair alone
Could show me so divine a thing,
Where feeble Hope could ne'er have flown
But vainly flapped its tinsel wing.

10 And yet I quickly might arrive
Where my extended soul is fixed;<sup>1</sup>
But Fate does iron wedges drive,
And always crowds itself betwixt.

15 For Fate with jealous eye does see
Two perfect loves, nor lets them close;<sup>o</sup>
Their union would her ruin be,
And her tyrannic power depose.<sup>2</sup>

20 And therefore her decrees of steel
Us as the distant poles have placed
(Though Love's whole world on us doth wheel),<sup>3</sup>
Not by themselves to be embraced,

Unless the giddy heaven fall,
And earth some new convulsion tear,
And, us to join, the world should all
Be cramped into a planisphere.<sup>4</sup>

25 As lines, so loves oblique may well

Themselves in every angle greet;<sup>5</sup>
But ours, so truly parallel,
Though infinite, can never meet.

30 Therefore the Love which us doth bind,
But Fate so enviously debars,
Is the conjunction of the mind,
And opposition of the stars.<sup>6</sup>

The Picture of Little T. C. in a Prospect of Flowers<sup>1</sup>

See with what simplicity
This nymph begins her golden days!
In the green grass she loves to lie,
And there with her fair aspect tames
The wilder flowers and gives them names,
5 But only with the roses plays,
And them does tell
What color best becomes them and what smell.

Who can foretell for what high cause
This darling of the gods was born?
10 Yet this is she whose chaster laws
The wanton Love shall one day fear,
And under her command severe
See his bow broke and ensigns<sup>o</sup> torn.
Happy who can
15 Appease this virtuous enemy of man!

O then let me in time compound<sup>o</sup>
And parley with those conquering eyes
Ere they have tried their force to wound,
Ere with their glancing wheels they drive
20 In triumph over hearts that strive
And them that yield but more despise:
Let me be laid
Where I may see thy glories from some shade.

Meantime, whilst every verdant thing
25 Itself does at thy beauty charm,
Reform the errors of the spring;

30        Make that the tulips may have share
Of sweetness, seeing they are fair;
And roses of their thorns disarm:
      But most procure
That violets may a longer age endure.

35        But O, young beauty of the woods,
Whom Nature courts with fruit and flowers,
Gather the flowers but spare the buds,
Lest Flora,<sup>2</sup> angry at thy crime
To kill her infants in their prime,
Do quickly make th' example yours;
      And ere we see,
40        Nip in the blossom all our hopes and thee.

The Mower Against Gardens<sup>1</sup>

Luxurious<sup>o</sup> man, to bring his vice in use,<sup>2</sup>
Did after him the world seduce,
And from the fields the flowers and plants allure,
Where Nature was most plain and pure.
He first enclosed within the garden's square
5 A dead and standing pool of air,
And a more luscious earth for them did knead,
Which stupefied them while it fed.
The pink grew then as double as his mind;<sup>3</sup>
The nutriment did change the kind.
10 With strange perfumes he did the roses taint;
And flowers themselves were taught to paint.
The tulip white did for complexion seek,
And learned to interline its cheek;
Its onion root they then so high did hold,
15 That one was for a meadow sold;<sup>4</sup>
Another world was searched through oceans new,
To find the marvel of Peru;<sup>5</sup>
And yet these rarities might be allowed
To man, that sovereign thing and proud,
20 Had he not dealt between the bark and tree,<sup>6</sup>
Forbidden mixtures there to see.
No plant now knew the stock from which it came;
He grafts upon the wild the tame,
That the uncertain and adult'rate fruit
25 Might put the palate in dispute.
His green seraglio<sup>7</sup> has its eunuchs too,
Lest any tyrant him outdo;
And in the cherry he does Nature vex,
To procreate without a sex.<sup>8</sup>

30 'Tis all enforced, the fountain and the grot,<sup>o</sup>
 While the sweet fields do lie forgot,
 Where willing Nature does to all dispense
 A wild and fragrant innocence;
 And fauns and fairies do the meadows till
 35 More by their presence than their skill.
 Their statues polished by some ancient hand
 May to adorn the gardens stand;
 But, howsoe'er the figures do excel,
 40 The gods themselves with us do dwell.

Damon the Mower

Hark how the mower Damon sung,
With love of Juliana stung!<sup>1</sup>
While everything did seem to paint
The scene more fit for his complaint.<sup>2</sup>
5 Like her fair eyes the day was fair,
But scorching like his amorous care;
Sharp, like his scythe, his sorrow was,
And withered, like his hopes, the grass.

“Oh what unusual heats are here,
Which thus our sunburned meadows sear!
10 The grasshopper its pipe gives o’er,
And hamstringed<sup>o</sup> frogs can dance no more:
But in the brook the green frog wades,
And grasshoppers seek out the shades.
15 Only the snake, that kept within,
Now glitters in its second skin.

“This heat the sun could never raise,
Nor Dog Star so inflame the days;<sup>3</sup>
It from an higher beauty grow’th,
Which burns the fields and mower both;
20 Which mads the dog, and makes the sun
Hotter than his own Phaëton.<sup>4</sup>
Not Jùly causeth these extremes,
But Juliana’s scorching beams.

“Tell me where I may pass the fires
25 Of the hot day or hot desires,
To what cool cave shall I descend,
Or to what gelid<sup>o</sup> fountain bend?

Alas! I look for ease in vain,
When remedies themselves complain:<sup>5</sup>
30 No moisture but my tears do rest,
No cold but in her icy breast.

"How long wilt thou, fair shepherdess,
Esteem me and my presents less?
To thee the harmless snake I bring,
35 Disarmèd of its teeth and sting:
To thee chameleons, changing hue,
And oak leaves tipped with honeydew;
Yet thou, ungrateful, hast not sought
Nor what they are, nor who them brought.
40

"I am the mower Damon, known
Through all the meadows I have mown.
On me the morn her dew distills
Before her darling daffodils,
And if at noon my toil me heat,
45 The sun himself licks off my sweat;
While, going home, the evening sweet
In cowslip-water bathes my feet.

"What though the piping shepherd stock
The plains with an unnumbered flock?
50 This scythe of mine discovers<sup>o</sup> wide
More ground than all his sheep do hide.
With this the golden fleece I shear
Of all these closes every year,<sup>6</sup>
And though in wool more poor than they,
55 Yet I am richer far in hay.

"Nor am I so deformed to sight
If in my scythe I lookèd right;
In which I see my picture done
As in a crescent moon the sun.

60 The deathless fairies take me oft
To lead them in their dances soft,
And when I tune myself to sing,
About me they contract their ring.<sup>7</sup>

65 "How happy might I still have mowed,
Had not Love here his thistles sowed!
But now I all the day complain,
Joining my labor to my pain;
And with my scythe cut down the grass,
Yet still my grief is where it was;
70 But when the iron blunter grows,
Sighing, I whet my scythe and woes."

While thus he threw his elbow round,
Depopulating all the ground,
And with his whistling scythe does cut
75 Each stroke between the earth and root,
The edgèd steel, by careless chance,
Did into his own ankle glance,
And there among the grass fell down<sup>8</sup>
80 By his own scythe the mower mown.

"Alas!" said he, "these hurts are slight
To those that die by Love's despite.
With shepherd's purse and clown's<sup>o</sup> all-heal<sup>9</sup>
The blood I stanch and wound I seal.
Only for him no cure is found
85 Whom Juliana's eyes do wound.
'Tis Death alone that this must do;
For, Death, thou art a mower too."

The Mower to the Glowworms

Ye living lamps, by whose dear light
The nightingale does sit so late,
And studying all the summer night
Her matchless songs does meditate,

5 Ye country comets, that portend
No war nor prince's funeral,
Shining unto no higher end
Than to presage the grass's fall;

10 Ye glowworms, whose officious<sup>o</sup> flame
To wand'ring mowers shows the way,
That in the night have lost their aim,
And after foolish fires<sup>o</sup> do stray;

15 Your courteous fires in vain you waste,
Since Juliana here is come,
For she my mind hath so displaced
That I shall never find my home.

The Mower's Song

My mind was once the true survey
Of all these meadows fresh and gay,
And in the greenness of the grass
Did see its hopes<sup>1</sup> as in a glass;<sup>o</sup>
When Juliana came, and she,
5 What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.<sup>2</sup>

But these, while I with sorrow pine,
Grew more luxuriant still and fine,
That not one blade of grass you spied
But had a flower on either side;
10 When Juliana came, and she,
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

Unthankful meadows, could you so
A fellowship so true forego,
15 And in your gaudy May-games<sup>3</sup> meet,
While I lay trodden under feet?
When Juliana came, and she,
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and
me.

But what you in compassion ought
Shall now by my revenge be wrought,
20 And flowers, and grass, and I, and all,
Will in one common ruin fall;
For Juliana comes, and she,
What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

25       And thus ye meadows, which have been Companions of my thoughts more green,
          Shall now the heraldry become
          With which I shall adorn my tomb;
          For Juliana comes, and she,
30       What I do to the grass, does to my thoughts and me.

The Garden

How vainly men themselves amaze<sup>o</sup>
To win the palm, the oak, or bays,<sup>1</sup>
And their uncessant labors see
Crowned from some single herb or tree,
Whose short and narrow-vergèd<sup>o</sup> shade
5 Does prudently their toils upbraid;<sup>o</sup>
While all flowers and all trees do close<sup>o</sup>
To weave the garlands of repose!

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
And Innocence, thy sister dear?
10 Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants, if here below,<sup>o</sup>
Only among the plants will grow;
Society is all but rude,
15 To<sup>o</sup> this delicious solitude.

No white nor red<sup>2</sup> was ever seen
So amorous as this lovely green.
Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
Cut in these trees their mistress' name:
20 Little, alas, they know or heed
How far these beauties hers exceed!
Fair trees, wheresoe'er your barks I wound,
No name shall but your own be found.<sup>3</sup>

When we have run our passion's heat,
25 Love hither makes his best retreat.
The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
Still<sup>o</sup> in a tree did end their race:

30 Apollo hunted Daphne so,
Only that she might laurel grow;
And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.<sup>4</sup>

What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
The luscious clusters of the vine
35 Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine and curious<sup>o</sup> peach
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons<sup>5</sup> as I pass,
Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

40 Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less,
Withdraws into its happiness;
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight<sup>o</sup> its own resemblance find;<sup>6</sup>
Yet it creates, transcending these,
45 Far other worlds and other seas,
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit tree's mossy root,
50 Casting the body's vest<sup>o</sup> aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There like a bird it sits and sings,
Then whets<sup>o</sup> and combs its silver wings,
And, till prepared for longer flight,
55 Waves in its plumes the various light.<sup>7</sup>

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet!<sup>8</sup>

60 But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two paradises 'twere in one
To live in paradise alone.

65 How well the skillful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial new,<sup>9</sup>
Where from above the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
And as it works, th' industrious bee
70 Computes its time<sup>1</sup> as well as we!
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers?

An Horatian Ode

Upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland<sup>1</sup>

The forward<sup>o</sup> youth that would appear
Must now forsake his Muses dear,
Nor in the shadows sing
His numbers languishing:

5 'Tis time to leave the books in dust
And oil th' unused armor's rust,
Removing from the wall
The corselet<sup>o</sup> of the hall.<sup>2</sup>

10 So restless Cromwell could not cease
In the inglorious arts of peace,
But through adventurous war
Urgèd his active star;<sup>3</sup>

15 And, like the three-forked lightning, first
Breaking the clouds where it was nursed,
Did through his own side
His fiery way divide:<sup>4</sup>

20 For 'tis all one to courage high,
The emulous, or enemy;
And with such, to enclose
Is more than to oppose.

Then burning through the air he went,
And palaces and temples rent;
And Caesar's head at last
Did through his laurels blast.<sup>5</sup>

25 'Tis madness to resist or blame
The force of angry heaven's flame;
And if we would speak true,
Much to the man is due,

Who from his private gardens, where
He lived reservèd and austere
30 (As if his highest plot
To plant the bergamot),<sup>6</sup>

Could by industrious valor climb
To ruin the great work of time,
And cast the kingdom old
35 Into another mold;

Though Justice against Fate complain,
And plead the ancient rights in vain:
But those do hold or break,
40 As men are strong or weak.

Nature that hateth emptiness,
Allows of penetration less,<sup>7</sup>
And therefore must make room
Where greater spirits come.

45 What field of all the civil wars
Where his were not the deepest scars?
And Hampton shows what part
He had of wiser art;<sup>8</sup>

Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
He wove a net of such a scope
50 That Charles himself might chase
To Caresbrooke's narrow case,

That thence the royal actor<sup>9</sup> borne,

55           The tragic scaffold might adorn;
              While round the armèd bands
              Did clap their bloody hands.

60           He nothing common did or mean
              Upon that memorable scene,
              But with his keener eye
              The ax's edge<sup>1</sup> did try;

              Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
              To vindicate his helpless right;
              But bowed his comely head
              Down, as upon a bed.

65           This was that memorable hour,
              Which first assured the forcèd power;
              So when they did design
              The Capitol's first line,

70           A bleeding head where they begun
              Did fright the architects to run;
              And yet in that the state
              Foresaw its happy fate.<sup>2</sup>

75           And now the Irish are ashamed
              To see themselves in one year tamed;
              So much one man can do,
              That does both act and know.

80           They can affirm his praises best,
              And have, though overcome, confessed
              How good he is, how just,
              And fit for highest trust.<sup>3</sup>

              Nor yet grown stiffer with command,
              But still in the republic's hand—
              How fit he is to sway,

That can so well obey.<sup>4</sup>

85 He to the Commons' feet presents
A kingdom for his first year's rents;
And, what he may, forbears
His fame to make it theirs;<sup>5</sup>

And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
90 To lay them at the public's skirt:
So, when the falcon high
Falls heavy from the sky,

She, having killed, no more does search,
But on the next green bough to perch;
95 Where, when he first does lure,
The falconer has her sure.

What may not then our isle presume,
While victory his crest does plume!
What may not others fear,
100 If thus he crown each year!

A Caesar he ere long to Gaul,
To Italy an Hannibal,
And to all states not free,
Shall climactèric be.<sup>6</sup>

105 The Pict no shelter now shall find
Within his parti-colored mind,
But from this valor sad,<sup>o</sup>
Shrink underneath the plaid;<sup>7</sup>

Happy if in the tufted brake
110 The English hunter him mistake,
Nor lay his hounds in near
The Caledonian<sup>o</sup> deer.

But thou, the war's and Fortune's son,
March indefatigably on;
And for the last effect,
Still keep thy sword erect;

Besides the force it has to fright
The spirits of the shady night,<sup>8</sup>
The same arts that did gain
A power must it maintain.<sup>9</sup>

The Execution of Charles I. A German print illustrates the beheading of Charles I before an enormous crowd, on a scaffold erected in front of the Banqueting House. At the top of the picture small portraits of General Fairfax and Cromwell, leaders of the parliamentary forces, flank a portrait of King Charles, to whom an angel in the clouds is extending a heavenly crown. In the lower right corner, a woman faints.

Endnotes

- Note 1:
Oliver Cromwell, the general primarily responsible for Parliament's victory in the English Civil War, returned from conquering Ireland in May 1650, about eighteen months after the execution of Charles I. The two events were persistently connected: Cromwell's "success" in Ireland was taken as a sign of God's favor to the new republican regime and to Cromwell as his chosen instrument. Pindaric odes (like Jonson's Cary-Morison ode, p. 1059) are heroic and ecstatic; Horatian odes are poems of cool and balanced judgment, as this one is in its representations of Cromwell, Charles I, and the issues of power and providence.
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Here as elsewhere there are allusions to Lucan's Pharsalia, a poem of civil war whose sympathies are with Pompey, Cato, and the Roman Republic against Caesar and the empire. The poem's allusions to Caesar are most often to Charles I, but sometimes to Cromwell.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Normally the stars are thought to control men's fates, but Cromwell presses his own star forward.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The "three-forked lightning" identifies him with Zeus, suggesting the elemental force by which he surpassed all those in his own party ("side") of radical Independents; the imagery of giving birth to himself also suggests going Caesar (born by cesarean section) one better.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Royal crowns were made of laurel because they were supposed to protect from lightning.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A pear-shaped orange (from the Turkish, "prince's pear").Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Nature abhors a vacuum, but even more, the penetration of one body's space by another body.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Charles was confined at Hampton Court after his defeat, as Parliament attempted to negotiate terms for his restoration. Cromwell was rumored to have connived at his escape to Carisbrooke Castle, on the Isle of Wight, in order to convince Parliament that he could not be trusted and must be executed. Cromwell has shown himself master of the two "arts" of rule defined by Machiavelli: namely, force and craft.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The theater metaphors used for Charles are even more powerful because the "tragic scaffold" was erected outside Whitehall, where so many royal masques were produced. See a depiction of the king's execution on p. 1283.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A play on the Latin acies, which means the edge of a sword or axe, a keen glance, and the vanguard of a battle. Compare the newsbook account of the king's execution, p. 1320.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Livy and Pliny record that the workmen digging the foundations for a temple of Jupiter at Rome uncovered a bloody head, which they were persuaded to take as an omen that Rome would be head (caput) of a great empire; the temple and the hill took the name Capitoline from that event.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Cromwell conducted a particularly brutal campaign in Ireland, and the Irish had no such testimonials for him; the lines are deeply equivocal.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The maxim about obedience fitting one to rule is a commonplace. The implications of "yet" and "still," along with the next stanza, suggest a Caesar figure who has not—but might—cross the Rubicon and defy the Republic, as Julius Caesar did.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Thus far, Cromwell gives the Republic credit for his victories.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: It was thought that Cromwell's military acumen might subdue France and Italy (which threatened to attack the new republic to restore Charles II), just as did Caesar and Hannibal of old. "Climacteric": a period of crucial, epochal change—here, the expectation that the example of a successful English republic would topple absolute monarchs abroad.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Early Scots were called Picts (from the Latin pictus, painted), because the warriors painted themselves many colors; contemporary Scots are "parti-colored" (divided into many factions) like a scotch plaid. Cromwell was about to go to subdue Scotland, which had declared for Charles II.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A sword carried with the blade upright evokes the classical tradition that underworld spirits (here, the slain king and his followers) are frightened off by raised weapons.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The maxim alludes to Machiavelli's advice that a kingdom won by force must for some time be maintained by force.Return to reference 9

To My Lord Fairfax

1

Within this sober frame expect
Work of no foreign architect,
That unto caves the quarries drew,
And forests did to pastures hew;
Who of his great design in pain
5 Did for a model vault his brain,<sup>2</sup>
Whose columns should so high be raised
To arch the brows that on them gazed.

Why should of all things man unrul'd
Such unproportioned dwellings build?
10 The beasts are by their dens expressed,
And birds contrive an equal nest;<sup>3</sup>
The low-roofed tortoises do dwell
In cases fit of tortoiseshell:
No creature loves an empty space;
15 Their bodies measure out their place.

3

But he, superfluously spread,
Demands more room alive than dead;
And in his hollow palace goes
Where winds as he themselves may lose.
20 What need of all this marble crust

T' impark the wanton mote of dust,
That thinks by breadth the world t' unite
Though the first builders<sup>4</sup> failed in height?

4

25 But all things are composèd here
Like nature, orderly and near:
In which we the dimensions find
Of what more sober age and mind,
When larger sizèd men did stoop
30 To enter at a narrow loop;
As practicing, in doors so strait,
To strain themselves through heaven's gate.

5

And surely when the after age
Shall hither come in pilgrimage,
These sacred places to adore,
35 By Vere and Fairfax trod before,
Men will dispute how their extent
Within such dwarfish confines went;
And some will smile at this as well
As Romulus his bee-like cell.<sup>5</sup>

6

Humility alone designs
Those short but admirable lines,
By which, ungirt and unconstrained,
Things greater are in less contained.
Let other vainly strive t'immure
45 The circle in the quadrature!<sup>6</sup>
These holy mathematics can
In ev'ry figure equal man.<sup>7</sup>

7

Yet thus the laden house does sweat,
And scarce endures the master great:
50 But where he comes the swelling hall
Stirs, and the square grows spherical;<sup>8</sup>
More by his magnitude distressed,
Than he is by its straitness pressed;
And too officiously<sup>o</sup> it slights
55 That in itself which him delights.

8

So honor better lowness bears,
Than that unwonted<sup>o</sup> greatness wears.
Height with a certain grace does bend,
But low things clownishly<sup>o</sup> ascend.
60 And yet what needs there here excuse,
Where ev'ry thing does answer use?
Where neatness nothing can condemn,
Nor pride invent<sup>o</sup> what to condemn?

9

A stately frontispiece of poor<sup>9</sup>
65 Adorns without the open door;
Nor less the rooms within commends
Daily new furniture of friends.
The house was built upon the place
Only as for a mark of grace;
70 And for an inn to entertain
Its lord a while, but not remain.<sup>1</sup>

10

Him Bishops-Hill, or Denton may,
Or Bilbrough, better hold than they;

75 But Nature here hath been so free
As if she said, Leave this to me.
Art would more neatly<sup>o</sup> have defaced
What she had laid so sweetly waste;
In fragrant gardens, shady woods,
80 Deep meadows, and transparent floods.

11

While with slow eyes we these survey,
And on each pleasant footstep stay,
We opportunely may relate
The progress of this house's fate.
A nunnery first gave it birth
85 For virgin buildings oft brought forth.
And all that neighbor-ruin shows
The quarries whence this dwelling rose.

12

Near to this gloomy cloister's gates
There dwelt the blooming virgin Thwaites<sup>2</sup>
90 Fair beyond measure, and an heir
Which might deformity make fair.
And oft she spent the summer suns
Discoursing with the subtle nuns.
Whence in these words one to her weaved
95 (As 'twere by chance) thoughts long conceived.

13

"Within this holy leisure we Live innocently as you see.
These walls restrain the world without,
But hedge<sup>o</sup> our liberty about.
100 These bars inclose that wider den

Of those wild creatures, callèd men;
The cloister outward shuts its gates,
And, from us, locks on them the grates.

14

105 "Here we, in shining armor white,<sup>o</sup>
Like virgin amazons do fight:
And our chaste lamps we hourly trim,
Lest the great bridegroom find them dim.<sup>3</sup>
Our orient<sup>o</sup> breaths perfumed are 110 With incense of incessant pray'r.
And holy water of our tears
Most strangely our complexion clears:

15

"Not tears of grief; but such as those
With which calm pleasure overflows;
Or pity, when we look on you
115 That live without this happy vow.
How should we grieve that must be seen
Each one a spouse, and each a queen;
And can in heaven hence behold
Our brighter robes and crowns of gold?
120

16

"When we have prayed all our beads,
Some one the holy legend<sup>o</sup> reads;
While all the rest with needles paint
The face and graces of the saint.
But what the linen can't receive
125 They in their lives do interweave.
This work the saints best represents;
That serves for altar's ornaments.

17

130 "But much it to our work would add
If here your hand, your face we had.
By it we would our Lady touch;<sup>4</sup>
Yet thus she you resembles much.
Some of your features, as we sewed,
Through every shrine should be bestowed:
135 And in one beauty we would take Enough a thousand saints to make.

18

"And (for I dare not quench the fire
That me does for your good inspire)
'Twere sacrilege a man t' admit
140 To holy things, for heaven fit.
I see the angels in a crown
On you the lilies show'ring down;
And round about you glory breaks,
That something more than human speaks.

19

145 "All beauty, when at such a height,
Is so already consecrate.
Fairfax I know; and long ere this
Have marked the youth, and what he is.
But can he such a rival seem
For whom you heav'n should disesteem?
150 Ah, no! and 'twould more honor prove
He your devoto<sup>o</sup> were, than love.

20

"Here live beloved, and obeyed,
Each one your sister, each your maid.

155 And, if our rule seem strictly penned,
The rule itself to you shall bend.
Our abbess too, now far in age,
Doth your succession near presage.
How soft the yoke on us would lie,
160 Might such fair hands as yours it tie!

21

"Your voice, the sweetest of the choir,
Shall draw heav'n nearer, raise us higher:
And your example, if our head,
Will soon us to perfection lead.
Those virtues to us all so dear,
165 Will straight<sup>o</sup> grow sanctity when here:
And that, once sprung, increase so fast
Till miracles it work at last.

22

"Nor is our order yet so nice,<sup>o</sup>
Delight to banish as a vice.
170 Here pleasure piety doth meet,
One perfecting the other sweet.
So through the mortal fruit we boil
The sugar's uncorrupting oil;
And that which perished while we pull,
175 Is thus preserved clear and full.

23

"For such indeed are all our arts;
Still handling nature's finest parts.
Flow'rs dress the altars; for the clothes,
The sea-born amber<sup>5</sup> we compose;
180 Balms for the grieved<sup>o</sup> we draw; and pastes

We mold, as baits for curious tastes.
What need is here of man? unless
These as sweet sins we should confess.

24

185 "Each night among us to your side
Appoint a fresh and virgin bride;
Whom if our Lord at midnight find,
Yet neither should be left behind.
Where you may lie as chaste in bed,
190 As pearls together billeted,
All night embracing arm in arm,
Like crystal pure with cotton warm.

25

"But what is this to all the store
Of joys you see, and may make more!
Try but a while, if you be wise:
195 The trial neither costs, nor ties."
Now Fairfax seek her promised faith: o
Religion that dispensed hath;
Which she henceforward does begin: 6
200 The nun's smooth tongue has sucked her in.

26

Oft, though he knew it was in vain,
Yet would he valiantly complain:
"Is this that sanctity so great,
An art by which you finelier cheat?
205 Hypocrite witches, hence avaunt,
Who though in prison yet enchant!
Death only can such thieves make fast,
As rob though in the dungeon cast.

27

“Were there but, when this house was made,
One stone that a just hand had laid,
210 It must have fall’n upon her head
Who first thee from thy faith misled.
And yet, how well soever meant,
With them ’twould soon grow fraudulent:
For like themselves they alter all,
215 And vice infects the very wall.

28

“But sure those buildings last not long,
Founded by folly, kept by wrong.
I know what fruit their gardens yield,
When they it think by night concealed.
220 Fly from their vices. ’Tis thy state,<sup>o</sup>
Not thee, that they would consecrate.
Fly from their ruin. How I fear
Though guiltless lest thou perish there!”

29

What should he do? He would respect
225 Religion, but not right neglect;
For first religion taught him right,
And dazzled not but cleared his sight.
Sometimes resolved his sword he draws,
But reverenceth then the laws:
230 For justice still that courage led;
First from a judge, then soldier bred.<sup>z</sup>

30

Small honor would be in the storm.<sup>o</sup>
The court him grants the lawful form;

235 Which licensed either peace or force,
To hinder the unjust divorce.
Yet still the nuns his right debarred,
Standing upon their holy guard.
Ill-counseled women, do you know
240 Whom you resist, or what you do?

31

Is not this he whose offspring fierce
Shall fight through all the universe;
And with successive valor try
France, Poland, either Germany;
245 Till one, as long since prophesied,
His horse through conquered Britain ride?
Yet, against fate, his spouse they kept,
And the great race would intercept.<sup>8</sup>

32

Some to the breach against their foes
Their wooden saints in vain oppose.
250 Another bolder stands at push
With their old holy-water brush.
While the disjointed<sup>o</sup> abbess threads
The jingling chain-shot<sup>9</sup> of her beads.
But their loud'st cannon were their lungs;
255 And sharpest weapons were their tongues.

33

But, waving these aside like flies,
Young Fairfax through the wall does rise.
Then th' unfrequented vault appeared,
And superstitions vainly feared.
260 The relics false were set to view;

Only the jewels there were true—
But truly bright and holy Thwaites
That weeping at the altar waits.

34

265 But the glad youth away her bears
And to the nuns bequeaths her tears:
Who guiltily their prize bemoan,
Like gypsies that a child had stol'n.
Thenceforth (as when th' enchantment ends
270 The castle vanishes or rends)
The wasting cloister with the rest
Was in one instant dispossessed.<sup>1</sup>

35

At the demolishing, this seat
To Fairfax fell as by escheat.<sup>2</sup>
275 And what both nuns and founders willed
'Tis likely better thus fulfilled:
For if the virgin proved not theirs,
The cloister yet remained hers;
Though many a nun there made her vow,
280 'Twas no religious house till now.

36

From that blest bed the hero came,
Whom France and Poland yet does fame;
Who, when retired here to peace,
His warlike studies could not cease;
285 But laid these gardens out in sport
In the just figure of a fort;
And with five bastions it did fence,
As aiming one for ev'ry sense.<sup>3</sup>

37

When in the east the morning ray
Hangs out the colors of the day,
290 The bee through these known alleys hums,
Beating the dian<sup>o</sup> with its drums.
Then flow'rs their drowsy eyelids raise,
Their silken ensigns each displays,
And dries its pan<sup>4</sup> yet dank with dew,
295 And fills its flask<sup>o</sup> with odors new.

38

These, as their governor goes by,
In fragrant volleys they let fly;
And to salute their governess
Again as great a charge they press:
300 None for the virgin nymph;<sup>5</sup> for she Seems with the flow'rs a flow'r to be.
And think so still! though not compare<sup>6</sup>
With breath so sweet, or cheek so fair.

39

Well shot ye firemen!<sup>o</sup> Oh how sweet, 305 And round your equal fires do meet;
Whose shrill report no ear can tell,
But echoes to the eye and smell.
See how the flow'rs, as at parade,
Under their colors stand displayed:
310 Each regiment in order grows,
That of the tulip, pink, and rose.

40

But when the vigilant patrol
Of stars walks round about the pole,

315 Their leaves, that to the stalks are curled,
Seem to their staves the ensigns furled.
Then in some flow'r's beloved hut
Each bee as sentinel is shut;
And sleeps so too: but, if once stirred,
320 She runs you through, nor asks the word.◊

41

Oh thou,◊ that dear and happy isle
The garden of the world ere while,
Thou paradise of four<sup>7</sup> seas,
Which heaven planted us to please,
But, to exclude the world, did guard
325 With wat'ry if not flaming sword;<sup>8</sup>
What luckless apple did we taste,
To make us mortal, and thee waste?

42

Unhappy! shall we never more
That sweet militia restore,
330 When gardens only had their tow'rs,
And all the garrisons were flow'rs;
When roses only arms might bear,
And men did rosy garlands wear?
Tulips, in several colors barred,
335 Were then the Switzers<sup>9</sup> of our guard.

43

The gardener had the soldier's place,
And his more gentle forts did trace.
The nursery of all things green
Was then the only magazine.
340 The winter quarters were the stoves◊

Where he the tender plants removes.
But war all this doth overgrow;
We ordnance plant, and powder sow.

44

345 And yet there walks one on the sod
Who, had it pleased him and God,
Might once have made our gardens spring
Fresh as his own and flourishing.
But he preferred to the Cinque Ports<sup>1</sup>
These five imaginary forts;
350 And, in those half-dry trenches, spanned<sup>o</sup>
Pow'r which the ocean might command.

45

For he did, with his utmost skill,
Ambition weed, but conscience till.
Conscience, that heaven-nursèd plant,
355 Which most our earthly gardens want.<sup>o</sup>
A prickling leaf it bears, and such
As that which shrinks at every touch;
But flow'rs eternal, and divine,
That in the crowns of saints do shine.
360

46

The sight does from these bastions ply
Th' invisible artillery;
And at proud Cawood Castle<sup>2</sup> seems
To point the batt'ry of its beams,
As if it quarreled in<sup>o</sup> the seat
365 Th' ambition of its prelate great;
But o'er the meads below it plays,
Or innocently seems to gaze.

47

And now to the abyss I pass
Of that unfathomable grass,
370 Where men like grasshoppers appear,
But grasshoppers are giants<sup>3</sup> there:
They, in their squeaking laugh, contemn
Us as we walk more low than them:
And, from the precipices tall
375 Of the green spires, to us do call.

48

To see men through this meadow dive,
We wonder how they rise alive;
As, underwater, none does know
Whether he fall through it or go;<sup>o</sup>
380 But as the mariners that sound
And show upon their lead the ground,<sup>4</sup>
They bring up flow'rs so to be seen,
And prove they've at the bottom been.

49

No scene<sup>o</sup> that turns with engines strange
385 Does oft'ner than these meadows change:
For when the sun the grass hath vexed,
The tawny mowers enter next;
Who seem like Israelites to be
Walking on foot through a green sea.
390 To them the grassy deeps divide
And crowd a lane to either side.<sup>5</sup>

50

With whistling scythe and elbow strong,
These massacre the grass along:

395 While one, unknowing, carves the rail,<sup>6</sup>
Whose yet unfeathered quills her fail.
The edge all bloody from its breast
He draws, and does his stroke detest;
Fearing the flesh untimely mowed
400 To him a fate as black forebode.

51

But bloody Thestylis<sup>7</sup> that waits
To bring the mowing camp their cates,<sup>8</sup>
Greedy as kites<sup>9</sup> has trussed it up,
And forthwith means on it to sup;
405 When on another quick she lights,
And cries, he<sup>8</sup> called us Israelites;
But now, to make his saying true,
Rails rain for quails, for manna dew.<sup>9</sup>

52

Unhappy birds! what does it boot<sup>8</sup>
410 To build below the grasses' root,
When lowness is unsafe as height,
And chance o'ertakes what scapeth spite?
And now your orphan parents' call
Sounds your untimely funeral.
415 Death-trumpets creak in such a note,
And 'tis the sourdine<sup>1</sup> in their throat.

53

Or<sup>8</sup> sooner hatch or higher build:
The mower now commands the field;
In whose new traverse<sup>8</sup> seemeth wrought
420 A camp of battle newly fought:
Where, as the meads with hay, the plain

Lies quilted o'er with bodies slain;
The women that with forks it fling,
Do represent the pillaging.

54

425 And now the careless victors play,
Dancing the triumphs of the hay;<sup>2</sup>
Where every mower's wholesome heat
Smells like an Alexander's sweat,<sup>3</sup>
Their females fragrant as the mead
Which they in fairy circles tread:
430 When at their dance's end they kiss,
Their new-made hay not sweeter is.

55

When after this 'tis piled in cocks,<sup>o</sup>
Like a calm sea it shows the rocks:
We wond'ring in the river near 435 How boats among them safely steer.
Or, like the desert Memphis<sup>4</sup> sand,
Short pyramids of hay do stand.
And such the Roman camps do rise<sup>5</sup>
440 In hills for soldiers' obsequies.

56

This scene<sup>o</sup> again withdrawing brings
A new and empty face of things;
A leveled space, as smooth and plain,
As cloths for Lely<sup>6</sup> stretched to stain.
The world when first created sure
445 Was such a table rase<sup>7</sup> and pure;
Or rather such is the toril
Ere the bulls enter at Madril.<sup>8</sup>

57

For to this naked equal flat,
Which Levellers<sup>9</sup> take pattern at,
450 The villagers in common<sup>o</sup> chase
Their cattle, which it closer rase;<sup>o</sup>
And what below the scythe increased<sup>o</sup>
Is pinched yet nearer by the beast.
Such, in the painted world, appeared,
455 Davenant with th' universal herd.<sup>1</sup>

58

They seem within the polished grass
A landscape drawn in looking glass;
And shrunk in the huge pasture show
460 As spots, so shaped, on faces do.<sup>2</sup>
Such fleas, ere they approach the eye,
In multiplying<sup>o</sup> glasses lie.
They feed so wide, so slowly move,
As constellations do above.

59

Then, to conclude these pleasant acts,
465 Denton sets ope' its cataracts;<sup>3</sup>
And makes the meadow truly be (What it but seemed before) a sea.
For, jealous of its lord's long stay,
It tries t' invite him thus away.
470 The river in itself is drowned
And isles th' astonished cattle round.

60

Let others tell the paradox,
How eels now bellow in the ox;<sup>4</sup>

475 How horses at their tails do kick,
Turned as they hang to leeches quick;<sup>5</sup>
How boats can over bridges sail,
And fishes do the stables scale;
How salmons trespassing are found,
480 And pikes are taken in the pound.<sup>o</sup>

61

But I, retiring from the flood,
Take sanctuary in the wood;
And, while it lasts, myself embark
In this yet green, yet growing ark;
485 Where the first carpenter<sup>6</sup> might best
Fit timber for his keel have pressed;<sup>o</sup>
And where all creatures might have shares,
Although in armies, not in pairs.

62

The double wood of ancient stocks
490 Linked in so thick an union locks,
It like two pedigrees<sup>7</sup> appears,
On one hand Fairfax, th' other Vere's:
Of whom though many fell in war,
Yet more to heaven shooting are:
495 And, as they nature's cradle decked,
Will in green age her hearse expect.

63

When first the eye this forest sees
It seems indeed as wood not trees;
As if their neighborhood<sup>o</sup> so old
500 To one great trunk them all did mold.
There the huge bulk takes place, as meant

To thrust up a fifth element;<sup>8</sup>
And stretches still so closely wedged
As if the night within were hedged.

64

505 Dark all without it knits; within
It opens passable and thin;
And in as loose an order grows
As the Corinthian<sup>9</sup> porticoes.
The arching boughs unite between 510 The columns of the temple green;
And underneath the winged choirs
Echo about their tuned fires.

65

The nightingale does here make choice
To sing the trials of her voice.
515 Low shrubs she sits in, and adorns
With music high the squatted thorns.
But highest oaks stoop down to hear,
And list'ning elders prick the ear.
The thorn, lest it should hurt her, draws
520 Within the skin its shrunken claws.

66

But I have for my music found
A sadder, yet more pleasing sound:
The stock doves,<sup>o</sup> whose fair necks are graced
With nuptial rings, their ensigns chaste;
525 Yet always, for some cause unknown,
Sad pair, unto the elms they moan.
O why should such a couple mourn,
That in so equal flames do burn!

67

Then as I careless on the bed
Of gelid strawberries do tread,
530 And through the hazels thick espy
The hatching throstle's shining eye,
The heron from the ash's top
The eldest of its young lets drop,
535 As if it stork-like<sup>1</sup> did pretend
That tribute to its lord to send.

68

But most the hewel's<sup>o</sup> wonders are,
Who here has the holtfelster's<sup>o</sup> care.
He walks still upright from the root,
540 Meas'ring the timber with his foot;
And all the way, to keep it clean,
Doth from the bark the wood-moths glean.
He, with his beak, examines well
Which fit to stand and which to fell.

69

The good he numbers up, and hacks;
545 As if he marked them with the ax.
But where he, tinkling with his beak,
Does find the hollow oak<sup>2</sup> to speak,
That for his building he designs,
And through the tainted side he mines.
550 Who could have thought the tallest oak
Should fall by such a feeble stroke!

70

Nor would it, had the tree not fed
A traitor-worm, within it bred.

555 (As first our flesh corrupt within Tempts impotent and bashful sin)
And yet that worm triumphs not long,
But serves to feed the hewel's young;
While the oak seems to fall content,
560 Viewing the treason's punishment.

71

Thus I, easy philosopher,
Among the birds and trees confer;
And little now to make me, wants<sup>o</sup>
Or<sup>o</sup> of the fowls, or of the plants.
565 Give me but wings as they, and I
Straight floating on the air shall fly:
Or turn me but, and you shall see
I was but an inverted tree.<sup>3</sup>

72

Already I begin to call
In their most learned original:
570 And where I language want, my signs
The bird upon the bough divines;
And more attentive there doth sit
Than if she were with lime<sup>4</sup> twigs knit.
No leaf does tremble in the wind
575 Which I returning cannot find.

73

Out of these scattered Sibyl's leaves
Strange prophecies my fancy weaves:<sup>5</sup>
And in one history consumes,
580 Like Mexique paintings, all the plumes.<sup>o</sup>
What Rome, Greece, Palestine, ere said

I in this light Mosaic<sup>6</sup> read.
Thrice happy he who, not mistook,
Hath read in nature's mystic book.<sup>7</sup>

74

585 And see how chance's better wit
Could with a mask<sup>8</sup> my studies hit!
The oak-leaves me embroider all,
Between which caterpillars crawl;
And ivy, with familiar trails,
590 Me licks, and clasps, and curls, and hales.
Under this antic cope<sup>9</sup> I move
Like some great prelate of the grove.

75

Then, languishing with ease, I toss
On pallets swol'n of velvet moss;
595 While the wind, cooling through the boughs,
Flatters with air my panting brows.
Thanks for my rest, ye mossy banks,
And unto you, cool zephyrs,<sup>o</sup> thanks,
Who, as my hair, my thoughts too shed,<sup>o</sup>
600 And winnow from the chaff my head.

76

How safe, methinks, and strong, behind
These trees have I encamped my mind;
Where beauty, aiming at the heart,
Bends in some tree its useless<sup>o</sup> dart;
605 And where the world no certain shot
Can make, or me it toucheth not.
But I on it securely play,
And gall its horsemen all the day.

77

Bind me ye woodbines in your twines,
Curl me about ye gadding vines,
610 And O so close your circles lace,
That I may never leave this place:
But, lest your fetters prove too weak,
Ere I your silken bondage break,
Do you, O brambles, chain me too,
615 And courteous briars, nail me through.<sup>1</sup>

78

Here in the morning tie my chain,
Where the two woods have made a lane;
While, like a guard on either side,
The trees before their lord divide;
620 This, like a long and equal thread,
Betwixt two labyrinths does lead.
But, where the floods did lately drown,
There at the evening stake me down.

79

For now the waves are fall'n and dried,
625 And now the meadows fresher dyed;
Whose grass, with moister color dashed,
Seems as green silks but newly washed.
No serpent new nor crocodile
Remains behind our little Nile;<sup>2</sup>
630 Unless itself you will mistake,
Among these meads<sup>o</sup> the only snake.

80

See in what wanton harmless folds
It ev'rywhere the meadow holds;

635 And its yet muddy back doth lick,
Till as a crystal mirror slick;<sup>o</sup>
Where all things gaze themselves, and doubt
If they be in it or without.
And for his shade<sup>o</sup> which therein shines,
640 Narcissus-like, the sun too pines.<sup>3</sup>

81

Oh what a pleasure 'tis to hedge
My temples here with heavy sedge;
Abandoning my lazy side,
Stretched as a bank unto the tide;
645 Or to suspend my sliding foot
On th' osier's undermined root,
And in its branches tough to hang,
While at my lines the fishes twang!

82

But now away my hooks, my quills,<sup>o</sup>
And angles, idle utensils.
650 The young Maria walks tonight:
Hide trifling youth thy pleasures slight.
'Twere shame that such judicious eyes
Should with such toys a man surprise;
She that already is the law
655 Of all her sex, her age's awe.

83

See how loose nature, in respect
To her, itself doth recollect;
And everything so whisht<sup>o</sup> and fine,
Starts forthwith to its bonne mine.<sup>o</sup>
660 The sun himself, of her aware,

Seems to descend with greater care;
And lest she see him go to bed,
In blushing clouds conceals his head.

84

665 So when the shadows laid asleep
From underneath these banks do creep,
And on the river as it flows
With ebon shuts<sup>o</sup> begin to close;
The modest halcyon<sup>4</sup> comes in sight,
670 Flying betwixt the day and night;
And such an horror calm and dumb,
Admiring nature does benumb.

85

The viscous<sup>o</sup> air, wheresoe'r she fly,
Follows and sucks her azure dye;
The jellying stream compacts<sup>o</sup> below,
675 If it might fix her shadow so;
The stupid<sup>o</sup> fishes hang, as plain
As flies in crystal overta'en;
And men the silent scene assist,<sup>o</sup>
680 Charmed with the sapphire-wingèd mist.<sup>5</sup>

86

Maria such, and so<sup>o</sup> doth hush
The world, and through the ev'ning rush.
No newborn comet such a train
Draws through the sky, nor star new-slain.<sup>6</sup>
685 For straight those giddy rockets<sup>7</sup> fail,
Which from the putrid earth exhale,
But by her flames, in heaven tried,
Nature is wholly vitrified.<sup>o</sup>

87

'Tis she that to these gardens gave
That wondrous beauty which they have;
690 She straightness on the woods bestows;
To her the meadow sweetness owes;
Nothing could make the river be
So crystal-pure but only she;
695 She yet more pure, sweet, straight, and fair,
Than gardens, woods, meads, rivers are.

88

Therefore what first she on them spent,
They gratefully again present:
The meadow, carpets where to tread;
The garden, flow'rs to crown her head;
700 And for a glass, the limpid brook,
Where she may all her beauties look;
But, since she would not have them seen,
The wood about her draws a screen.

89

For she, to higher beauties raised,
705 Disdains to be for lesser praised.
She counts her beauty to converse
In all the languages as hers;
Nor yet in those herself employs
But for the wisdom, not the noise;
710 Nor yet that wisdom would affect,
But as 'tis heaven's dialect.

90

Blest nymph! that couldst so soon prevent
Those trains<sup>o</sup> by youth against thee meant:

715 Tears (wat'ry shot that pierce the mind)
And sighs (love's cannon charged with wind)
True praise (that breaks through all defense)
And feigned complying innocence;
But knowing where this ambush lay,
720 She scaped the safe, but roughest way.

91

This 'tis to have been from the first
In a domestic heaven nursed,
Under the discipline severe
Of Fairfax, and the starry Vere;
725 Where not one object can come nigh
But pure, and spotless as the eye;
And goodness doth itself entail
On females, if there want a male.<sup>8</sup>

92

Go now fond<sup>o</sup> sex that on your face
Do all your useless study place,
730 Nor once at vice your brows dare knit
Lest the smooth forehead wrinkled sit;
Yet your own face shall at you grin,
Thorough<sup>o</sup> the black-bag<sup>o</sup> of your skin;
735 When knowledge only could have filled
And virtue all those furrows tilled.

93

Hence she with graces more divine
Supplies beyond her sex the line;
And, like a sprig of mistletoe,
On the Fairfacian oak doth grow;
740 Whence, for some universal good,

The priest shall cut the sacred bud;<sup>9</sup>
While her glad parents most rejoice,
And make their destiny their choice.

94

745 Meantime ye fields, springs, bushes, flow'rs,
Where yet she leads her studious hours
(Till fate her worthily translates,
And find a Fairfax for our Thwaites),
Employ the means you have by her,
750 And in your kind yourselves prefer;<sup>1</sup>
That, as all virgins she precedes,
So you all woods, streams, gardens, meads.

95

For you Thessalian Tempe's<sup>2</sup> seat
Shall now be scorned as obsolete;
Aranjuez, as less, disdained;
755 The Bel-Retiro<sup>3</sup> as constrained;
But name not the Idalian grove,<sup>4</sup>
For 'twas the seat of wanton Love;
Much less the dead's Elysian Fields,<sup>5</sup>
760 Yet nor to them your beauty yields.

96

'Tis not, what once it was, the world,
But a rude heap together hurled;
All negligently overthrown,
Gulfs, deserts, precipices, stone.
Your lesser world<sup>6</sup> contains the same,
765 But in more decent order tame;
You heaven's center, nature's lap,
And paradise's only map.

But now the salmon-fishers moist
 Their leathern boats begin to hoist;
 770 And, like antipodes in shoes,
 Have shod their heads in their canoes.<sup>7</sup>
 How tortoise-like, but not so slow,
 These rational amphibii<sup>8</sup> go!
 775 Let's in; for the dark hemisphere
 Does now like one of them appear.

1681

- Note 1: From 1651 to 1653, Marvell served as tutor to Mary Fairfax, daughter of Ann Vere and Thomas Fairfax, commander in chief of the parliamentary army throughout the civil wars. Fairfax opposed the regicide and in 1650 resigned his command rather than lead a preemptive strike against Scotland (which had declared for Charles II). Cromwell took over as Fairfax retired to his country estates in Yorkshire, especially Nunappleton, a comparatively simple brick structure on the site of a former Cistercian priory dissolved by Henry VIII along with all monasteries in 1542. The poem makes the house and its history figure the progress of the Reformation and the recent civil wars, played off against the Fall, the conflicts of the Israelites in the wilderness, and other biblical moments. The poem is structured as a journey around the estate, intersected by a long passage of family history. It was apparently written in the summer of 1651, when Mary Fairfax was twelve. # Crisis of Authority

Most of the poets and prose writers who published in the civil war decades, 1640 to 1660, registered in some way their responses to the conflicts swirling about them. The war and the issues over which it was fought shadow the poetry of Vaughan, Herrick, Hutchinson, Lovelace, Suckling, Marvell, and Milton and the prose of Thomas Browne and Izaak Walton. Yet writers often addressed the conflict only obliquely. When Marvell or Herrick celebrates peaceful gardens or fruitful countryside, when Vaughan envisions eternity as a “great ring of pure and endless light” suspended above all mortal turmoil, when Walton rhapsodizes about fishing, they create refuges of the imagination that might partially compensate for the trauma of war. Other writers confronted the issues of the age more straightforwardly. The readings included in this section sample this more explicitly political writing. They exemplify some of the genres encouraged by the new conditions in which literary materials could be written and circulated.

With the restoration of Charles II in 1660, many of the radical voices of the 1640s and 1650s were muted. Yet the war decades left a lasting imprint upon English literature. They established a tradition of overtly political, often ambitiously literary writing without which it is hard to imagine the works of such authors as John Dryden, Jonathan Swift, and Alexander Pope. They established prose as a dominant literary medium, especially for the description and analysis of everyday life. They initiated a tradition of apparently ordinary people bearing witness in writing to extraordinary events: a vital precedent for the rise of the novel.

This section presents examples of several kinds of writing that flourished during the Civil War and its immediate aftermath: the printed petition; the journalistic reporting of current events; political theory; and descriptions of contemporary history, personal experience, and individual character. These excerpts demonstrate a variety of ways in which writers responded to the disturbing and exciting developments around them: by reporting the details of dramatic, unprecedented occurrences; by analyzing the political and social problems posed by the conflict; by ruminating upon the character of great men; by seizing new opportunities for autobiographical reflection.

PETITIONING

A TRUE COPY OF THE PETITION OF GENTLEWOMEN AND TRADESMEN'S WIVES

Petitions—requests or demands signed by a number of people and presented to a governing authority—were always a fact of English political life. But in the crises leading up to and during the English Civil Wars and Commonwealth, petitions, particularly those addressed to Parliament, took on new life, expressing and manifesting the public demand for a greater role in political decision making and helping to pave the way for a more representative government. The “Root and Branch Petition,” which called for the abolition of bishops in all “roots” and “branches” of English life, including Parliament, was purportedly signed by 15,000 subscribers and presented to Parliament in December 1640 by 1,500 people. Most petitions from the period do not survive, but some, including the one below, were printed as stand-alone publications or in newsbooks.

The Parliament of Women. Satirical pamphlets like this one responded directly to the increased participation of women in political life in the 1640s.

While still a minority among petitioners, women petitioned Parliament on matters of trade, war, religion, and government. A True Copy of the Petition of the Gentlewomen and Tradesmen's Wives in and about the City of London, dated February 5, 1641 (1642 in the Julian calendar), articulates a number of reasons why women ought to petition "as well as the men": they share in the "common calamities" that affect church and commonwealth; they are equal sharers in Christian salvation; they are punished for their political actions; and there are biblical precedents for women's political activism. Like Aemilia Lanyer and Hester Pulter, the women petitioners marshal the example of Queen Esther, who, aided by the collective action of women, saved her people from a tyrannical king. In the King James Version of the book of Esther, King Ahasuerus even describes Esther's request as a petition. "What is thy petition?" he asks her, "and it shall be granted thee" (Esther 5:6). While later women petitioners were described as Medusa, Hecuba, "Whores, Bawds, Oyster-women," and "Lacedemonians or bold Amazons," their voices were nonetheless heard loud and clear.

of February, 1641. Together with their several reasons why

With lowest submission showing,

That we also with all thankful humility acknowledging the unwearied pains, care, and great charge, besides hazard of health and life, which you the noble worthies<sup>1</sup> of this honorable and renowned assembly have undergone, for safety both of Church and Commonwealth, for a long time already past; for which not only we your humble petitioners, and all well affected in this kingdom, but also all other good Christians are bound now and at all times to acknowledge; yet notwithstanding that many worthy deeds have been done by you, great danger and fear do still attend us, and will, as long as popish lords and superstitious bishops are suffered to have their voice in the House of Peers,<sup>2</sup> and that accursed and abominable idol of the mass suffered in the kingdom, and that arch-enemy<sup>3</sup> of our prosperity and reformation lie in the tower, yet not receiving his deserved punishment.

All these under correction, gives us great cause to suspect that God is angry with us, and to be the chief causes why your pious endeavors for a further reformation proceed not with that success as you desire, and is most earnestly prayed for of all that wish well to true religion and the flourishing estate both of king and kingdom; the insolencies of the papists and their abettors raise a just fear and suspicion of sowing sedition, and breaking out into bloody persecution in this kingdom, as they have done in Ireland,<sup>4</sup> the thoughts of which sad and barbarous events make our tender hearts to melt within us, forcing us humbly to petition to this honorable assembly to make safe provision for yourselves and us before it be too late.

And whereas we, whose hearts have joined cheerfully with all those petitions which have been exhibited unto you in the behalf of the purity of religion, and the liberty of our husbands' persons and estates, recounting ourselves to have an interest in the common privileges with them, do with the same confidence assure ourselves to find the same gracious acceptance with you for easing of those grievances, which in regard of our frail condition, do more nearly concern us, and do deeply terrify our souls: our domestical dangers with which this kingdom is so much distracted, especially growing on us from those treacherous and wicked attempts already are such, as we find ourselves to have as deep a share as any other.

We cannot but tremble at the very thoughts of the horrid and hideous facts which modesty forbids us now to name, occasioned by the bloody wars in Germany,<sup>5</sup> his Majesty's late northern army,<sup>6</sup> how often did it affright our hearts, whilst their violence began to break out so furiously upon the persons of those whose husbands or parents were not able to rescue: we wish we had no cause to speak of those insolencies, and savage usage and unheard of rapes, exercised upon our sex in Ireland,<sup>7</sup> and have we not just cause to fear they will prove the forerunners of our ruin, except almighty God by the wisdom and care of this parliament be pleased to succor us, our husbands and children, which are as dear and tender unto us as the lives and blood of our hearts, to see them murdered and mangled and cut in pieces before our eyes, to see our children dashed against the stones, and the mothers' milk mingled with the infants' blood, running down the streets; to see our houses on flaming fire over our heads: oh how dreadful would this be! We thought it misery enough (though nothing to that we have just cause to fear) but few years since for some of our sex, by unjust divisions from their bosom comforts, to be rendered in a manner widows, and the children fatherless, husbands were imprisoned from the society of their wives, even against the laws of God and nature, and little infants suffered in their fathers' banishments: thousands of our dearest friends have been compelled to fly from Episcopal persecutions<sup>8</sup> into desert places amongst wild beasts, there finding more favor then in their native soil, and in the midst of all the sorrows, such hath the pity of the prelates been, that our cries could never enter into their ears or hearts, nor yet through multitudes of obstructions could never have access or come nigh to those royal mercies of our most gracious sovereign, which we confidently hope, would have relieved us: but after all these pressures ended, we humbly signify that our present fears are that unless the blood-thirsty faction of the papists and prelates be hindered in their designs, ourselves here in England as well as they in Ireland shall be exposed to that misery which is more intolerable than that which is already past, as namely to the rage not of men alone, but of devils incarnate (as we may so say), besides the thraldom of our souls and consciences in matters concerning God, which of all things are most dear unto us.

Now the remembrance of all these fearful accidents aforementioned do strongly move us from the example of the woman of Tekoa to fall submissively at the feet of his Majesty,<sup>9</sup> our dread sovereign, and cry help, O king, help O ye the noble worthies now sitting in parliament: And we humbly beseech you, that you will be a means to his Majesty and the House of Peers, that they will be pleased to take our heartbreaking grievances into timely consideration, and to add strength and encouragement to your noble endeavors, and further that you would move his Majesty with our humble requests that he would be graciously pleased according to the example of the good King Asa,<sup>1</sup> to purge both the court and kingdom of that great idolatrous service of the mass, which is tolerated in the Queen's court,<sup>2</sup> this sin (as we conceive) is able to draw down a greater curse upon the whole kingdom than all your noble and pious endeavors can prevent, which was the cause that the good and pious King Asa would not suffer idolatry in his own mother, whose example if it shall please his Majesty's gracious goodness to follow in putting down popery and idolatry both in great and small, in court and in the kingdom throughout, to subdue the papists and their abettors, and by taking away the power of the prelates, whose government by long and woeful experience we have found to be against the liberty of our conscience and the freedom of the gospel and the sincere profession and practice thereof, then shall our fears be removed, and we may expect that God will power down his blessings in abundance both upon his Majesty and upon this honorable assembly, and upon the whole land.

For which your new petitioners shall pray affectionately.

The reasons follow.

It may be thought strange and unbeseeming our sex to show ourselves by way of petition to this honorable assembly: but the matter being rightly considered, of the right and interest we have in the common and public cause of the church, it will as we conceive (under correction) be found a duty commanded and required.

First, because Christ has purchased us at as dear a rate as he has done men, and therefore requires the like obedience for the same mercy as of men.

Secondly, because in the free enjoining of Christ in his own laws and a flourishing estate of the church and commonwealth consists the happiness of women as well as men.

Thirdly, because women are sharers in the common calamities that accompany both church and commonwealth when oppression is exercised over the church or kingdom wherein they live; and an unlimited power has been given to prelates to exercise authority over the consciences of women, as well as men; witness Newgate, Smithfield, and other places of persecution, wherein women as well as men have felt the smart of their fury.

Neither are we left without example in Scripture, for when the state of the church in the time of King Ahasuerus<sup>3</sup> was by the bloody enemies thereof sought to be utterly destroyed, we find that Esther the Queen and her maids fasted and prayed, and that Esther petitioned to the king in the behalf of the church: and though she enterprised this duty with the hazard of her own life, being contrary to the law to appear before the king before she were sent for, yet her love to the church carried her through all difficulties to the performance of that duty.

On which grounds we are emboldened to present our humble petition unto this honorable assembly, not weighing the reproaches which may and are by many cast upon us, who (not well weighing the premises) scoff and deride our good intent. We do it not out of any self conceit, or pride of heart, as seeking to equal ourselves with men, either in authority or wisdom, but according to our places to discharge that duty we owe to God, and the cause of the church, as far as lie in us, following herein the example of the men which have gone in this duty before us.

A relation of the manner how it was delivered, with their Answer, sent by Mr. Pym.<sup>4</sup>

The petition with their reasons was delivered the fourth of Feb. 1641 by Mrs. Anne Stagg, a gentlewoman and brewer's wife, and many others with her of like rank and quality, which when they had delivered it, after some time spent in reading of it, the honorable assembly sent them an answer by Mr. Pym, which was performed in this manner.

Mr. Pym came to the commons door, and called for the women, and spake unto them in these words: Good women, your petition and the reasons have been read in the house, and is very thankfully accepted of, and is come in a seasonable time. You shall (God willing) receive from us all the satisfaction which we can possibly give to your just and lawful desires. We entreat you to repair to your houses, and turn your petition which you have delivered here into prayers at home for us; for we have been, are, and shall be (to our utmost power) ready to relieve you, your husbands, and children, and to perform the trust committed unto us, towards God, our king and country, as becometh faithful Christians and loyal subjects.

REPORTING THE NEWS

The following accounts of the king's trial and execution are excerpted from newsbooks, one of the most important new literary forms of the war years. In England the reportage of current events originated in the 1620s, when anxiety over the nation's entanglement in what would become the Thirty Years' War on the Continent generated a demand for international news. In addition, in the 1620s and 1630s a few enterprising individuals provided "corantos," handwritten reports of court goings-on, to wealthy individuals in the provinces; these were technically considered private letters, although they sometimes circulated to several hundred paid subscribers. Yet even these modest ventures were always on legally shaky ground. The printing of domestic news, or commentary on it, was strictly prohibited by Charles I, as it had been by his forebears.

In the early 1640s, censorship collapsed just when many people urgently wanted information about the momentous events transpiring in England, Scotland, and Ireland. The result was the explosive development of printed news. While in 1640 there were no newsbooks, by 1645 there were 755. Their format varied, but typically they were eight-page cheaply printed pamphlets, issued weekly. Most writers and compilers remained anonymous, though in some cases the identity of the authors was an open secret. Unlike the earlier corantos, the inexpensive newsbooks of the 1640s gave a broad spectrum of readers access to information about current events. Often, simultaneously, they propagandized on behalf of various parties to the developing conflict. The newsbooks thus encouraged an unprecedentedly wide and deep sense of civic involvement, and arguably also had the effect of hardening factional differences.

The newsbooks provided eyewitness, or what purported to be eyewitness, accounts of the king's trial and execution very shortly after they occurred. Both events were highly charged, with important and complex stakes on both sides. In the autumn of 1648, many in Parliament who had initially wanted to restrict the king's powers hesitated to remove him from the throne; they favored a negotiated end to hostilities. Yet the powerful leaders of the New Model Army, including Oliver Cromwell, were convinced that Charles was a threat to a reorganized commonwealth. Even if the king dealt with his opponents in good faith, which they doubted, he would be a constant rallying point for opposition to their policies. Conceivably, the war would never be over.

When Charles seemed to be planning to escape from his relatively light confinement on the Isle of Wight, the army council ordered him seized and brought to London, which the army occupied. Yet what were they to do with their captive? Simply to assassinate him would deprive his killers of any semblance of legitimacy. A formal trial, therefore, seemed necessary; but it was not easy to achieve. First, Parliament had to be purged of more than half its members, who disapproved of putting the king on trial. Once reconstituted so as to exclude opposition, Parliament then had to pass a law redefining treason as a crime against the state, not a crime against the king, of which the king himself could not logically have been guilty.

As in the case of most treason trials in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, a guilty verdict was a foregone conclusion. Yet the trial's value as propaganda was unpredictable. The judges and executioners pointedly assumed the regalia and symbolism of state power, and conducted both the trial and the execution with great punctiliousness, in order to bolster the impression of due process in the eyes of onlookers and newsbook readers. Charles's calmly defiant behavior, meanwhile, was not meant to secure his acquittal, which everyone knew would have been unforthcoming anyhow. Rather, he hoped to garner sympathy for his plight, to demonstrate publicly his unwavering adherence to his own principles, and to provoke prosecutors and judges into behaving like rabid zealots. Likewise, his conduct on the scaffold impressed even those who deplored his political position. While his judges and executioners strove to describe him as an overweening tyrant, Charles struggled to appear the heir to a Christian tradition of suffering innocence, a "martyr of the people." In 1660, as soon as the monarchy was restored, Charles I was canonized by the Church of England.

[THE TRIAL OF KING CHARLES I, THE FIRST DAY]

At the high court of justice sitting in the Great Hall of Westminster, Sergeant Bradshaw President,<sup>1</sup> about 70 Members present. Oyez<sup>2</sup> made thrice, silence commanded. The president had the sword and mace carried before him, attended with Colonel Fox, and twenty other officers and gentlemen with partisans.<sup>3</sup> The act of the Commons in Parliament for trial of the king, read. After the court was called, and each member rising up as he was called. The king came into the court, his hat on, and the Commissioners with theirs on also; no congratulation or motion of hats at all.<sup>4</sup> The Sergeant ushered him in with the mace, Colonel Hacker<sup>5</sup> and about thirty officers and gentlemen more came as his guard; the president then spake in these words, viz.

“Charles Stuart, King of England, the Commons of England assembled in Parliament being sensible of the great calamities that have been brought upon this nation, of the innocent blood that hath been shed in this nation, which is referred<sup>6</sup> to you, as the author of it; and according to that duty which they owe to God, to the nation, and themselves, and according to that fundamental power and trust that is reposed in them by the people, have constituted this high court of justice before which you are now brought; and you are to hear the charge upon which the court will proceed.”

Mr. Cook Solicitor General.<sup>7</sup> “My lord, in behalf of the Commons of England, and of all the people thereof, I do accuse Charles Stuart, here present, of high treason and high misdemeanors, and I do in the name of the Commons of England desire that the charge may be read unto him.”

King. "Hold a little"—tapping the solicitor general twice on the shoulder with his cane, which drawing towards him again, the head thereon fell off, he stooping for it, put it presently<sup>8</sup> into his pocket. This is conceived will be very ominous.

Lord President. "Sir, the court commands the charge to be read; if you have any thing to say after, you may be heard."

The charge was read.

The king smiled often during the time, especially at those words therein, viz that Charles Stuart was a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy of the commonwealth.

Lord President. "Sir, you have now heard your charge read, containing such matter as appears in it: you find that in the close of it, it is prayed to the court in the behalf of all the Commons of England, that you answer to your charge. The court expects your answer."

King. "I would know by what power I am called hither. I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight; how I came hither is a larger story then I think is fit at this time for me to speak of: But there I entered into a treaty with the two Houses of Parliament, with as much public faith as is possibly to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honorable lords and gentlemen, and treated honestly and uprightly. I cannot say but they did deal very nobly with me. We were upon conclusion of a treaty. Now I would know by what authority—I mean lawful; there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the highways—but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place; and when I know by what lawful authority, I shall answer.

"Remember, I am your king, your lawful king; and what sin you bring upon your heads, and the judgments of God upon this land, think well upon it; I say think well upon it before you go further, from one sin to a greater.<sup>9</sup> Therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here, and I shall not be unwilling to answer. In the meantime, I shall not betray my trust. I have a trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful descent. I will not betray it, to answer to a new and unlawful authority. Therefore resolve me that, and you shall hear more of me."

Lord President. "If you had been pleased to have observed what was hinted to you by the court at our first coming hither, you would have known by what authority; which authority requires you in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected king, to answer them."

King. "No sir, I deny that."

Lord President. "If you acknowledge not the authority of the court, they must proceed."

King. "I do tell you so, England was never an elective kingdom, but an hereditary kingdom, for near a thousand years; therefore let me know by what authority I am called hither. I do stand more for the liberty of my people than any here that come to be my pretended judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here, and I will answer it; otherwise I will not answer it."

Lord President told him he did interrogate the court, which beseeemed not one in his condition, and it was known how he had managed his trust.

* * *

King. "I desire that you would give me, and all the world, satisfaction in this. For let me tell you, it is not a slight thing you are about. I am sworn to keep the peace by the duty I owe to God and my country; and I will do it to the last breath of my body: And therefore you shall do well to satisfy first God and then the country by what authority you do it; if by a reserved<sup>1</sup> authority, you cannot answer it. There is a God in heaven that will call you, and all that give you power, to an account. Satisfy me in that, and I will answer; otherwise, I betray my trust and the liberties of the people. And therefore think of that, and then I shall be willing. For I do vow, that it is as great a sin to withstand lawful authority, as it is to submit to a tyrannical or any otherways unlawful authority, And therefore satisfy me that, and you shall receive my answer."

Lord President. "The court expects a final answer. They are to adjourn till Monday. If you satisfy not yourself, though we tell you our authority, we are satisfied with our authority, and it is upon God's authority and the kingdom's; and that peace you speak of will be kept in the doing of justice; and that is our present work."

The court adjourned till Monday ten of clock to the Painted Chamber, and thence hither.

As the king went away, facing the court, the king said, "I fear not that," looking upon and meaning the sword.

Going down from the court, the people cried, "Justice, justice, justice!"

Jan. 21. The commissioners kept a fast this day in Whitehall. There preached before them Mr. Sprig, whose text was, "He that sheds blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Mr. Foxley's was "Judge not, lest you be judged." And Mr. Peters' was. "I will bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron."<sup>2</sup> The last sermon made amends for the two former.

[THE EXECUTION OF CHARLES I]

This day the king was beheaded over against the Banqueting House by Whitehall.<sup>1</sup> The manner of execution and what passed before his death take thus.<sup>2</sup> He was brought from Saint James<sup>3</sup> about ten in the morning, walking on foot through the park with a regiment of foot for his guard, with colors flying, drums beating, his private guard of partisans,<sup>4</sup> with some of his gentlemen before, and some behind bareheaded, Dr. Juxon late Bishop of London<sup>5</sup> next behind him, and Colonel Tomlinson<sup>6</sup> (who had the charge of him) to the gallery in Whitehall, and so into the Cabinet Chamber where he used to lie, where he continued at his devotion, refusing to dine (having before taken the sacrament) only about 12 at noon he drank a glass of claret wine, and eat a piece of bread. From thence he was accompanied by Dr. Juxon, Colonel Tomlinson, Colonel Hacker,<sup>7</sup> and the guards before mentioned through the Banqueting House adjoining to which the scaffold was erected between Whitehall Gate and the gate leading into the gallery from Saint James. The scaffold was hung round with black, and the floor covered with black, and the ax and block laid in the middle of the scaffold. There were divers companies of foot and horse on every side the scaffold, and the multitudes of people that came to be spectators very great. The king making a pass upon<sup>8</sup> the scaffold, looked very earnestly on the block, and asked Colonel Hacker if there were no higher; and then spake thus, directing his speech to the gentlemen upon the scaffold.

King. "I shall be very little heard of anybody here; I shall therefore speak a word unto you here. Indeed I could hold my peace<sup>9</sup> very well, if I did not think that holding my peace would make some men think that I did submit to the guilt as well as to the punishment. But I think it is my duty to God first, and to my country, for to clear myself both as an honest man, and a good king, and a good Christian. I shall begin first with my innocency. In troth I think it not very needful for me to insist long upon this, for all the world knows that I never did begin a war with the two Houses of Parliament, and I call God to witness, to whom I must shortly make an account, that I never did intend for to encroach upon their privileges; they began upon me. It is the militia they began upon;<sup>1</sup> they confessed that the militia was mine but they thought it fit to have it from me; and to be short, if anybody will look to the dates of commissions, theirs and mine, and likewise to the declarations,<sup>2</sup> will see clearly that they began these unhappy troubles, not I. So that as the guilt of these enormous crimes that are laid against me, I hope in God that God will clear me of it. I will not; I am in charity;<sup>3</sup> God forbid that I should lay it upon the two Houses of Parliament, there is no necessity of either.<sup>4</sup> I hope they are free of this guilt; for I do believe that ill instruments<sup>5</sup> between them and me has been the chief cause of all this bloodshed. So that by way of speaking, as I find myself clear of this, I hope and pray God that they may too. Yet for all this, God forbid that I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say that God's judgments are just upon me. Many times he does pay justice by an unjust sentence; that is ordinary. I only say this, that an unjust sentence (meaning Strafford)<sup>6</sup> that I suffered for to take effect, is punished now by an unjust sentence upon me. That is, so far I have said, to show you that I am an innocent man.

"Now for to show you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is" (pointing to Dr. Juxon) "a good man that will bear me witness that I have forgiven all the world, and those in particular that have been the chief causers of my death. Who they are, God knows; I do not desire to know. I pray God forgive them. But this is not all; my charity must go farther. I wish that they may repent, for indeed they have committed a great sin in that particular. I pray God with Saint Stephen that this be not laid to their charge;<sup>7</sup> nay, not only so, but that they may take the right way to the peace of the kingdom, for charity commands me not only to forgive particular men, but to endeavor to the last gasp the peace of the kingdom. Sirs, I do wish with all my soul, and I do hope there is some here will carry it further, that they may endeavor the peace of the kingdom.

“Now, sirs, I must show you both how you are out of the way, and will put you in a way.<sup>8</sup> First, you are out of the way, for certainly all the way<sup>9</sup> you ever have had yet as I could find by anything, is in the way of conquest. Certainly this is an ill way, for conquest, sir, in my opinion is never just, except there be a good just cause, either for matter of wrong or just title, and then if you go beyond it,<sup>1</sup> the first quarrel that you have to it, that makes it unjust at the end that was just at first. But if it be only matter of conquest, then it is a great robbery; as a pirate said to Alexander that he was a great robber, he was but a petty robber. And so, sir, I do think the way that you are in, is much out of the way. Now, sir, for to put you in the way, believe it you never do right, nor God will never prosper you,<sup>2</sup> until you give Him his due, the king his due (that is, my successors) and the people their due. I am as much for them<sup>3</sup> as any of you. You must give God his due by regulating rightly his Church, according to Scripture, which is now out of order. For to set you in a way particularly<sup>4</sup> now I cannot, but only this, a national synod freely called, freely debating among themselves, must settle this; when that every opinion is freely and clearly heard. For the king, indeed I will not—(Then turning to a gentleman that touched the ax, said, hurt not the ax that may hurt me.)—For the king, the laws of the land will clearly instruct you for that; therefore, because it concerns my own particular I only give you a touch of it.<sup>5</sup> For the people, and truly I desire their liberty and freedom, as much as anybody whomsoever; but I must tell you, that their liberty and their freedom consists in having of government, those laws by which their life and their goods may be most their own. It is not for having share in government, sir, that is nothing pertaining to them.<sup>6</sup> A subject and a sovereign are clean<sup>7</sup> different things; and therefore, until they do that, I mean, that you do put the people in that liberty as I say, certainly they will never enjoy themselves.<sup>8</sup> Sirs, it was for this<sup>9</sup> that now I am come here. If I would have given way to an arbitrary way, for to have all laws changed according to the power of the sword, I needed not to have come here; and therefore I tell you, and I pray God it be not laid to your charge, that I am the martyr of the people. In troth sirs, I shall not hold you much longer; for I will only say this to you, that in truth I could have desired some little time longer because that I would have put this that I have said in a little more order and a little better digested<sup>1</sup> than I have done; and therefore I hope you will excuse me. I have delivered<sup>2</sup> my conscience. I pray God that you do take those courses that are best for the good of the kingdom and your own salvations."

Dr. Juxon. "Will Your Majesty—though it may be very well known Your Majesty's affections to religion—yet it may be expected that you should say somewhat<sup>3</sup> for the world's satisfaction."

King. "I thank you very heartily, my lord, for that I had almost forgotten it. In troth, sirs, my conscience in religion I think is very well known to the world, and therefore I declare before you all that I die a Christian according to the profession of the Church of England as I found it left me by my father; and this honest man, I think, will witness it." Then turning to the officers said, "sirs, excuse me for this same.<sup>4</sup> I have a good cause, and I have a gracious God; I will say no more."

Then turning to Colonel Hacker, he said, "Take care that they do not put me to pain; and, sir, this, an it please you."<sup>5</sup> But then a gentleman coming near the ax, the king said, "Take heed of the ax, pray take heed of the ax." Then the king speaking to the executioner said, "I shall say but very short prayers, and then thrust out my hands."

Then the king called to Dr. Juxon for his nightcap, and having put it on he said to the executioner, "Does my hair trouble you?" Who desired him to put it all under his cap, which the king did accordingly, by the help of the executioner and the bishop. Then the king turning to Dr. Juxon said, "I have a good cause, and a gracious God on my side."

Dr. Juxon, "There is but one stage more. This stage is turbulent and troublesome; it is a short one: But you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven, and there you shall find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort."

King. "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be."

Dr. Juxon. "You are exchanged from a temporal to an eternal crown, a good exchange."

Then the king took off his cloak and his George,<sup>6</sup> giving his George to Dr. Juxon, saying "Remember" (it is thought for the prince) and some other small ceremonies past. After which the king stooping down laid his neck upon the block, and after a very little pause stretching forth his hands, the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body. Then his body was put in a coffin covered with black velvet, and removed to his lodging chamber in Whitehall.

POLITICAL WRITING

Not surprisingly, the tumult of civil war stimulated a good deal of thinking about the nature and ends of government. The excerpts that follow give some idea of the arguments proposed by English political writers between 1630 and 1655.

Robert Filmer and Thomas Hobbes both favor an absolutist government that would concentrate power in the sovereign and deprive the people of any way to get rid of him. However, the two writers work from quite different premises. In Patriarcha, or The Natural Power of Kings Defended Against the Unnatural Liberty of the People, Filmer outlines a historical theory based on the authority of biblical patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, for instance—over their families. God ratified kingly authority, Filmer argues, when he commanded the honoring of parents. Although many royalists retained a larger role for popular consent than Filmer did, Filmer's account of the king's fatherly care of his people, and the people's childlike incompetence to manage political affairs, was close to the Stuart kings' own view.

Unlike Filmer, Thomas Hobbes, a gifted mathematician, believed in working from clearly defined first principles to conclusions, grounding his political vision not on biblical history but upon a comprehensive philosophy of nature and of knowledge. He believed that human beings seek self-preservation as a primary goal, and power as a means to secure that goal; his politics spring directly from these premises. Since the best way to assure self-preservation, he argued, is to assent permanently to the creation of a strong authority, the founding political covenant cannot be revoked and rebellion against the sovereign is absurd. Hobbes's materialism and secularism—his virtual exclusion of God from politics—scandalized both the Puritans who opposed him and many royalists as well.

The claims of royalists came under vigorous attack from the poet John Milton, who during the war years became one of the most effective polemicists for the parliamentary radicals. Milton wrote The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates in 1648, the days leading up to Charles's trial and execution, when many of those who had originally supported limiting the king's power shrank from actually beheading him. Milton decries this hesitation, seeing it as the effect of a misdirected awe for the privileges of monarchs. All political authorities, Milton argues, hold their power in trust from the people, and the people can revoke that trust whenever they choose.

Like Filmer, Milton bases his argument upon biblical history, but he cites very different passages. Filmer emphasizes the importance of fatherly authority in Genesis, which narrates the lives of Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. Milton acknowledges that the fall of Adam and Eve corrupted human nature so that individuals were henceforth unable to govern themselves properly without external discipline. Yet, he insists, since those charged with implementing that discipline are themselves sinners, they must be kept in check by laws and by strict limitations upon their authority. In Milton's account, problems with the exercise of authority became evident only gradually. Unlike Filmer, who assumes that the social arrangements described in Genesis are a pattern for modern political communities, Milton chooses his examples from later eras in Jewish history: for instance, the book of Samuel, in which God disapproves of the Israelites' desire for a king.

For Filmer, Hobbes, and Milton, the central issue of the conflict between the king and Parliament is, Who has ultimate authority, the king or the people? Gerrard Winstanley construes the problem differently, in primarily economic rather than political terms. Winstanley was a well-educated London linen draper who worked as a laborer in the countryside after suffering financial reverses during the war years. In his political writing, he concerns himself less with the way power is allocated than with the equitable distribution of wealth. The ownership of land is especially important to him, since it was the critical asset in a largely agrarian society. Members of the House of Commons, though they considered themselves the representatives of "the people," were actually fairly substantial property owners; indeed, those without land or income were not entitled to vote. In consequence, more than half the male population (and, of course, the entire female population) was denied the franchise. In A New Year's Gift Sent to the Parliament and Army (1650), Winstanley accuses Parliament of having merely transferred oppressive power from the king to itself, leaving most of England's population as impoverished and downtrodden as before.

Winstanley suggests a practical means to remedy his society's inequities: "the commons," undeveloped lands used for grazing, should be made available to poor people to farm communally. Since the commons, though traditionally used by all the residents on an estate, were legally the manorial landlord's private property, Winstanley's ideas were highly unpopular among landowners. Moreover, his proposal was not merely a theoretical recommendation. The year before he wrote A New Year's Gift, Winstanley and some of his followers, called Diggers, had settled on St. George's Hill in Surrey. They planted twelve acres of grain and built a number of makeshift houses before they were violently evicted.

Like Filmer and Milton, Winstanley turns to the Bible to justify his politics. And like them, he chooses passages that suit his argument. He reads contemporary history through the heady allegories of the book of Revelation, as a confrontation between the powers of darkness and the powers of light. Jesus's concern for the poor and scorn for the rich loom large to him, and his social vision owes much to biblical accounts of early Christian communities, which held property in common and minimized class differences.

ROBERT FILMER

The eldest of eighteen children, Robert Filmer (1588–1653) attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and inherited his father's estate in Kent in 1629. When war broke out he was too old to participate as a soldier, but he was briefly imprisoned by Parliament as a known supporter of the king, and his property was seized. After his release, he published a number of treatises arguing for absolute monarchy, among them The Anarchy of a Limited and Mixed Monarchy (1648); The Freeholder's Grand Inquest (1648), which argued that Parliament could meet only at the will of the king; and a translation of excerpts from the works of the French absolutist Jean Bodin. However, Filmer's most important treatise, Patriarcha, was not among these publications. Scholars disagree about when it was written, but Filmer probably composed it in the early 1630s in the wake of Charles's conflicts with Parliament early in his reign. The treatise remained in manuscript until 1680. Printed during a heated debate between Tories (royalists) and Whigs (Parliamentarians) over the right of King Charles II's brother James to inherit the throne, Patriarcha was comprehensively savaged by John Locke in his First Treatise of Government (1690).

While Filmer's motive in writing Patriarcha was undoubtedly close-to-home disputes between the English king and his subjects, his explicit polemical target is not Charles's parliamentary opponents. Rather, Filmer argues against Continental political theorists such as the Jesuit Robert Cardinal Bellarmine, who had written a devastating critique of James I's treatises on monarchy earlier in the century. Bellarmine's aim had been to secure freedom of conscience and worship for Roman Catholic subjects of a Protestant monarch, by arguing that the power of monarchs was constrained by their people. Charles's Puritan opponents would find many aspects of Bellarmine's line of reasoning irresistible. Since in the English-speaking tradition republican concepts eventually came to be strongly associated with Puritan dissent, it is worth remembering that for much of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, it had been Protestants who advocated consolidating secular and spiritual power in the figure of a powerful king, and Catholics who had resisted that consolidation.

From Patriarcha, or The Natural Power of Kings Defended Against the Unnatural Liberty of the People

From *Chapter 1: That the First Kings Were Fathers of Families

Since the time that school divinity<sup>1</sup> began to flourish there hath been a common opinion maintained, as well by divines as by divers other learned men, which affirms: "Mankind is naturally endowed and born with freedom from all subjection, and at liberty to choose what form of government it please, and that the power which any one man hath over others was at first bestowed according to the discretion of the multitude." This tenet was first hatched in the schools, and hath been fostered by all succeeding Papists for good divinity. The divines, also, of the reformed churches have entertained it, and the common people everywhere tenderly embrace it as being most plausible<sup>2</sup> to flesh and blood, for that it prodigally distributes a portion of liberty to the meanest of the multitude, who magnify liberty as if the height of human felicity were only to be found in it, never remembering that the desire of liberty was the first cause of the fall of Adam.

But howsoever this vulgar<sup>3</sup> opinion hath of late obtained a great reputation, yet it is not to be found in the ancient fathers and doctors of the primitive church. It contradicts the doctrine and history of the holy scriptures, the constant practice of all ancient monarchies, and the very principles of the law of nature. It is hard to say whether it be more erroneous in divinity or dangerous in policy.<sup>4</sup>

That the patriarchs<sup>5</sup> * * * were endowed with kingly power, their deeds do testify; for as Adam was lord of his children, so his children under him had a command and power over their own children, but still with subordination to the first parent, who is lord-paramount over his children's children to all generations, as being the grandfather of his people.

I see not then how the children of Adam, or of any man else, can be free from subjection to their parents. And this subjection of children being the fountain of all regal authority, by the ordination of God himself, it follows that civil power not only in general is by divine institution, but even the assignment of it specifically to the eldest parents, which quite takes away that new and common distinction which refers only power universal and absolute to God, but power respective<sup>6</sup> in regard of the special form of government to the choice of the people.

This lordship which Adam by command had over the whole world, and by right descending from him the patriarchs did enjoy, was as large and ample as the absolutest dominion of any monarch which hath been since the Creation. For dominion of life and death we find that Judah, the father, pronounced sentence of death against Tamar, his daughter-in-law, for playing the harlot. "Bring her forth," saith he, "that she may be burnt."<sup>7</sup> Touching war, we see that Abraham commanded an army of three hundred and eighteen soldiers of his own family. And Esau met his brother Jacob with four hundred men at arms. For matter of peace, Abraham made a league with Abimelech, and ratified the articles with an oath. These acts of judging in capital crimes, of making war, and concluding peace, are the chiefest marks of sovereignty that are found in any monarch.

It may seem absurd to maintain that kings now are the fathers of their people, since experience shows the contrary. It is true, all kings be not the natural parents of their subjects, yet they all either are, or are to be reputed, the next heirs to those first progenitors who were at first the natural parents of the whole people, and in their right succeed to the exercise of supreme jurisdiction; and such heirs are not only lords of their own children, but also of their brethren, and all others that were subject to their fathers. And therefore we find that God told Cain of his brother Abel, "His desires shall be subject unto thee, and thou shalt rule over him." Accordingly, when Jacob bought his brother's birthright, Isaac blessed him thus: "Be lord over thy brethren, and let the sons of thy mother bow before thee.”<sup>8</sup>

As long as the first fathers of families lived, the name of patriarchs did aptly belong unto them; but after a few descents, when the true fatherhood itself was extinct, and only the right of the father descends to the true heir, then the title of prince or king was more significant to express the power of him who succeeds only to the right of that fatherhood which his ancestors did naturally enjoy. By this means it comes to pass that many a child, by succeeding a king, hath the right of a father over many a gray-headed multitude, and hath the title of pater patriae.<sup>9</sup>

To confirm this natural right of regal power, we find in the Decalogue<sup>1</sup> that the law which enjoins obedience to kings is delivered in the terms of “Honor thy father,” as if all power were originally in the father. If obedience to parents be immediately due by a natural law, and subjection to princes but by the mediation of a human ordinance, what reason is there that the laws of nature should give place to the laws of men, as we see the power of the father over his child gives place and is subordinate to the power of the magistrate?

If we compare the natural rights of a father with those of a king, we find them all one, without any difference at all but only in the latitude or extent of them: as the father over one family, so the king, as father over many families, extends his care to preserve, feed, clothe, instruct, and defend the whole commonwealth. His war, his peace, his courts of justice, and all his acts of sovereignty, tend only to preserve and distribute to every subordinate and inferior father, and to their children, their rights and privileges, so that all the duties of a king are summed up in an universal fatherly care of his people.

From The Tenure<sup>2</sup> of Kings and Magistrates

If men within themselves would be governed by reason, and not generally give up their understanding to a double tyranny, of custom from without, and blind affections<sup>3</sup> within, they would discern better what it is to favor and uphold the tyrant of a nation. But being slaves within doors,<sup>4</sup> no wonder that they strive so much to have the public state conformably governed to the inward vicious rule by which they govern themselves. For indeed none can love freedom heartily but good men; the rest love not freedom but license; which never hath more scope or more indulgence than under tyrants. Hence it is that tyrants are not oft offended nor stand much in doubt of bad men, as being all naturally servile; but in whom<sup>5</sup> virtue and true worth most is eminent, them they fear in earnest as by right their masters; against them lies all their hatred and suspicion. Consequently neither do bad men hate tyrants, but have been always readiest with the falsified names of loyalty, and obedience, to color over their base compliances.<sup>6</sup> And although sometimes for shame, and when it comes to their own grievances, of purse especially, they would seem good patriots and side with the better cause, yet when others for the deliverance of their country, endued with fortitude and heroic virtue to fear nothing by the curse written against those "that do the work of the lord negligently,"<sup>7</sup> would go on to remove not only the calamities and thralldoms of a people but the roots and causes whence they spring, straight these men and sure helpers at need, as if they hated only the miseries but not the mischiefs,<sup>8</sup> after they have juggled and paltered<sup>9</sup> with the world, bandied and borne arms against their king, divested him, disanointed him, nay cursed him all over in their pulpits and their pamphlets, to the engaging of sincere and real men beyond what is possible or honest to retreat from, not only turn revolvers from those principles which only could at first move them, but lay the stain of disloyalty and worse on those proceedings which are the necessary consequences of their own former actions; nor disliked by themselves, were they managed to the entire advantages of their own faction; not considering the while that he toward whom they boasted their new fidelity counted them accessory;<sup>1</sup> and by those statutes and laws which they so impotently brandish against others would have doomed them to a traitor's death for what they have done already. 'Tis true, that most men are apt enough to civil wars and commotions as a novelty, and for a flash hot and active; but through sloth or inconstancy, and weakness of spirit either fainting ere their own pretences,<sup>2</sup> though never so just, be half attained, or through an inbred falsehood and wickedness, betray oftentimes to destruction with themselves men of noblest temper<sup>3</sup> joined with them for causes whereof they in their rash undertakings<sup>4</sup> were not capable.

No man who knows aught, can be so stupid to deny that all men naturally were born free, being the image and resemblance of God Himself, and were by privilege above all the creatures born to command and not to obey, and that they lived so. Till from the root of Adam's transgression,<sup>5</sup> falling among themselves to do wrong and violence, and foreseeing that such courses must needs tend to the destruction of them all, they agreed by common league to bind each other from mutual injury, and jointly to defend themselves against any that gave disturbance or opposition to such agreement. Hence came cities, towns, and commonwealths. And because no faith in all was found sufficiently binding,<sup>6</sup> they saw it needful to ordain some authority that might restrain by force and punishment what was violated against peace and common right. This authority and power of self-defense and preservation being originally and naturally in every one of them, and unitedly in them all, for ease, for order, and lest each man should be his own partial<sup>7</sup> judge, they communicated and derived<sup>8</sup> either to one, whom for the eminence of his wisdom and integrity they chose above the rest, or to more than one whom they thought of equal deserving: the first was called a king, the other magistrates. Not to be their lords and masters (though afterward those names in some places were given voluntarily to such as had been authors<sup>9</sup> of inestimable good to the people) but to be their deputies and commissioners, to execute, by virtue of their entrusted power, that justice which else every man by the bond of nature and of covenant must have executed for himself and for one another. And to him that shall consider well why among free persons, one man by civil right<sup>1</sup> should bear authority and jurisdiction over another, no other end or reason can be imaginable. These<sup>2</sup> for a while governed well, and with much equity decided all things at their own arbitrament:<sup>3</sup> till the temptation of such a power left absolute in their hands, perverted them at length to injustice and partiality. Then did they who now by trial<sup>4</sup> had found the danger and inconveniences of committing arbitrary power to any, invent laws either framed or consented to by all, that should confine and limit the authority of whom they chose to govern them: that so man,<sup>5</sup> of whose failing they had proof, might no more rule over them, but law and reason abstracted as much as might be from personal errors and frailties. While<sup>6</sup> as the magistrate was set above the people, so the law was set above the magistrate. When this would not serve, but that the law was either not executed or misapplied, they were constrained from that time, the only remedy left them, to put conditions<sup>7</sup> and take oaths from all kings and magistrates at their first installment to do impartial justice by law: who upon those terms and no other received allegiance from the people, that is to say, bond or covenant to obey them in execution of those laws which they the people had themselves made or assented to. And this oftentimes with express warning, that if the king or magistrate proved unfaithful to his trust, the people would be disengaged.<sup>8</sup> They added also counselors and parliaments, nor to be only at his beck,<sup>9</sup> but with him or without him, at set times, or at all times when any danger threatened to have care of the public safety.

It being thus manifest that the power of kings and magistrates is nothing else but what is only derivative, transferred and committed to them in trust from the people, to the common good of them all, in whom the power yet remains fundamentally, and cannot be taken from them without a violation of their natural birthright; and seeing that from hence Aristotle<sup>1</sup> and the best of political writers have defined a king, him who governs to the good and profit of his people and not for his own ends, it follows from necessary causes that the titles of sovereign lord, natural lord, and the like, are either arrogancies or flatteries, not admitted<sup>2</sup> by emperors and kings of best note, and disliked by the church both of Jews, Isaiah 26.13, and ancient Christians, as appears by Tertullian and others.<sup>3</sup> Although generally the people of Asia, and with them the Jews also, especially since the time they chose a king against the advice and counsel of God,<sup>4</sup> are noted by wise authors much inclinable to slavery.

Secondly, that to say, as is usual, the king hath as good right to his crown and dignity as any man to his inheritance, is to make the subject no better than the king's slave, his chattel or his possession that may be bought and sold. And doubtless if hereditary title were sufficiently inquired, the best foundation of it would be found either but in courtesy or convenience. But suppose it to be of right hereditary, what can be more just and legal, if a subject for certain crimes be to forfeit by law from himself, and posterity, all his inheritance to the king,<sup>5</sup> than that a king for crimes proportional should forfeit all his title and inheritance to the people: unless the people must be thought created all for him, he not for them, and they all in one body inferior to him single, which were a kind of treason against the dignity of mankind to affirm.

Thirdly it follows that to say kings are accountable to none but God is the overturning of all law and government. For if they may refuse to give account, then all covenants made with them at coronation, all oaths are in vain and mere mockeries, all laws which they swear to keep made to no purpose; for if the king fear not God—as how many of them do not?—we hold then our lives and estates by the tenure of his mere grace and mercy, as from a God, not a mortal magistrate, a position that none but court parasites or men besotted would maintain.

* * *

It follows lastly, that since the king or magistrate holds his authority of the people, both originally and naturally for their good in the first place, and not his own, then may the people as oft as they shall judge it for the best, either choose him or reject him, retain him or depose him though no tyrant, merely by the liberty and right of freeborn men to be governed as seems to them best.

GERRARD WINSTANLEY

The demand for democratic elections by a political faction called the Levellers raised the fear in Cromwell and his conservative associates that with unpropertied voters outnumbering the propertied by five to one, they might divide or even abolish private property. That was in fact the program of a small group calling themselves True Levellers or, later, Diggers, who were a group of Christian communists. Their leader was Gerrard Winstanley (1609–1676?), a failed businessman and subsequently a hired laborer, who began to publish tracts in 1648, became notorious in 1649 with the attempted enactment of the Diggers' program, and lapsed back into obscurity after his last published work in 1652.

In the spring of 1649, the Diggers began to put their ideals into practice, digging up the wasteland of St. George's Hill in Surrey and preparing it for crops. Though this land was not enclosed, all over England landowners claimed property rights in such common land, and the Diggers' gesture of cultivation here and in a few other Digger communities made a threatening counterclaim on behalf of the poor and propertyless. Their aim was at one level practical: at least one-third of England, they claimed, was barren waste, and if properly cultivated could vastly increase the food supply, to the great benefit of the poor. At another level their aim was ideological, a fundamental challenge to the concept of private ownership of land, as the tract excerpted here argues—at least in regard to the common land. The army and the civil authorities were not very hard on the Diggers, but the local landholders were, beating them, expelling them, and destroying their settlements. Nonetheless, their radical and often eloquent tracts survived to inspire later communes.

Gentlemen of the Parliament and army: you and the common people have assisted each other to cast out the head of oppression which was kingly power seated in one man's hand, and that work is now done; and till that work was done you called upon the people to assist you to deliver this distressed, bleeding, dying nation out of bondage; and the people came and failed you not, counting neither purse nor blood too dear to part with to effect this work.

The Parliament after this have made an act to cast out kingly power, and to make England a free commonwealth. These acts the people are much rejoiced with, as being words forerunning their freedom, and they wait for their accomplishment that their joy may be full; for as words without action are a cheat and kills the comfort of a righteous spirit, so words performed in action does comfort and nourish the life thereof.

Now, sirs, wheresoever we spy out kingly power, no man I hope shall be troubled to declare it, nor afraid to cast it out, having both act of Parliament, the soldiers' oath, and the common people's consent on his side; for kingly power is like a great spread tree, if you lop the head or top bough, and let the other branches and root stand, it will grow again and recover fresher strength.

If any ask me what kingly power is, I answer, there is a twofold kingly power. The one is the kingly power of righteousness, and this is the power of almighty God, ruling the whole creation in peace and keeping it together. And this is the power of universal love, leading people into all truth, teaching everyone to do as he would be done unto: now once more striving with flesh and blood, shaking down everything that cannot stand, and bringing everyone into the unity of himself, the one spirit of love and righteousness, and so will work a thorough restoration. But this kingly power is above all and will tread all covetousness, pride, envy, and self-love, and all other enemies whatsoever, under his feet, and take the kingdom and government of the creation out of the hand of self-seeking and self-honoring flesh,<sup>2</sup> and rule the alone king of righteousness in the earth; and this indeed is Christ himself, who will cast out the curse.<sup>3</sup> But this is not that kingly power intended by that act of Parliament to be cast out, but pretended to be set up, though this kingly power be much fought against both by Parliament, army, clergy, and people; but when they are made to see him, then they shall mourn because they have persecuted him.<sup>4</sup>

But the other kingly power is the power of unrighteousness, which indeed is the devil. And O, that there were such a heart in Parliament and army as to perform your own act.<sup>5</sup> Then people would never complain of you for breach of covenant, for your covetousness, pride, and too much self-seeking that is in you. And you on the other side would never have cause to complain of the people's murmurings against you. Truly this jarring that is between you and the people is the kingly power; yea that very kingly power which you have made an act to cast out. Therefore see it be fulfilled on your part; for the kingly power of righteousness expects it, or else he will cast you out for hypocrites and unsavory salt;<sup>6</sup> for he looks upon all your actions, and truly there is abundance of rust about your actings, which makes them that they do not shine bright.

This kingly power is covetousness in his branches,<sup>7</sup> or the power of self-love ruling in one or in many men over others and enslaving those who in the creation are their equals; nay, who are in the strictness of equity rather their masters. And this kingly power is usually set in the chair of government under the name of prerogative<sup>8</sup> when he rules in one over other: and under the name of state privilege of Parliament when he rules in many over others: and this kingly power is always raised up and established by the sword, and therefore he is called the murderer, or the great red dragon which fights against Michael,<sup>9</sup> for he enslaves the weakness of the people under him, denying an equal freedom in the earth to everyone, which the law of righteousness gave every man in his creation. This I say is kingly power under darkness; and as he rules in men, so he makes men jar one against another, and is the cause of all wars and complainings. He is known by his outward actions, and his action at this very day fills all places; for this power of darkness rules, and would rule, and is that only enemy that fights against creation and national freedom. And this kingly power is he which you have made an act of Parliament to cast out. And now, you rulers of England, play the men and be valiant for the truth, which is Christ: for assure yourselves God will not be mocked, nor the devil will not be mocked. For first you say and profess you own<sup>1</sup> the scriptures of prophets and apostles, and God looks that you should perform that word in action. Secondly you have declared against the devil, and if you do not now go through with your work but slack your hand by hypocritical self-love, and so suffer this dark kingly power to rise higher and rule, you shall find he will maul both you and yours to purpose.<sup>2</sup>

In the time of the kings, who came in as conquerors and ruled by the power of the sword, not only the common land but the enclosures<sup>3</sup> also were captivated under the will of those kings, till now of late that our later kings granted more freedom to the gentry than they had presently after the Conquest:<sup>4</sup> yet under bondage still. For what are prisons, whips, and gallows in the times of peace but the laws and power of the sword, forcing and compelling obedience, and so enslaving as if the sword raged in the open field? England was in such a slavery under the kingly power that both gentry and commonalty<sup>5</sup> groaned under bondage; and to ease themselves, they endeavored to call a parliament, that by their counsels and decrees they might find some freedom.

But Charles the then king perceiving that the freedom they strove for would derogate from his prerogative tyranny,<sup>6</sup> thereupon he goes into the north to raise a war against the Parliament; and took

William the Conqueror's sword into his hand again, thereby to keep under the former conquered English, and to uphold his kingly power of self-will and prerogative, which was the power got by former conquests; that is, to rule over the lives and estates of all men at his will, and so to make us pure slaves and vassals.

Well, this Parliament, that did consist of the chief lords, lords of manors, and gentry, and they seeing that the king, by raising an army, did thereby declare his intent to enslave all sorts to him by the sword; and being in distress and in a low ebb, they call upon the common people to bring in their plate, monies, taxes, free-quarter, excise,<sup>7</sup> and to adventure their lives with them, and they would endeavor to recover England from that Norman yoke and make us a free people. And the common people assent hereunto, and call this the Parliament's cause, and own it and adventure person and purse to preserve it; and by the joint assistance of Parliament and people the king was beaten in the field, his head taken off, and his kingly power voted down. And we the commons thereby virtually have recovered ourselves from the Norman conquest; we want nothing but possession of the spoil,<sup>8</sup> which is a free use of the land for our livelihood.

And from hence we the common people, or younger brothers,<sup>9</sup> plead our property in the common land as truly our own by virtue of this victory over the king, as our elder brothers can plead property in their enclosures; and that for three reasons in England's law.

First, by a lawful purchase or contract between the Parliament and us; for they were our landlords and lords of manors, that held the freedom of the commons from us<sup>1</sup> while the king was in his power; for they held title thereunto from him,<sup>2</sup> he being the head and they branches of the kingly power that enslaved the people by that ancient conqueror's sword, that was the ruling power. For they said, "Come and help us against the king that enslaves us, that we may be delivered from his tyranny, and we will make you a free people."

Now they cannot make us free unless they deliver us from the bondage<sup>3</sup> which they themselves held us under; and that is, they held the freedom of the earth from us: for we in part with them have delivered ourselves from the king. Now we claim freedom from that bondage you have and yet do hold us under, by the bargain and contract between Parliament and us, who, I say, did consist of lords of manors and landlords, whereof Mr. Drake,<sup>4</sup> who hath arrested me for digging upon the common, was one at that time. Therefore by the law of bargain and sale we claim of them our freedom, to live comfortably with them in this land of our nativity; and this we cannot do so long as we lie under poverty, and must not be suffered to plant the commons and wasteland for our livelihood. For take away the land from any people, and those people are in a way of continual dearth and misery; and better not to have had a body, than not to have food and raiment for it. But, I say, they have sold us our freedom in the common, and have been largely paid for it; for by means of our bloods and money they sit in peace: for if the king had prevailed, they had lost all, and been in slavery to the meanest cavalier, if the king would.<sup>5</sup> Therefore we the commons say, give us our bargain: if you deny us our bargain, you deny God, Christ, and scriptures; and all your profession<sup>6</sup> then is and hath been hypocrisy.

Secondly, the commons and crown land is our property by equal conquest over the kingly power: for the Parliament did never stir up the people by promises and covenant to assist them to cast out the king and to establish them in the king's place and prerogative power. No, but all their declarations were for the safety and peace of the whole nation.

Therefore the common people being part of the nation, and especially they that bore the greatest heat of the day in casting out the oppressor; and the nation cannot be in peace so long as the poor oppressed are in wants and the land is entangled and held from them by bondage.

But the victory being obtained over the king, the spoil, which is properly the land, ought in equity to be divided now between the two parties, that is Parliament and the common people. The Parliament, consisting of lords of manors and gentry, ought to have their enclosure lands free to them without molestation. * * * And the common people, consisting of soldiers and such as paid taxes and free-quarter, ought to have the freedom of all waste and common land and crown land equally among them. The soldiery ought not in equity to have all, nor the other people that paid them to have all; but the spoil ought to be divided between them that stayed at home and them that went to war; for the victory is for the whole nation.

And as the Parliament declared they did all for the nation, and not for themselves only; so we plead with the army, they did not fight for themselves, but for the freedom of the nation: and I say, we have bought our freedom of them likewise by taxes and free-quarter. Therefore we claim an equal freedom with them in this conquest over the king.

Thirdly, we claim an equal portion in the victory over the king by virtue of the two acts of Parliament: the one to make England a free commonwealth, the other to take away kingly power. Now the kingly power, you have heard, is a power that rules by the sword in covetousness and self, giving the earth to some and denying it to others: and this kingly power was not in the hand of the king alone, but lords, and lords of manors, and corrupt judges and lawyers especially held it up likewise. For he was the head and they, with the tithing priests,<sup>7</sup> are the branches of that tyrannical kingly power; and all the several limbs and members must be cast out before kingly power can be pulled up root and branch. Mistake me not, I do not say, cast out the persons of men. No, I do not desire their fingers to ache;<sup>8</sup> but I say, cast out their power whereby they hold the people in bondage, as the king held them in bondage. And I say, it is our own freedom we claim, both by bargain and by equality in the conquest; as well as by the law of righteous creation which gives the earth to all equally.

And the power of lords of manors lies in this: they deny the common people the use and free benefit of the earth, unless they give them leave and pay them for it, either in rent, in fines, in homages or heriots.<sup>9</sup> Surely the earth was never made by God that the younger brother should not live in the earth unless he would work for and pay his elder brother rent for the earth. No, this slavery came in by conquest, and it is part of the kingly power; and England cannot be a free commonwealth till this bondage be taken away. You have taken away the king; you have taken away the House of Lords. Now step two steps further, and take away the power of lords of manors and of tithing priests, and the intolerable oppressions of judges by whom laws are corrupted; and your work will be honorable.

Fourthly, if this freedom be denied the common people, to enjoy the common land; then Parliament, army, and judges will deny equity and reason, whereupon the laws of a well-governed commonwealth ought to be built. And if this equity be denied, then there can be no law but club law<sup>1</sup> among the people: and if the sword must reign, then every party will be striving to bear the sword; and then farewell peace; nay, farewell religion and gospel, unless it be made use of to entrap one another, as we plainly see some priests and others make it a cloak for their knavery. If I adventure my life and fruit of my labor equal with you, and obtain what we strive for; it is both equity and reason that I should equally divide the spoil with you, and not you to have all and I none. And if you deny us this, you take away our property from us, our monies and blood, and give us nothing for it.

Therefore, I say, the common land is my own land, equal with my fellow-commoners, and our true property, by the law of creation. It is everyone's, but not one single one's. * * * True religion and undefiled is this, to make restitution of the earth, which hath been taken and held from the common people by the power of conquests formerly, and so set the oppressed free. Do not all strive to enjoy the land? The gentry strive for land, the clergy strive for land, the common people strive for land; and buying and selling is an art whereby people endeavor to cheat one another of the land. Now if any can prove from the law of righteousness that the land was made peculiar to him and his successively,<sup>2</sup> shutting others out, he shall enjoy it freely for my part. But I affirm it was made for all; and true religion is to let everyone enjoy it. Therefore, you rulers of England, make restitution of the lands which the kingly power holds from us: set the oppressed free, and come in and honor Christ, who is the restoring power, and you shall find rest.

THOMAS HOBBS

The English Civil War and its aftermath raised fundamental questions about the nature and legitimacy of state power. In 1651 Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) attempted to answer those questions in his ambitious masterwork of political philosophy, Leviathan. He grounded his political vision upon a comprehensive philosophy of nature and knowledge. Hobbes held that everything in the universe is composed only of matter; spirit does not exist. All knowledge is gained through sensory impressions, which are nothing but matter in motion. What we call the self is, for Hobbes, simply a tissue of sensory impressions—clear and immediate in the presence of the objects that evoke them, vague and less vivid in their absence. As a result, an iron determinism of cause and effect governs everything in the universe, including human action.

Because, Hobbes argues, all humans are roughly equal mentally and physically, they possess equal hopes of attaining goods, as well as equal fears of danger from others. In the state of nature, prior to the foundation of some sovereign power to keep them in awe, everyone is continually at war with everyone else, and life, in Hobbes's memorable phrase, is "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short." To escape this ghastly strife, humans covenant with one another to establish a sovereign government over all of them. That sovereign power—which need not be a king but is always indivisible—incorporates the wills and individuality of them all, so that the people no longer have rights or liberties apart from the sovereign's will. The sovereign's dominion over his subjects extends to the right to pronounce on all matters of religion.

While other versions of covenant theory, for instance Milton's Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, insisted that the power transferred by the people to the sovereign could be limited or revoked, in Hobbes's system, the founding political covenant must be a permanent one, since no tyranny can be so evil as the state of war that the sovereign power prevents. Yet if the sovereign power should be overthrown, the individual ruler has no further claim, and the people, for their safety, must accept the new sovereign unconditionally. Hobbes was generally associated with the royalist cause, as a tutor to the Cavendish family and as an exile in Paris from 1640 to 1651, where he tutored the future Charles II. Yet his argument made no distinction between a legitimate monarch and a successful usurper, like Oliver Cromwell. Moreover, Hobbes's philosophical materialism led many to suspect him of atheism; after the Restoration, the publication of many of his books, including a history of the civil war titled Behemoth, was prohibited for a number of years. Undeterred, Hobbes continued to write on a variety of psychological, political, and mathematical topics, completing a translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey at the age of eighty-six.

Hobbes's political theory did not fit easily into the established patterns of English thought partly because his perspective was unusually cosmopolitan. Educated at Oxford as a classicist, Hobbes traveled widely in Europe between 1610 and 1660 as a companion and tutor of noblemen, often remaining abroad for years at a time. During these lengthy sojourns he became acquainted with many of the leading intellectuals and scientists on the Continent, including Galileo, Descartes, and the prominent French mathematician Pierre Gassendi, who argued that the universe was governed entirely by mechanical principles. The most important political philosophers for Hobbes were also Continental figures: the Italian Niccolò Machiavelli, who saw human beings as naturally competitive and power hungry, and Jean Bodin, a French theorist of indivisible, absolute monarchy. One English writer who did influence Hobbes profoundly was Francis Bacon, whose amanuensis Hobbes had been in Bacon's last years. Ironically, Hobbes was not invited to join the Royal Society, established after the Restoration on Baconian principles, because his religious views were suspect and because he had quarreled with several of the society's founders. Yet Hobbes is truly Bacon's heir, sharing Bacon's utter lack of sentimentality and a memorably astringent prose style.

From The Introduction

[THE ARTIFICIAL MAN]

Nature (the art whereby God hath made and governs the world) is by the art of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial<sup>2</sup> animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within, why may we not say that all automata (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life?<sup>3</sup> For what is the heart but a spring; and the nerves but so many strings; and the joints but so many wheels, giving motion to the whole body such as was intended by the artificer? Art goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, man. For by art is created that great Leviathan called a Commonwealth or State (in Latin, Civitas), which is but an artificial man, though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defense it was intended; and in which the sovereignty is an artificial soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body; the magistrates and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial joints; reward and punishment (by which, fastened to the seat of the sovereignty, every joint and member is moved to perform his duty) are the nerves, that do the same in the body natural; the wealth and riches of all the particular members are the strength; salus populi (the people's safety) its business; counselors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested unto it, are the memory; equity and laws an artificial reason and will; concord, health; sedition, sickness; and civil war, death. Lastly, the pacts and covenants by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that Fiat or the "let us make man," pronounced by God in the creation.<sup>4</sup>

FROM CHAPTER 15. OF OTHER LAWS OF NATURE

From that law of nature by which we are obliged to transfer to another such rights as, being retained, hinder the peace of mankind, there followeth a third, which is this: That men perform their covenants made.<sup>3</sup> without which, covenants are in vain, and but empty words; and, the right of all men to all things remaining, we are still in the condition of war.

And in this law of nature consisteth the fountain and original of Justice. For where no covenant hath preceded, there hath no right been transferred, and every man has right to every thing; and consequently no action can be unjust. But when a covenant is made, then to break it is unjust; and the definition of injustice is no other than the not performance of covenant. And whatsoever is not unjust is just. * * *

For the question is not of promises mutual where there is no security of performance on either side, as when there is no civil power erected over the parties promising; for such promises are no covenants. But either where one of the parties has performed already, or where there is a power to make him perform: there is the question whether it be against reason, that is against the benefit of the other, to perform or not. And I say it is not against reason.<sup>4</sup> For the manifestation whereof, we are to consider: first, that when a man doth a thing which (notwithstanding anything can be foreseen and reckoned on) tendeth to his own destruction, howsoever<sup>5</sup> some accident, which he could not expect, arriving may turn it to his benefit; yet such events do not make it reasonably or wisely done. Secondly, that in a condition of war, wherein every man to every man, for want of a common power to keep them all in awe, is an enemy, there is no man can hope by his own strength or wit to defend himself from destruction without the help of confederates; where everyone expects the same defense by the confederation that anyone else does. And therefore he which declares he thinks it reason to deceive those that help him can in reason expect no other means of safety than what can be had from his own single power.

He therefore that breaketh his covenant, and consequently declareth that he thinks he may with reason do so, cannot be received into any society that unite themselves for peace and defense, but by the error of them that receive him; nor when he is received be retained in it without seeing the danger of their error; which errors a man cannot reasonably reckon upon as the means of his security. And therefore if he be left or cast out of society, he perisheth; and if he live in society, it is by the errors of other men, which he could not foresee nor reckon upon; and consequently against the reason of his preservation; and so as all men that contribute not to his destruction forbear him only out of ignorance of what is good for themselves.

As for the instance of gaining the secure and perpetual felicity of heaven by any way, it is frivolous: there being but one way imaginable, and that is not breaking, but keeping of covenant.

And for the other instance of attaining sovereignty by rebellion, it is manifest that though the event follow, yet because it cannot reasonably be expected, but rather the contrary; and because by gaining it so others are taught to gain the same in like manner, the attempt thereof is against reason. Justice therefore, that is to say, keeping of covenant, is a rule of reason, by which we are forbidden to do anything destructive to our life, and consequently a law of nature.

CHAPTER 17. OF THE CAUSES, GENERATION, AND DEFINITION OF A COMMONWEALTH

The final cause, end, or design of men, who naturally love liberty and dominion over others, in the introduction of that restraint upon themselves in which we see them live in commonwealths, is the foresight of their own preservation and of a more contented life thereby—that is to say, of getting themselves out from their miserable condition of war which is necessarily consequent, as has been shown (Chapter 13), to the natural passions of men when there is no visible power to keep them in awe and tie them by fear of punishment to the performance of their covenants and observation of those laws of nature set down in the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters.

For the laws of nature—as justice, equity, modesty, mercy, and, in sum, doing to others as we would be done to—of themselves, without the terror of some power to cause them to be observed, are contrary to our natural passions, that carry us to partiality,<sup>6</sup> pride, revenge, and the like. And covenants without the sword are but words, and of no strength to secure a man at all. Therefore, notwithstanding the laws of nature (which everyone has then kept when he had the will to keep them, when he can do it safely), if there be no power erected, or not great enough for our security, every man will—and may lawfully—rely on his own strength and art for caution<sup>7</sup> against all other men. And in all places where men have lived by small families, to rob and spoil one another has been a trade, and so far from being reputed against the law of nature that the greater spoils they gained, the greater was their honor; and men observed no other laws therein but the laws of honor—that is to abstain from cruelty, leaving to men their lives and instruments of husbandry. And as small families did then, so now do cities and kingdoms, which are but greater families, for their own security enlarge their dominions upon all pretenses of danger and fear of invasion or assistance that may be given to invaders, and endeavor as much as they can to subdue or weaken their neighbors by open force and secret arts, for want of other caution, justly; and are remembered for it in after ages with honor.

Nor is it the joining together of a small number of men that gives them this security, because in small numbers small additions on the one side or the other make the advantage of strength so great as is sufficient to carry the victory, and therefore gives encouragement to an invasion. The multitude sufficient to confide in for our security is not determined by any certain number but by comparison with the enemy we fear, and is then sufficient when the odds of the enemy is not of so visible and conspicuous moment to determine the event<sup>8</sup> of war as to move him to attempt.

And be there never so great a multitude, yet if their actions be directed according to their particular judgments and particular appetites, they can expect thereby no defense nor protection, neither against a common enemy nor against the injuries of one another. For being distracted in opinion<sup>9</sup> concerning the best use and application of their strength, they do not help but hinder one another, and reduce their strength by mutual opposition to nothing; whereby they are easily not only subdued by a very few that agree together, but also, when there is no common enemy, they make war upon each other for their particular interest. For if we could suppose a great multitude of men to consent in the observation of justice and other laws of nature without a common power to keep them all in awe, we might as well suppose all mankind to do the same, then there neither would be, nor need to be, any civil government or commonwealth at all, because there would be peace without subjection.

Nor is it enough for the security which men desire should last all the time of their life that they be governed and directed by one judgment for a limited time, as in one battle or one war. For though they obtain a victory by their unanimous endeavor against a foreign enemy, yet afterwards, when either they have no common enemy or he that by one part is held for an enemy is by another part held for a friend, they must needs, by the difference of their interests, dissolve and fall again into a war among themselves.

It is true that certain living creatures, as bees and ants, live sociably one with another—which are therefore by Aristotle numbered among political creatures—and have no other direction than their particular judgments and appetites, nor speech whereby one of them can signify to another what he thinks expedient for the common benefit; and therefore some man may perhaps desire to know why mankind cannot do the same. To which I answer:

First, that men are continually in competition for honor and dignity, which these creatures are not; and consequently among men there arises on that ground envy and hatred and finally war, but among these not so.

Secondly, that among these creatures the common good differs not from the private; and being by nature inclined to their private, they procure thereby the common benefit. But man, whose joy consists in comparing himself with other men, can relish nothing but what is eminent.

Thirdly, that these creatures—having not, as man, the use of reason—do not see nor think they see any fault in the administration of their common business; whereas among men there are very many that think themselves wiser and abler to govern the public better than the rest, and these strive to reform and innovate, one this way, another that way, and thereby bring it into distraction and civil war.

Fourthly, that these creatures, though they have some use of voice in making known to one another their desires and other affections, yet they want that art of words by which some men can represent to others that which is good in the likeness of evil, and evil in the likeness of good, and augment or diminish this apparent greatness of good and evil, discontenting men and troubling their peace at their pleasure.

Fifthly, irrational creatures cannot distinguish between injury and damage, and therefore, as long as they be at ease, they are not offended with their fellows; whereas man is then most troublesome when he is most at ease, for then it is that he loves to show his wisdom and control the actions of them that govern the commonwealth.

Lastly, the agreement of these creatures is natural, that of men is by covenant only, which is artificial, and therefore it is no wonder if there be somewhat else required besides covenant to make their agreement constant and lasting, which is a common power to keep them in awe and to direct their actions to the common benefit.

The only way to erect such a common power as may be able to defend them from the invasion of foreigners and the injuries of one another, and thereby to secure them in such sort as that by their own industry and by the fruits of the earth they may nourish themselves and live contentedly, is to confer all their power and strength upon one man, or upon one assembly of men that may reduce all their wills, by plurality of voices, into one will, which is as much as to say, to appoint one man or assembly of men to bear their person, and everyone to own and acknowledge himself to be the author of whatsoever he that so bears their person shall act or cause to be acted in those things which concern the common peace and safety, and therein to submit their wills everyone to his will, and their judgments to his judgment. This is more than consent or concord; it is a real unity of them all in one and the same person, made by covenant of every man with every man, in such manner as if every man should say to every man, "I authorize and give up my right of governing myself to this man, or to this assembly of men, on the condition that you give up your right to him and authorize all his actions in like manner." This done, the multitude so united in one person is called a commonwealth, in Latin civitas. This is the generation of that great Leviathan (or rather, to speak more reverently, of that mortal god) to whom we owe, under the immortal God, our peace and defense. For by this authority, given him by every particular man in the commonwealth, he has the use of so much power and strength conferred on him that, by terror thereof, he is enabled to form the wills of them all to peace at home and mutual aid against their enemies abroad. And in him consists the essence of the commonwealth, which, to define it, is one person, of whose acts a great multitude, by mutual covenants one with another, have made themselves everyone the author, to the end he may use the strength and means of them all as he shall think expedient for their peace and common defense. And he that carries this person is called sovereign and said to have sovereign power; and everyone besides, his subject.

HISTORY AND LIFE-WRITING

The Civil Wars invited new kinds of histories, including partisan accounts like Margaret Cavendish's Life of William Cavendish (1667) and Lucy Hutchinson's "Life of Colonel Hutchinson" (which circulated in manuscript). Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, excerpted below, would become the standard text of the period. The civil war decades also provided the impetus for non-elite subjects to record their lives. The excerpt from the Quaker Dorothy Waugh's account of her persecution in Carlisle gives a vivid sense of the courage of those forging new paths in tumultuous times.

EDWARD HYDE, EARL OF CLARENDON

Edward Hyde (1609–1674) was educated at Oxford and during the 1630s practiced law. From about 1641 onward, he was among the chief supporters and advisers of Charles I; he went into exile with the boy who was to become Charles II and was privy to the various plots and plans of the royalists to restore him to power. After the Restoration he became lord chancellor and prime minister to Charles II, and he was instrumental in enacting the so-called Clarendon Code, a series of harsh laws against all nonconformists to the reestablished Church of England. He was impeached in 1667, owing partly to England's ill success in the Dutch War, and spent the last seven years of his life in France.

Clarendon wrote part of his great History of the Rebellion amid the events it describes. For the Muse of History such a short view can be a mixed blessing. But Clarendon's learning—legal, classical, and historical—and the formality of his method save him from many of the failings of partisanship. He wrote with dignity and for posterity. His History, which first appeared in print thirty years after his death, was remarkable not only for the largeness of its canvas but also for the force and coherence of the conservative social philosophy informing it. As a historian and rhetorician, Clarendon invites comparison with his classical models, Thucydides and Tacitus. As an evaluator of character, he invites comparison with Plutarch, whose judiciousness he shares.

About the middle of August he was seized on by a common tertian ague,<sup>2</sup> from which he believed a little ease and divertissement at Hampton Court<sup>3</sup> would have freed him; but the fits grew stronger and his spirits much abated, so that he returned again to Whitehall,<sup>4</sup> when his physicians began to think him in danger, though the preachers who prayed always about him and told God Almighty what great things he had done for Him, and how much more need He had still of his service, declared as from God that he should recover, and he himself did not think he should die, till even the time that his spirits failed him, and then declared to them that he did appoint his son to succeed him, his eldest son Richard. And so expired upon the third day of September (a day he thought always very propitious to him, and on which he had triumphed for several victories),<sup>5</sup> 1658, a day very memorable for the greatest storm of wind that had been ever known for some hours before and after his death, which overthrew trees, houses, and made great wrecks at sea, and was so universal that there were terrible effects of it both in France and Flanders, where all people trembled at it, besides the wrecks all along the coast, many boats having been cast away in the very rivers; and within few days after, that circumstance of his death that accompanied that storm was known.

He was one of those men quos vituperare ne inimici quidem possunt, nisi ut simul laudent,<sup>6</sup> for he could never have done half that mischief without great parts of courage and industry and judgment, and he must have had a wonderful understanding in the natures and humors of men, and as great a dexterity in the applying them, who from a private and obscure birth (though of a good family), without interest of estate, alliance, or friendships, could raise himself to such a height, and compound and knead such opposite and contradictory tempers, humors, and interests into a consistence that contributed to his designs and to their own destruction, whilst himself grew insensibly powerful enough to cut off those by whom he had climbed, in the instant that they projected to demolish their own building.<sup>7</sup> What Velleius Paterculus said of Cinna may very justly be said of him, Ausum eum quae nemo auderet bonus, perfecisse quae a nullo nisi fortissimo perfici possunt.<sup>8</sup> Without doubt no man with more wickedness ever attempted anything, or brought to pass what he desired more wickedly, more in the face and contempt of religion and moral honesty; yet wickedness as great as his could never have accomplished those trophies without the assistance of a great spirit, an admirable circumspection and sagacity, and a most magnanimous resolution. When he appeared first in the Parliament he seemed to have a person in no degree gracious, no ornament of discourse, none of those talents which use to reconcile the affections of the standers-by; yet as he grew into place and authority, his parts<sup>9</sup> seemed to be renewed, as if he had concealed faculties till he had occasion to use them, and when he was to act the part of a great man, he did it without any indecency<sup>1</sup> through the want of custom.

After he was confirmed and invested Protector by the Humble Petition and Advice,<sup>2</sup> he consulted with very few upon any action of importance, nor communicated any enterprise he resolved upon with more than those who were to have principal parts in the execution of it, nor to them sooner than was absolutely necessary. What he once resolved, in which he was not rash, he would not be dissuaded from, nor endure any contradiction of his power and authority, but extorted obedience from them who were not willing to yield it.

When he had laid some very extraordinary tax upon the city, one Cony, an eminent fanatic,<sup>3</sup> and one who had heretofore served him very notably, positively refused to pay his part and loudly dissuaded others from submitting to it, as an imposition notoriously against the law and the property of the subject, which all honest men were bound to defend. Cromwell sent for him and cajoled him with the memory of the old kindness and friendship that had been between them, and that of all men he did not expect this opposition from him in a matter that was so necessary for the good of the commonwealth. But it was always his fortune to meet with the most rude and obstinate behavior from those who had formerly been absolutely governed by him, and they commonly put him in mind of some expressions and sayings of his own in cases of the like nature. So this man remembered<sup>4</sup> him how great an enemy he had expressed himself to such grievances, and declared that all who submitted to them and paid illegal taxes were more to blame, and greater enemies to their country, than they who imposed them; and that the tyranny of princes could never be grievous but by the tameness and stupidity of the people.

When Cromwell saw that he could not convert him, he told him that he had a will as stubborn as his, and he would try which of them two should be master, and thereupon with some terms of reproach and contempt he committed the man to prison—whose courage was nothing abated by it, but as soon as the term came, he brought his habeas corpus<sup>5</sup> in the King's Bench, which they then called the Upper Bench. Maynard, who was of counsel with the prisoner, demanded his liberty with great confidence, both upon the illegality of the commitment and the illegality of the imposition,<sup>6</sup> as being laid without any lawful authority. The judges could not maintain or defend either, but enough declared what their sentence would be, and therefore the Protector's attorney required a further day to answer what had been urged. Before that day, Maynard was committed to the Tower for presuming to question or make doubt of his authority, and the judges were sent for and severely reprehended for suffering that license; and when they with all humility mentioned the law, and Magna Carta, Cromwell told them their Magna Carta should not control his actions, which he knew were for the safety of the commonwealth. He asked them who made them judges; whether they had any authority to sit there but what he gave them, and that if his authority were at an end, they knew well enough what would become of themselves. And therefore advised them to be more tender of that which could only preserve them, and so dismissed them with caution that they should not suffer the lawyers to prate what it would not become them to hear.

Thus he subdued a spirit that had been often troublesome to the most sovereign power, and made Westminster Hall<sup>7</sup> as obedient and subservient to his commands as any of the rest of his quarters. In all other matters which did not concern the life of his jurisdiction, he seemed to have great reverence for the law, and rarely interposed between party and party; and as he proceeded with this kind of indignation and haughtiness with those who were refractory and dared to contend with his greatness, so towards those who complied with his good pleasure and courted his protection he used a wonderful civility, generosity, and bounty.

To reduce three nations which perfectly hated him to an entire obedience to all his dictates, to awe and govern those nations by an army that was indevoted to him and wished his ruin, was an instance of a very prodigious address;<sup>8</sup> but his greatness at home was but a shadow of the glory he had abroad. It was hard to discover which feared him most, France, Spain, or the Low Countries, where his friendship was current at the value he put upon it; and as they did all sacrifice their honor and their interest to his pleasure, so there is nothing he could have demanded that either of them would have denied him.

He was not a man of blood, and totally declined Machiavel's method, which prescribes upon any alteration of a government, as a thing absolutely necessary, to cut off all the heads of those, and extirpate their families, who are friends to the old;<sup>9</sup> and it was confidently reported in the Council of Officers, it was more than once proposed that there might be a general massacre of all the royal party as the only expedient to secure the government, but Cromwell would never consent to it, it may be out of too much contempt of his enemies. In a word, as he had all the wickednesses against which damnation is denounced and for which hellfire is prepared, so he had some virtues which have caused the memory of some men in all ages to be celebrated, and he will be looked upon by posterity as a brave, bad man.

DOROTHY WAUGH

Around 1647, a group of disciples began forming around the charismatic itinerant preacher George Fox. Like many religious radicals of the period, Fox taught the importance of relying upon the Inner Light—one's own conscience as guided by the Holy Spirit—in preference to human law or holy writ. Fox believed that the days of prophecy and revelation had not ended in biblical times but were ongoing, so that the teachings of scripture were open to revision. Moreover, sacred illumination was available to all sincere believers regardless of sex, education, or social rank. Fox's followers were derisively called "Quakers" because, in the grip of a visitation by the Holy Spirit, they would suffer paroxysms similar to epileptic convulsions.

Because Quakers believed all human beings to be spiritually equal, they refused to perform the acts of deference that permeated social life in seventeenth-century England—bowing before and doffing the hat to superiors or addressing them with the honorific "you" rather than the familiar "thou." They felt called upon to testify to their beliefs wherever, and whenever, the Inner Light prompted, answering back to ministers in the pulpit, inveighing against what they considered social injustices, and sermonizing without a license in public places. Often, their outspokenness enraged secular and ecclesiastical authorities.

Dorothy Waugh (ca. 1636–?) worked as a maidservant in Preston Patrick, in northwest England, a hotbed of Quaker activity. She probably became one of Fox's followers in the early 1650s, when she was still a teenager. Like Fox and a number of other missionary spirits, sometimes called "the Valiant Sixty," she traveled through England on foot, spreading the Quaker message to all who would listen. In 1656, about age twenty, she was one of the Friends who arrived in Boston, Massachusetts, aboard the Speedwell: the party was imprisoned for ten days by the staunch Puritan governor John Endicott, and then forced to return to England. Undaunted, Waugh embarked for the colonies again, with another small group of missionary Quakers, the following year, this time landing in New Amsterdam (modern New York). They were no more welcome here than they had been in Boston. After a brief imprisonment, they were shipped in shackles to the colony of Rhode Island, where complete religious toleration was the rule. In the late 1650s, probably between voyages to the New World, Waugh married, but nothing is known about her later life or the circumstances of her death. Other Quakers traveled even farther than Waugh on missionary expeditions; one woman made it as far as the Ottoman Empire and gave a sermon before the Grand Turk; when she failed to convert him, she walked back home to England.

Waugh's account of her treatment in Carlisle was published in The Lamb's Defence Against Lies, a collection in which various Quakers testified to their maltreatment by secular and religious authorities; like most Quaker accounts, it owed much to John Foxe's influential tales of Protestant martyrdom under the Catholic queen "Bloody Mary." Although the Friends were pacifists who refused to retaliate physically or verbally against their persecutors, they were fully aware of the propaganda value of unmerited suffering—indeed, their enemies believed that they deliberately courted abuse as a publicity stunt. In the years between 1650 and 1700, numerous male and female Friends published memoirs of their arduous lives, producing some of the first printed autobiographical writing in English by women and by people of humble status.

A Relation Concerning Dorothy Waugh's Cruel Usage by the Mayor of Carlisle

Upon a seventh day about the time called Michaelmas in the year of the world's account 1655<sup>1</sup> I was moved of the Lord to go into the market of Carlisle, to speak against all deceit and ungodly practices, and the mayor's officer came and violently haled me off the cross<sup>2</sup> and put me in prison, not having anything to lay to my charge. And presently the mayor came up where I was, and asked me from whence I came; and I said, "Out of Egypt,<sup>3</sup> where thou lodgest." But after these words, he was so violent and full of passion he scarce asked me any more questions, but called to one of his followers to bring the bridle<sup>4</sup> as he called it to put upon me, and was to be on three hours. And that which they called so was like a steel cap and my hat being violently plucked off which was pinned to my head whereby they tore my clothes to put on their bridle as they called it, which was a stone weight of iron by the relation of their own generation,<sup>5</sup> and three bars of iron to come over my face, and a piece of it was put in my mouth, which was so unreasonable big a thing for that place as cannot be well related, which was locked to my head. And so I stood their time with my hands bound behind me, with the stone weight of iron upon my head and the bit in my mouth to keep me from speaking. And the mayor said he would make me an example to all that should ever come in that name.<sup>6</sup> And the people to see me so violently abused were broken into tears, but he cried out on them and said, "For foolish pity, one may spoil a whole city." And the man that kept the prison door demanded two pence of everyone that came to see me while their bridle remained upon me. Afterwards it was taken off and they kept me in prison for a little season, and after a while the mayor came again and caused it to be put on again, and sent me out of the city with it on, and gave me very vile and unsavory words, which were not fit to proceed out of any man's mouth, and charged the officer to whip me out of the town, from constable to constable to send me till I came to my own home, whenas<sup>7</sup> they had not anything to lay to my charge.

MARGARET CAVENDISH

1623–1673

Margaret (Lucas) Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle, wrote and published numerous works in many genres, including poetry (Poems and Fancies), essays, short fiction and nonfiction, a full-length piece of utopian fiction (The Description of a New Blazing World), plays, letters, orations, a biography of her husband (which is also a history of the English Civil Wars), and multiple works of natural philosophy. Born to a wealthy gentry family in Colchester, in 1643 Margaret Lucas joined Queen Henrietta Maria's court-in-exile in Paris. Following the defeat of the royalist forces at Marston Moor in 1644, William Cavendish, then Marquess of Newcastle, went into self-imposed exile in France, where he met and married Margaret Lucas. William and Margaret Cavendish formed a partnership based on shared intellectual interests and writing projects. The couple lived in exile in Europe until the Restoration—first in Paris, where they hosted leading philosophers, including René Descartes and Thomas Hobbes, and then in Antwerp in a house designed and built by the artist Peter Paul Rubens. In 1651 Cavendish traveled to London to (unsuccessfully) petition Parliament for her share of the sequestered Newcastle estates, and published her earliest work, Poems and Fancies, in the lavish folio format that became her signature style. (Cavendish was an active circulator of her own books.) Immediately after Charles II returned to the throne the Cavendishes returned to

Cavendish's literary work illustrates the original theory of self-moving matter that she developed in dialogue with and resistance to the mechanical theories of matter and empiricist and experimental practices that came to dominate English natural philosophy in her lifetime. While Cavendish was the first woman to visit the Royal Society (in 1667), the visit was not a success, and in both Observations upon Experimental Philosophy (1666) and, in greater detail, Grounds of Natural Philosophy (1668) she pushed back against many scientific premises then current, including the idea that "optic glasses"—both telescopes and the microscopes celebrated in Robert Hooke's Micrographia (1665)—enabled a closer approach to the truth of things. "Sense," she writes in Observations, "is more apt to be deluded than reason." Cavendish continued to argue for the value of reason, including contemplation, speculation, and imagination, in natural philosophy, and to assert, as she put it in Grounds, that "all the parts of nature have life and knowledge." Her refusal of a strict separation between literary and philosophical pursuits is reflected in the mixed genres of many of her volumes. She published her first book of natural philosophy, Philosophical Fancies, which also included the poem "Of Sense and Reason Exercised in Their Different Shapes," in the same year as she published her first volume of poetry. Her utopia, The Blazing World, which was published "as an appendix" to her Observations, extends many of the ideas and precepts expressed in the first part into a literary form. While the Observations argues that "boys that play with watery bubbles" and "superficial wonders" "contribute less to the Commonwealth of Learning" than they like to think, The Blazing World presents a commonwealth of learning that is governed by an Empress who not only puts a stop to the infighting of experimental philosophers, but hires the "Spirit" of one "Duchess of Newcastle" to support her in her work. The two women discuss myriad political, moral, natural philosophical, and socioeconomic ideas, including the Duchess's suggestion that there is inestimable value in creating "a world of [one's] own." Cavendish's ideas about imagined worlds and the possibility of worlds beyond our senses are complemented by her beliefs that God is the only immaterial entity; that animals are not, as she puts it in "The Hunting of the Hare," ours to "tyrannize upon"; that all forms of life have intelligence, or what she calls "rational spirits"; and that thoughts and literary "fancies" are expressive and creative matter.

The Poetess's Hasty Resolution

Reading my verses, I liked them so well,
Self-love did make my judgment to rebel.
Thinking them so good, I thought more to write;
Considering not how others would them like.
5 I writ so fast, I thought, if I lived long,
A pyramid of fame<sup>1</sup> to build thereon.
Reason observing which way I was bent,
Did stay my hand, and asked me what I meant;
Will you, said she, thus waste your time in vain,
10 On that which in the world small praise shall gain?
For shame, leave off, said she, the printer spare,
He'll lose by your ill poetry, I fear.
Besides the world hath already such a weight
Of useless books, as it is overfraught.<sup>2</sup>
15 Then pity take, do the world a good turn,
And all you write cast in the fire, and burn.
Angry I was, and Reason struck away,
When I did hear, what she to me did say.
Then all in haste I to the press it sent,
Fearing persuasion might my book prevent.
20 But now 'tis done, with grief repent do I,
Hang down my head with shame, blush, sigh, and cry.
Take pity, and my drooping spirits raise,
Wipe off my tears with handkerchiefs of praise.

A World Made by Atoms

Small atoms<sup>1</sup> of themselves a world may make,
As being subtle,<sup>2</sup> and of every shape:
And as they dance about, fit places find,
Such forms<sup>3</sup> as best agree, make every kind.
5 For when we build a house of brick, and stone,
We lay them even, every one by one:
And when we find a gap that's big, or small,
We seek out stones, to fit that place withal.°
For when not fit, too big, or little be,
10 They fall away, and cannot stay, we see.
So atoms, as they dance, find places fit,
They there remain, lie close, and fast will stick.
Those that unfit, the rest that rove about,
Do never leave, until they thrust them out.
15 Thus by their several motions, and their forms,
As several workmen serve each other's turns.
And thus, by chance, may a new world create:
Or else, predestinate,° may work by fate.

Of Many Worlds in This World

Just like unto a nest of boxes° round,
Degrees of sizes within each box are found.
So in this world, may many worlds more be,
Thinner, and less, and less still by degree;°
Although they are not subject to our sense,
5 A world may be no bigger than twopence.
Nature is curious, and such work may make,
That our dull sense can never find, but scape.°
For creatures,° small as atoms, may be there,
If every atom a creature's figure° bear.
10 If four atoms a world can make,<sup>1</sup> then see,
What several° worlds might in an earring be.
For millions of these atoms may be in
The head of one small, little, single pin.
And if thus small, then ladies well may wear
15 A world of worlds as pendants in each ear.

The Hunting of the Hare

Betwixt two ridges of plowed land lay Wat,<sup>1</sup>
Pressing his body close to earth lay squat.
His nose upon his two forefeet close lies,
Glazing obliquely with his great gray eyes.
His head he always sets against the wind,
5 If turn his tail, his hairs blow up behind:
Which he too cold will grow, but he is wise,
And keeps his coat still<sup>o</sup> down, so warm he lies.
Then resting all the day, till, sun doth set,
Then riseth up, his relief for to get.
10 Walking about until the sun doth rise,
Then back returns, down in his form<sup>o</sup> he lies.
At last, poor Wat was found, as he there lay,
By huntsmen, with their dogs which came that way.
Seeing, gets up, and fast begins to run,
15 Hoping some ways the cruel dogs to shun.
But they by nature have so quick a scent,
That by their nose they trace what way he went.
And with their deep, wide mouths set forth a cry,
Which answered was by echoes in the sky.
20 Then Wat was struck with terror, and with fear,
Thinks every shadow still the dogs they were.
And running out some distance from the noise,
To hide himself, his thoughts he new employs.
Under a clod of earth in sand pit wide,
25 Poor Wat sat close, hoping himself to hide.
There long he had not sat, but straight<sup>o</sup> his ears
The winding<sup>o</sup> horns and crying dogs he hears:
Staring with fear, up leaps, then doth he run,
And with such speed, the ground scarce treads
30 upon.

Into a great thick wood he straightway gets.
Where underneath a broken bough he sits.
At every leaf that with the wind did shake,
Did bring such terror, made his heart to ache.
That place he left, to champaign<sup>o</sup> plains he went,
35 Winding about, for to deceive their scent.
And while they snuffling were, to find his track,
Poor Wat, being weary, his swift pace did slack.
On his two hinder legs for ease did sit,
His forefeet rubbed his face from dust, and sweat.
40 Licking his feet, he wiped his ears so clean,
That none could tell that Wat had hunted been.
But casting round about his fair great eyes,
The hounds in full career he near him spies:
To Wat it was so terrible a sight,
45 Fear gave him wings, and made his body light.
Though weary was before, by running long,
Yet now his breath he never felt more strong.
Like those that dying are, think health returns,
When 'tis but a faint blast, which life out burns.
50 For spirits seek to guard the heart about,
Striving with death, but death doth quench them out.
Thus they so fast came on, with such loud cries,
That he no hopes hath left, nor help espies.
With that the winds did pity poor Wat's case,
55 And with their breath the scent blew from the place.
Then every nose is busily employed,
And every nostril is set open wide,
And every head doth seek a several<sup>o</sup> way,
To find what grass, or track, the scent on lay.
60 Thus quick industry<sup>o</sup> that is not slack,
Is like to witchery,<sup>o</sup> brings lost things back.
For though the wind had tied the scent up close,
A busy dog thrust in his snuffling nose
And drew it out, with it did foremost run,

Then horns blew loud, for th'rest to follow on.
65 The great slow hounds, their throats did set a bass,
The fleet swift hounds, as tenors next in place,
The little beagles they a treble sing,
And through the air their voices round did ring.
70 Which made a consort, as they ran along;
If they but words could speak, might sing a song.
The horns kept time, the hunters shout for joy,
And valiant seem, poor Wat for to destroy:
Spurring their horses to a full career,
75 Swim rivers deep, leap ditches without fear;
Endanger life and limbs so fast will ride,
Only to see how patiently Wat died.
At last,<sup>2</sup> the dogs so near his heels did get,
That they their sharp teeth in his breech did set;
80 Then tumbling down, did fall with weeping eyes,
Gives up his ghost, and thus poor Wat he dies.
Men whooping loud, such acclamations make,
As if the Devil they did prisoner take.
When they do but a shiftless<sup>o</sup> creature kill;
85 To hunt, there needs no valiant soldier's skill.
But man doth think that exercise and toil,
To keep their health, is best, which makes most spoil.
Thinking that food and nourishment so good,
And appetite, that feeds on flesh and blood.
90 When they do lions, wolves, bears, tigers see,
To kill poor sheep, straight say, they cruel be,
But for themselves all creatures think too few
For luxury, wish God would make them new.
As if that God made creatures for man's meat,
95 To give them life and sense, for man to eat;
Or else for sport, or recreation's sake,
Destroy those lives that God saw good to make:
Making their stomachs, graves, which full they fill

100 With murdered bodies that in sport they kill.
Yet man doth think himself so gentle, mild,
When he of creatures is most cruel wild.
And is so proud, thinks only he shall live,
That God a godlike nature did him give.
105 And that all creatures for his sake alone
Was made for him, to tyrannize upon.

Of Sense and Reason Exercised in Their Different Shapes<sup>1</sup>

If everything hath sense and reason, then
There might be beasts, and birds, and fish, and men:

As vegetables and minerals, had they
The animal shape<sup>o</sup> to express that way;
And vegetables and minerals may know,
5 As man, though like to trees and stones they grow.
Then coral trouts may through the water glide,
And pearled minnows swim on either side;
And mermaids, which in the sea delight,
Might all be made of watry lilies white,
10 Set on salt watry billows as they flow,
Which like green banks appear thereon to grow.
And mariners i'th'midst their ship might stand,
Instead of mast, hold sails in either hand.
On mountain tops the golden fleece<sup>2</sup> might feed, 15 Some hundred years their ewes bring forth their breed.
Large deer of oak might through the forest run, Leaves on their heads might keep them from the sun;
Instead of shedding horns, their leaves might fall,
And acorns to increase a wood of fawns withal.
20 Then might a squirrel for a nut be cracked,
If nature had that matter<sup>o</sup> so compact:
And the small sprouts<sup>o</sup> which on the husk<sup>o</sup> do grow,
Might be the tail, and make a brushing<sup>3</sup> show.
Then might the diamonds which on rocks oft lie,
25 Be all like to some little sparkling fly.

Then might a leaden hare, if swiftly run,
Melt from that shape, and so a pig<sup>4</sup> become.
And dogs of copper-mouths sound like a bell;
So when they kill a hare, ring out his knell.<sup>5</sup>
30 Hard iron men shall have no cause to fear
To catch a fall, when they a hunting were.
Nor in the wars should have no use of arms,
Nor feared to fight; they could receive no harms.
For if a bullet on their breasts should hit,
35 Fall on their back, but straightways up may get.
Or if a bullet on their head do light,
May make them totter, but not kill them quite.
And stars be like the birds with twinkling wing,
When in the air they fly, like larks might sing.
40 And as they fly, like wand'ring<sup>o</sup> planets show,
Their tails may like to blazing comets grow.
When they on trees do rest themselves from flight,
Appear like fixed stars in clouds of night.
Thus may the sun be like a woman fair,
45 And the bright beams be as her flowing hair.
And from her eyes may cast a silver light,
And when she sleeps, the world be as dark night.
Or women may of alabaster be,
And so as smooth as polished ivory,
50 Or, as clear crystal, where hearts may be shown,
And all their falsehoods to the world be known.
Or else be made of rose, and lilies white,
Both fair, and sweet, to give the soul delight,
Or else be made like tulips fresh in May,
55 By nature dressed, clothed several colors gay.
Thus every year there may young virgins spring,
But wither, and decay, as soon again.
While they are fresh,<sup>o</sup> upon their breast might set
Great swarms of bees, from thence sweet honey get.
60 Or, on their lips, for gillyflowers,<sup>o</sup> flies

Drawing delicious sweet that therein lies.
Thus every maid, like several flowers show,
Not in their shape, but like in substance grow.
Then tears which from oppressed hearts do rise,
65 May gather into clouds within the eyes:
From whence those tears, like showers of rain may flow
Upon the banks of cheeks, where roses grow.
After those showers of rain, so sweet may smell,
Perfuming all the air, that near them dwell.
70 But when the sun of joy and mirth doth rise,
Darting forth pleasing beams from loving eyes.
Then may the buds of modesty unfold,
With full blown confidence the sun behold.
But grief as frost them nips, and withering die,
75 In their own pods<sup>6</sup> entombèd lie.
Thus virgin cherry trees, where blossoms blow,<sup>o</sup>
So red ripe cherries on their lips may grow.
Or women plum trees at each finger's end,
May ripe plums hang, and make their joints to bend.
80 Men sycamores, which on their breast may write
Their amorous verses, which their thoughts indite.<sup>o</sup>
Men's stretched arms may be like spreading vines,
Where grapes may grow, so drink of their own wine.
To plant large orchards, need no pains nor care,
85 For every one their sweet fresh fruit may bear.
Then silver grass may in the meadows grow,
Which nothing but a scythe of fire can mow.
The wind, which from the north a journey takes,
May strike those silver strings, and music make.
90 Thus may another world, though matter still the same,
By changing shapes, change humors,<sup>7</sup> properties, and name.
Thus Colossus,<sup>8</sup> a statue wondrous great,

When it did fall, might straight get on his feet.
 Where ships, which through his legs did swim, he 95        might
 Have blowed their sails, or else have drowned them quite.
 The golden calf<sup>9</sup> that Israel joyed to see,
 Might run away from their idolatry.
 The Basan bull of brass might be,<sup>1</sup> when roar, 100        His metalled throat might make his voice sound more.
 The hill, which Muhammed did call,<sup>2</sup> might come
 At the first word, or else away might run.
 Thus Pompey's statue might rejoice to see,
 When killed was Caesar, his great enemy.<sup>3</sup>
 105        The wooden horse<sup>4</sup> that did great Troy betray,
              Have told what's in him, and then run away.
 Achilles arms against Ulysses plead,
 And not let wit against true valor speed.<sup>o5</sup>

The Blazing World    The Blazing World begins as a romance: a young woman is abducted by merchants and then miraculously saved when a tempest carries the abductors' boat to the North Pole (where the kidnappers freeze to death) and then further on into another world. The emperor of this "Blazing World" marries the heroine and gives her sovereignty over its entire government. The Blazing World then assumes a utopian character, as the fantastical inhabitants teach their new Empress about their scientific experiments, politics, and religious practices, many of which reflect Cavendish's own views. When the Empress decides she needs a scribe to help her with her "Cabbala," or book of wisdom, she considers philosophers ranging from Aristotle to Descartes, but ultimately settles on the spirit of the Duchess of Newcastle. The two "Platonic friends" travel to Cavendish's world, where they evaluate its culture and politics and visit the ruined Newcastle estates. The Blazing World illustrates the philosophy of matter in Cavendish's own Observations upon Experimental Philosophy, to which it was attached. Her argument for the work of fancy thus privileges both natural philosophy and literature: one can create and rule over an imagined world with force comparable to that of a "Caesar or an Alexander," but one can also "alter it as often as you please."

From To the Reader

[F]ictions are an issue of man's fancy, framed in his own mind, according as he pleases, without regard whether the thing he fancies be really existent without<sup>2</sup> his mind or not; so that reason searches

the depth of nature, and enquires after the true causes of natural effects, but fancy creates of its own accord whatsoever it pleases, and delights in its own work. The end of reason, is truth; the end of fancy, is fiction. But mistake me not, when I distinguish fancy from reason; I mean not as if fancy were not made by the rational parts of matter; but by reason I understand a rational search and enquiry into the causes of natural effects; and by fancy a voluntary creation or production of the mind, both being effects, or rather actions, of the rational part of matter; of which, as that is a more profitable and useful study than this, so it is also more laborious and difficult, and requires sometimes the help of fancy to recreate the mind, and withdraw it from its more serious contemplations. And this is the reason why I added this piece of fancy to my philosophical observations, and joined them as two worlds at the ends of their poles; both for my own sake, to divert my studious thoughts which I employed in the contemplation thereof, and to delight the reader with variety, which is always pleasing. But lest my fancy should stray too much, I chose such a fiction as would be agreeable to the subject I treated of in the former parts; it is a description of a new world, not such as Lucian's, or the French man's world in the moon;<sup>3</sup> but a world of my own creating, which I call the Blazing World: the first part whereof is romancical, the second philosophical, and the third is merely fancy, or (as I may call it) fantastical; which if it add any satisfaction to you, I shall account myself a happy creatoress; if not, I must be content to live a melancholy life in my own world; I cannot call it a poor world, if poverty be only want of gold, silver, and jewels; for there is more gold in it than all the chemists ever did, and (as I verily believe) will ever be able to make. As for the rocks of diamonds, I wish with all my soul they might be shared amongst my noble female friends, and upon that condition I would willingly quit my part; and of the gold I should only desire so much as might suffice to repair my noble lord and husband's losses:<sup>4</sup> for I am not covetous, but as ambitious as ever any of my sex was, is, or can be; which is the cause, that though I cannot be Henry the Fifth, or Charles the Second, yet I endeavor to be Margaret the First; and although I have neither power, time nor occasion to conquer the world as Alexander and Caesar did;<sup>5</sup> yet rather than not to be mistress of one, since fortune and the fates would give me none, I have made a world of my own: for which no body, I hope, will blame me, since it is in everyone's power to do the like.

The Description of a New World, Called The Blazing World

* * *

No sooner was the lady brought before the emperor, but he conceived her to be some goddess, and offered to worship her; which she refused, telling him (for by that time she had pretty well learned their language) that although she came out of another world, yet was she but a mortal; at which the emperor rejoicing, made her his wife, and gave her an absolute power to rule and govern all that world as she pleased. But her subjects, who could hardly be persuaded to believe her mortal, tendered her all the veneration and worship due to a deity.

Their priests and governors were princes of the imperial blood, and made eunuchs for that purpose; and as for the ordinary sort of men in that part of the world where the emperor resided, they were of several complexions; not white, black, tawny, olive, or ash-colored; but some appeared of an azure, some of a deep purple, some of a grass-green, some of a scarlet, some of an orange color, etc. Which colors and complexions, whether they were made by bare reflection of light without the assistance of small particles, or by the help of well-ranged and ordered atoms; or by a continual agitation of little globules; or by some pressing and reacting motion, I am not able to determine.<sup>6</sup> The rest of the inhabitants of that world were men of several different sorts, shapes, figures, dispositions, and humors, as I have already made mention heretofore; some were bear-men, some worm-men, some fish- or mear-men, otherwise called sirens;<sup>7</sup> some bird-men, some fly-men, some ant-men, some geese-men, some spider-men, some lice-men, some fox-men, some ape-men, some jackdaw-men, some magpie-men, some parrot-men, some satyrs, some giants, and many more which I cannot all remember; and of these several sorts of men, each followed such a profession as was most proper for the nature of their species, which the Empress encouraged them in, especially those that had applied themselves to the study of several arts and sciences; for they were as ingenious and witty in the invention of profitable and useful arts as we are in our world, nay, more; and to that end she erected schools and founded several societies. The bear-men were to be her experimental philosophers, the bird-men her astronomers, the fly-, worm-, and fish-men her natural philosophers, the ape-men her chemists, the satyrs her Galenic physicians,<sup>8</sup> the fox-men her politicians, the spider- and lice-men her mathematicians, the jackdaw-, magpie-, and parrot-men her orators and logicians, the giants her architects, etc. But before all things, she having got a sovereign power from the emperor over all the world, desired to be informed both of the manner of their religion and government, and to that end she called the priests and statesmen to give her an account of either. Of the statesmen she enquired, first, why they had so few laws? To which they answered that many laws made many divisions, which most commonly did breed factions and at last brake out into open wars. Next, she asked, why they preferred the monarchical form of government before any other? They answered that as it was natural for one body to have but one head, so it was also natural for a politic body to have but one governor; and that a commonwealth which had many governors was like a monster of many heads: besides, said they, a monarchy is a divine form of government and agrees most with our religion; for as there is but one God, whom we all unanimously worship and adore with one faith, so we are resolved to have but one emperor to whom we all submit with one obedience.

Then the Empress seeing that the several sorts of her subjects had each their churches apart, asked the priests whether they were of several religions. They answered Her Majesty that there was no more but one religion in all that world, nor no diversity of opinions in that same religion; for though there were several sorts of men, yet had they all but one opinion concerning the worship and adoration of God. The Empress asked them whether they were Jews, Turks, or Christians? We do not know, said they, what religions those are; but we do all unanimously acknowledge, worship, and adore the only, omnipotent, and eternal God, with all reverence, submission, and duty. Again, the Empress enquired, whether they had several forms of worship? They answered, no: for our devotion and worship consists only in prayers, which we frame according to our several necessities, in petitions, humiliations, thanksgiving, etc. Truly, replied the Empress, I thought you had been either Jews or Turks,<sup>9</sup> because I never perceived any women in your congregations; but what is the reason, you bar them from your religious assemblies? It is not fit, said they, that men and women should be promiscuously together in time of religious worship; for their company hinders devotion, and makes many, instead of praying to God, direct their devotion to their mistresses. But, asked the Empress, have they no congregation of their own to perform the duties of divine worship as well as men? No, answered they: but they stay at home and say their prayers by themselves in their closets.<sup>1</sup> Then the Empress desired to know the reason why the priests and governors of their world were made eunuchs? They answered, to keep them from marriage: for women and children most commonly make disturbance both in church and state. But, said she, women and children have no employment in church or state. 'Tis true, answered they; but although they are not admitted to public employments, yet are they so prevalent with their husbands and parents that many times by their importunate<sup>2</sup> persuasions they cause as much, nay more, mischief secretly, than if they had the management of public affairs.

The bear-men, being exceedingly troubled at her Majesty's displeasure concerning their telescopes, kneeled down, and in the humblest manner petitioned that they might not be broken; for, said they, we take more delight in artificial delusions than in natural truths. Besides, we shall want employments for our senses and subjects for arguments; for were there nothing but truth and no falsehood there would be no occasion for to dispute, and by this means we should want the aim and pleasure of our endeavors in confuting and contradicting each other; neither would one man be thought wiser than another, but all would either be alike knowing and wise, or all would be fools; wherefore we most humbly beseech your imperial Majesty to spare our glasses, which are our only delight and as dear to us as our lives. The Empress at last consented to their request, but upon condition that their disputes and quarrels should remain within their schools, and cause no factions or disturbances in state or government. The bear-men, full of joy, returned their most humble thanks to the Empress; and to make her amends for the displeasure which their telescopes had occasioned, told her Majesty that they had several other artificial optic-glasses which they were sure would give her Majesty a great deal more satisfaction. Amongst the rest they brought forth several microscopes by the means of which they could enlarge the shapes of little bodies and make a louse appear as big as an elephant, and a mite as big as a whale. First of all, they shewed the Empress a gray drone-fly, wherein they observed that the greatest part of her face, nay, of her head, consisted of two large bunches all covered over with a multitude of small pearls or hemispheres in a trigonal order, which pearls were of two degrees, smaller and bigger; the smaller degree was lowermost, and looked towards the ground; the other was upward, and looked sideward, forward, and backward. They were all so smooth and polished that they were able to represent the image of any object, the number of them was in all 14000.<sup>3</sup> After the view of this strange and miraculous creature, and their several observations upon it, the Empress asked them what they judged those little hemispheres might be? They answered that each of them was a perfect eye, by reason they perceived that each was covered with a transparent cornea containing a liquor within them, which resembled the watery or glassy humor of the eye. To which the Empress replied that they might be glassy pearls and yet not eyes, and that perhaps their microscopes did not truly inform them: but they smilingly answered her Majesty that she did not know the virtue of those microscopes; for they did never delude but rectify and inform their senses; nay, the world, said they, would be but blind without them, as it has been in former ages before those microscopes were invented.

Then the Empress asked [the worm-men], whether by their sensitive perceptions they could observe the interior corporeal, figurative motions both of vegetables and minerals? They answered that their senses could perceive them after they were produced, but not before; Nevertheless, said they, although the interior, figurative motions of natural creatures are not subject to the exterior, animal, sensitive perceptions, yet by their rational perception they may judge of them and of their productions if they be regular: whereupon the Empress commanded the bear-men to lend them some of their best microscopes; at which the bear-men smilingly answered her Majesty that their glasses would do them but little service in the bowels of the earth because there was no light; for, said they, our glasses do only represent exterior objects according to the various reflections and positions of light; and wheresoever light is wanting,<sup>4</sup> the glasses will do no good. To which the worm-men replied that although they could not say much of refractions, reflections, inflections, and the like; yet were they not blind, even in the bowels of the earth, for they could see the several sorts of minerals, as also minute animals, that lived there, which minute animal creatures were not blind neither but had some kind of sensitive perception that was as serviceable to them as sight, taste, smell, touch, hearing, etc. was to other animal creatures: by which it is evident that nature has been as bountiful to those creatures that live underground or in the bowels of the earth as to those that live upon the surface of the earth, or in the air, or in water. But howsoever, proceeded the worm-men, although there is light in the bowels of the earth, yet your microscopes will do but little good there, by reason those creatures that live underground have not such an optic sense as those that live on the surface of the earth: wherefore, unless you had such glasses as are proper for their perception, your microscopes will not be any ways advantageous to them. The Empress seemed well pleased with this answer of the worm-men, and asked them further whether minerals, and all other creatures within the earth, were colorless? At which question they could not forbear laughing; and when the Empress asked the reason why they laughed; we most humbly beg your Majesty's pardon, replied they; for we could not choose but laugh when we heard of a colorless body. Why, said the Empress, color is only an accident,<sup>5</sup> which is an immaterial thing, and has no being of itself but in another body. Those, replied they, that informed your Majesty thus, surely their rational motions were very irregular; for how is it possible that a natural nothing can have a being in nature? If it be no substance, it cannot have a being, and if no being, it is nothing; wherefore the distinction between subsisting of itself, and subsisting in another body, is a mere nicety and nonsense; for there is nothing in nature that can subsist of or by itself, (I mean singly) by reason all parts of nature are composed in one body, and though they may be infinitely divided, commixed, and changed in their particulars, yet in general parts cannot be separated from parts as long as nature lasts; nay, we might as probably affirm that infinite nature would be as soon destroyed as that one atom could perish; and therefore your Majesty may firmly believe that there is no body without color, nor no color without body; for color, figure, place, magnitude, and body are all but one thing, without any separation or abstraction from each other.

* * * Again, the Empress asked them, whether there were any non-beings within the earth? To which they answered that they never heard of any such thing; and that if her Majesty would know the truth thereof, she must ask those creatures that are called immaterial spirits, which had a great affinity with non-beings, and perhaps could give her a satisfactory answer to this question. Then, she desired to be informed, what opinion they had of the beginning of forms? They told her Majesty that they did not understand what she meant by this expression; for, said they, there is no beginning in nature, no not of particulars, by reason nature is eternal and infinite and her particulars are subject to infinite changes and transmutations by virtue of their own corporeal, figurative self-motions; so that there's nothing new in nature, nor properly a beginning of anything.

The Empress having thus declared her mind to the ape-men and given them better instructions than perhaps they expected, not knowing that her Majesty had such great and able judgment in natural philosophy, had several conferences with them concerning chemical preparations, which for brevity's sake I'll forbear to rehearse: amongst the rest, she asked how it came that the imperial race appeared so young and yet was reported to have lived so long; some of them two, some three, and some four hundred years? and whether it was by nature or a special divine blessing? To which they answered that there was a certain rock in the parts of that world which contained the golden sands, which rock was hollow within and did produce a gum that was a hundred years before it came to its full strength and perfection; this gum, said they, if it be held in a warm hand will dissolve into an oil, the effects whereof are following: it being given every day for some certain time to an old decayed man, in the bigness of a little pea, will first make him spit for a week or more; after this, it will cause vomits of phlegm, and after that it will bring forth by vomits, humors<sup>6</sup> of several colors; first of a pale yellow, then of a deep yellow, then of a green, and lastly of a black color; and each of these humors have a several taste, some are fresh, some salt, some sour, some bitter, and so forth; neither do all these vomits make them sick, but they come out on a sudden and unawares, without any pain or trouble to the patient: and after it hath done all these mentioned effects, and cleared both the stomach and several other parts of the body, then it works upon the brain, and brings forth of the nose such kind of humors as it did out of the mouth, and much after the same manner; then it will purge by stool, then by urine, then by sweat, and lastly by bleeding at the nose, and the hemorrhoids; all which effects it will perform within the space of six weeks or a little more; for it does not work very strongly, but gently, and by degrees: lastly, when it has done all this it will make the body break out into a thick scab, and cause both hair, teeth, and nails to come off; which scab being arrived to its full maturity, opens first along the back and comes off all in a piece like an armor, and all this is done within the space of four months. After this the patient is wrapped into a cerecloth<sup>7</sup> prepared of certain gums and juices wherein he continues until the time of nine months be expired from the first beginning of the cure, which is the time of a child's formation in the womb. In the meanwhile, his diet is nothing else but eagles' eggs and hinds' milk; and after the cerecloth is taken away he will appear of the age of twenty, both in shape and strength.

[THE EMPRESS CONVERSES WITH IMMATERIAL SPIRITS]

* * * The Empress asked them further whether there was not a world of spirits as well as there is of material creatures? No, answered they, for the word world implies a quantity or multitude of corporeal creatures, but we being immaterial can make no world of spirits. Then she desired to be informed when spirits were made? We do not know, answered they, how and when we were made, nor are we much inquisitive after it; nay, if we did, it would be no benefit, neither for us, nor for you mortals to know it. The Empress replied that cabbalists and divine philosophers<sup>8</sup> said men's rational souls were immaterial and stood as much in need of corporeal vehicles as spirits did. If this be so, answered the spirits, then you are hermaphrodites<sup>9</sup> of nature; but your cabbalists are mistaken, for they take the purest and subtlest parts of matter for immaterial spirits. * * * She asked again whether souls did choose bodies? They answered that Platonics believed the souls of lovers lived in the bodies of their beloved; but surely, said they, if there be a multitude of souls in a world of matter, they cannot miss bodies; for as soon as a soul is parted from one body, it enters into another; and souls having no motion of themselves must of necessity be clothed or embodied with the next parts of matter. If this be so, replied the Empress, then I pray inform me, whether all matter be soulified? The spirits answered, they could not exactly tell that; but if it was true that matter had no other motion but what came from a spiritual power, and that all matter was moving, then no soul could quit a body, but she must of necessity enter into another soulified body, and then there would be two immaterial substances in one body. The Empress asked whether it was not possible that there could be two souls in one body? As for immaterial souls, answered the spirits, it is impossible; for there cannot be two immaterials in one inanimate body, by reason they want parts and place, being bodiless; but there may be numerous material souls in one composed body, by reason every material part has a material natural soul; for nature is but one infinite, self-moving, living, and self-knowing body, consisting of the three degrees of inanimate, sensitive, and rational matter, so intermixed together that no part of nature, were it an atom, can be without any of these three degrees; the sensitive is the life, the rational the soul, and the inanimate part the body of infinite nature. * * * The Empress asked further, whether animal life came out of the spiritual world and did return thither again? The spirits answered, they could not exactly tell; but if it were so, then certainly animal lives must leave their bodies behind them, otherwise the bodies would make the spiritual world a mixed world, that is, partly material, and partly immaterial; but the truth is, said they, spirits being immaterial, cannot properly make a world; for a world belongs to material, not to immaterial creatures. If this be so, replied the Empress, then certainly there can be no world of lives and forms without matter? No, answered the spirits, nor a world of matter without lives and forms; for natural lives and forms cannot be immaterial, no more than matter can be immovable. And therefore natural lives, forms, and matter, are inseparable.

[THE EMPRESS CONSULTS WITH THE IMMATERIAL SPIRITS ABOUT WRITING A CABBALA]

After some time, when the spirits had refreshed themselves in their own vehicles,<sup>1</sup> they sent one of their nimblest spirits to ask the Empress whether she would have a scribe, or whether she would write the Cabbala herself? The Empress received the proffer which they made her with all civility; and told them that she desired a spiritual scribe. The spirits answered that they could dictate, but not write, except they put on a hand or arm or else the whole body of man. The Empress replied, how can spirits arm themselves with gauntlets of flesh? As well, answered they, as man can arm himself with a gauntlet of steel. If it be so, said the Empress, then I will have a scribe. Then the spirits asked her whether she would have the soul of a living or a dead man? Why, said the Empress, can the soul quit a living body and wander or travel abroad? Yes, answered they, for according to Plato's doctrine, there is a conversation of souls, and the souls of lovers live in the bodies of their beloved. Then I will have, answered she, the soul of some ancient famous writer, either of Aristotle, Pythagoras, Plato, Epicurus, or the like.<sup>2</sup> The spirits said that those famous men were very learned, subtle, and ingenious writers; but they were so wedded to their own opinions that they would never have the patience to be scribes. Then, said she, I'll have the soul of one of the most famous modern writers, as either of Galileo, Gassendi, Descartes, Helmont, Hobbes, H. More, etc.<sup>3</sup> The spirits answered, that they were fine ingenious writers, but yet so self-conceited that they would scorn to be scribes to a woman. But, said they, there's a lady, the Duchess of Newcastle, which although she is not one of the most learned, eloquent, witty, and ingenious, yet she is a plain and rational writer; for the principle of her writings is sense and reason, and she will without question be ready to do you all the service she can. That lady then, said the Empress, will I choose for my scribe, neither will the emperor have reason to be jealous, she being one of my own sex. In truth, said the spirit, husbands have reason to be jealous of Platonic lovers, for they are very dangerous, as being not only very intimate and close, but subtle and insinuating. You say well, replied the Empress; wherefore I pray send me the Duchess of Newcastle's soul; which the spirit did; and after she came to wait on the Empress, at her first arrival the Empress embraced and saluted her with a spiritual kiss; then she asked her whether she could write? Yes, answered the Duchess's soul, but not so intelligibly that any reader whatsoever may understand it, unless he be taught to know my characters; for my letters are rather like characters,<sup>4</sup> than well formed letters. Said the Empress, you were recommended to me by an honest and ingenious spirit. Surely, answered the Duchess, the spirit is ignorant of my handwriting. The truth is, said the Empress, he did not mention your handwriting; but he informed me, that you writ sense and reason, and if you can but write so that any of my secretaries may learn your hand, they shall write it out fair and intelligible. The Duchess answered that she questioned not but it might easily be learned in a short time. But, said she to the Empress, what is it that your Majesty would have written? She answered, the Jews' Cabbala. * * * [I]f your Majesty were resolved to make a Cabbala, I would advise you rather to make a poetical or romancical Cabbala, wherein you may use metaphors, allegories, similitudes, etc. and interpret them as you please.<sup>5</sup> With that the Empress thanked the Duchess, and embracing her soul, told her she would take her counsel: she made her also her favorite and kept her sometime in that world, and by this means the Duchess came to know and give this relation of all that passed in that rich, populous, and happy world; and after some time the Empress gave her leave to return to her husband and kindred into her native world, but upon condition that her soul should visit her now and then; which she did: and truly their meeting did produce such an intimate friendship between them that they became Platonic lovers, although they were both females.

[THE DUCHESS WANTS TO BE THE EMPRESS OF HER OWN WORLD]

* * * I love you so well, replied the Empress, that I wish with all my soul you had the fruition of your ambitious desire, and I shall not fail to give you my best advice how to accomplish it; the best informers are the immaterial spirits, and they'll soon tell you whether it be possible to obtain your wish. But, said the Duchess, I have little acquaintance with them, for I never knew any before the time you sent for me. They know you, replied the Empress, for they told me of you, and were the means and instrument of your coming hither: wherefore I'll confer with them and enquire whether there be not another world whereof you may be Empress as well as I am of this? No sooner had the Empress said this, but some immaterial spirits came to visit her, of whom she inquired whether there were but three worlds in all, to wit, the Blazing World where she was in, the world which she came from, and the world where the Duchess lived? The spirits answered, that there were more numerous worlds than the stars which appeared in these three mentioned worlds. Then the Empress asked whether it was not possible that her dearest friend the Duchess of Newcastle might be empress of one of them?<sup>6</sup> Although there be numerous, nay, infinite worlds, answered the spirits, yet none is without government. But is none of these worlds so weak, said she, that it may be surprised or conquered? The spirits answered, that Lucian's World of Lights had been for some time in a snuff,<sup>7</sup> but of late years one Helmont had got it, who since he was emperor of it had so strengthened the immortal parts thereof with mortal outworks as it was for the present impregnable.<sup>8</sup> Said the Empress, if there be such an infinite number of worlds, I am sure not only my friend the Duchess but any other might obtain one. Yes, answered the spirits, if those worlds were uninhabited; but they are as populous as this your Majesty governs. Why, said the Empress, it is not possible to conquer a world? No, answered the spirits, but for the most part conquerors seldom enjoy their conquest, for they being more feared than loved most commonly come to an untimely end. * * * [B]ut we wonder, proceeded the spirits, that you desire to be empress of a terrestrial world when as you can create yourself a celestial world if you please. What, said the Empress, can any mortal be a creator? Yes, answered the spirits; for every human creature can create an immaterial world fully inhabited by immaterial creatures and populous of immaterial subjects such as we are, and all this within the compass of the head or skull; nay, not only so, but he may create a world of what fashion and government he will, and give the creatures thereof such motions, figures, forms, colors, perceptions, etc. as he pleases, and make whirlpools, lights, pressures, and reactions, etc. as he thinks best; nay, he may make a world full of veins, muscles, and nerves, and all these to move by one jolt or stroke: also he may alter that world as often as he pleases, or change it from a natural world to an artificial; he may make a world of ideas, a world of atoms, a world of lights, or whatsoever his fancy leads him to. And since it is in your power to create such a world, what need you to venture life, reputation, and tranquility to conquer a gross material world? For you can enjoy no more of a material world than a particular creature is able to enjoy, which is but a small part, considering the compass of such a world; and you may plainly observe it by your friend the Empress here which although she possesses a whole world, yet enjoys she but a part thereof; neither is she so much acquainted with it that she knows all the places, countries, and dominions she governs. The truth is, a sovereign monarch has the general trouble; but the subjects enjoy all the delights and pleasures in parts; for it is impossible that a kingdom, nay, a country, should be enjoyed by one person at once, except he take the pains to travel into every part and endure the inconveniencies of going from one place to another? Wherefore, since glory, delight, and pleasure lives but in other men's opinions, and can neither add tranquility to your mind nor give ease to your body, why should you desire to be empress of a material world and be troubled with the cares that attend government, when as by creating a world within yourself, you may enjoy all both in whole and in parts, without control or opposition; and may make what world you please, and alter it when you please, and enjoy as much pleasure and delight as a world can afford you? You have converted me, said the Duchess to the spirits, from my ambitious desire; wherefore, I'll take your advice, reject and despise all the worlds without me, and create a world of my own. The Empress said, if I do make such a world, then I shall be mistress of two worlds, one within, and the other without me. That your Majesty may, said the spirits; and so left these two ladies to create two worlds within themselves, who did also part from each other until such time as they had brought their worlds to perfection. The Duchess of Newcastle was most earnest and industrious to make her world, because she had none at present; and first she resolved to frame it according to the opinion of Thales,<sup>9</sup> but she found herself so much troubled with daemons, that they would not suffer her to take her own will, but forced her to obey their orders and commands; which she being unwilling to do, left off from making a world that way, and began to frame one according to Pythagoras's<sup>1</sup> doctrine; but in the creation thereof, she was so puzzled with numbers, how to order and compose the several parts, that she having no skill in arithmetic, was forced also to desist from the making of that world. Then she intended to create a world according to the opinion of Plato; but she found more trouble and difficulty in that than in the two former; for the numerous Ideas<sup>2</sup> having no other motion but what was derived from her mind whence they did flow and issue out, made it a far harder business to her to impart motion to them than puppet-players have in giving motion to every several puppet; in so much that her patience was not able to endure the trouble which those Ideas caused her; wherefore she annihilated also that world and was resolved to make one according to the opinion of Epicurus;<sup>3</sup> which she had no sooner begun but the infinite atoms made such a mist that it quite blinded the perception of her mind; neither was she able to make a vacuum as a receptacle for those atoms, or a place which they might retire into; so that partly for the want of it, and of a good order and method, the confusion of those atoms produced such strange and monstrous figures as did more affright then delight her, and caused such a chaos in her mind as had almost dissolved it. At last, having with much ado cleansed and cleared her mind of these dusty and misty particles, she endeavored to create a world according to Aristotle's opinion;<sup>4</sup> but remembering that her mind, as most of the learned hold it, was immaterial, and that, according to Aristotle's principle, out of nothing, nothing could be made, she was forced also to desist from that work, and then she fully resolved not to take any more patterns from the ancient philosophers, but to follow the opinions of the moderns; and to that end, she endeavored to make a world according to Descartes' opinion; but when she had made the ethereal globules and set them a moving by a strong and lively imagination her mind became so dizzy with their extraordinary swift turning round that it almost put her into a swoon;<sup>5</sup> for her thoughts by their constant tottering did so stagger as if they had all been drunk: wherefore she dissolved that world and began to make another according to Hobbes's opinion; but when all the parts of this imaginary world came to press and drive each other they seemed like a company of wolves that worry sheep, or like so many dogs that hunt after hares;<sup>6</sup> and when she found a reaction equal to those pressures her mind was so squeezed together that her thoughts could neither move forward nor backward, which caused such an horrible pain in her head that although she had dissolved that world, yet she could not without much difficulty settle her mind and free it from that pain which those pressures and reactions had caused in it.

At last, when the Duchess saw that no patterns would do her any good in the framing of her world, she was resolved to make a world of her own invention, and this world was composed of sensitive and rational self-moving matter; indeed, it was composed only of the rational, which is the subtlest and purest degree of matter; for as the sensitive did move and act both to the perceptions and consistency of the body, so this degree of matter at the same point of time (for though the degrees are mixed, yet the several parts may move several ways at one time) did move to the creation of the imaginary world; which world after it was made appeared so curious and full of variety, so well ordered and wisely governed, that it cannot possibly be expressed by words, nor the delight and pleasure which the Duchess took in making this world-of-her-own.

[HAVING MADE HER OWN WORLD, THE EMPRESS WANTS TO SEE THE WORLD THE DUCHESS CAME FROM]

* * * The Duchess used all the means she could to divert her from that journey, telling her that the world she came from was very much disturbed with factions, divisions, and wars; but the Empress would not be persuaded from her design; and lest the emperor or any of his subjects should know of her travel and obstruct her design, she sent for some of the spirits she had formerly conversed withal, and inquired whether none of them could supply the place of her soul in her body at such a time when she was gone to travel into another world? They answered: Yes, they could; for not only one, said they, but many spirits may enter into your body, if you please. The Empress replied, she desired but one spirit to be viceroy<sup>7</sup> of her body in the absence of her soul, but it must be an honest and ingenious spirit, and if it was possible, a female spirit. The spirits told her that there was no difference of sexes amongst them; but, said they, we will choose an honest and ingenious spirit, and such a one as shall so resemble your soul, that neither the emperor nor any of his subjects, although the most divine, shall know whether it be your own soul or not: which the Empress was very glad at; and after the spirits were gone, asked the Duchess how her body was supplied in the absence of her soul? who answered her Majesty that her body, in the absence of her soul, was governed by her sensitive and rational corporeal motions. Thus those two female souls travelled together as lightly as two thoughts into the Duchess her native world; and, which is remarkable, in a moment viewed all the parts of it, and all the actions of all the creatures therein, especially did the Empress's soul take much notice of the several actions of human creatures in all the several nations and parts of that world, and wondered that for all there were so many several nations, governments, laws, religions, opinions, etc. they should all yet so generally agree in being ambitious, proud, self-conceited, vain, prodigal, deceitful, envious, malicious, unjust, revengeful, irreligious, factious, etc. She did also admire that not any particular state, kingdom, or commonwealth was contented with their own shares but endeavored to encroach upon their neighbors, and that their greatest glory was in plunder and slaughter, and yet their victories less than their expenses, and their losses more than their gains; but their being overcome, in a manner their utter ruin. But that she wondered most at was that they should prize or value dirt more than men's lives, and vanity more than tranquility[.]

[AFTER THE EMPRESS AND DUCHESS VISIT THE STUART COURT, THEY VISIT THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE]

[W]hen the Empress's and Duchess's souls were travelling into Nottinghamshire (for that was the place where the Duke did reside), passing through the forest of Sherwood, the Empress's soul was very much delighted with it, as being a dry, plain, and woody place, very pleasant to travel in both in winter and summer; for it is neither much dirty nor dusty at no time. At last they arrived at Welbeck, a house where the Duke dwelled, surrounded all with wood so close and full that the Empress took great pleasure and delight therein, and told the Duchess she never had observed more wood in so little compass in any part of the kingdom she had passed through.<sup>8</sup> The truth is, said she, there seems to be more wood on the seas (she meaning the ships) than on the land. The Duchess told her the reason was that there had been a long civil war in that kingdom, in which most of the best timber-trees and principal palaces were ruined and destroyed; and my dear lord and husband, said she, has lost by it half his woods besides many houses, land, and movable goods so that all the loss out of his particular estate did amount to above half a million of pounds. I wish, said the Empress, he had some of the gold that is in the Blazing World, to repair his losses. The Duchess most humbly thanked her imperial Majesty for her kind wishes; but, said she, wishes will not repair his ruins[.] * * * [W]hen the Duke was gone into the house again, those two souls followed him; where the Empress observing that he went to the exercise of the sword, and was such an excellent and unparalleled master thereof, she was as much pleased with that exercise as she was with the former:<sup>9</sup> but the Duchess's soul being troubled, that her dear lord and husband used such a violent exercise before meat,<sup>1</sup> for fear of overheating himself, without any consideration of the Empress's soul, left her aerial vehicle and entered into her lord. The Empress's soul perceiving this, did the like: and then the Duke had three souls in one body; and had there been but some such souls more, the Duke would have been like the Grand Signior in his seraglio,<sup>2</sup> only it would have been a Platonic seraglio.

[THE EMPRESS AND DUCHESS HAVE ONE FINAL DIALOGUE BEFORE RETURNING TO THEIR OWN WORLDS]

[S]ince your Majesty complains much of the factions of the bear-, fish-, fly-, ape-, and worm-men, the satyrs, spider-men, and the like, and of their perpetual disputes and quarrels, I would advise your Majesty to dissolve all their societies; for 'tis better to be without their intelligences than to have an unquiet and disorderly government. The truth is, said she, wheresoever learning is, there is most commonly also controversy and quarrelling; for there be always some that will know more and be wiser than others: some think their arguments come nearer to truth and are more rational then others; some are so wedded to their own opinions that they'll never yield to reason; and others, though they find their opinions not firmly grounded upon reason, yet for fear of receiving some disgrace by altering them, will nevertheless maintain them against all sense and reason, which must needs breed factions in their schools, which at last break out into open wars and draw sometimes an utter ruin upon a state or government. The Empress told the Duchess that she would willingly follow her advice, but she thought it would be an eternal disgrace to her to alter her own decrees, acts, and laws. To which the Duchess answered that it was so far from a disgrace as it would rather be for her Majesty's eternal honor to return from a worse to a better, and would express and declare her to be more than ordinary wise and good; so wise as to perceive her own errors, and so good as not to persist in them, which few did: for which, said she, you will get a glorious fame in this world, and an eternal glory hereafter, and I shall pray for it so long as I live. Upon which advice the Empress's soul embraced and kissed the Duchess's soul with an immaterial kiss, and shed immaterial tears that she was forced to part from her, finding her not a flattering parasite,<sup>3</sup> but a true friend; and in truth, such was their Platonic friendship as these two loving souls did often meet and rejoice in each other's conversation.

The Epilogue to the Reader

By this poetical description you may perceive that my ambition is not only to be empress, but authoress of a whole world; and that the worlds I have made, both the Blazing and the other philosophical world mentioned in the first part of this description, are framed and composed of the most pure, that is, the rational parts of matter, which are the parts of my mind; which creation was more easily and suddenly effected than the conquests of the two famous monarchs of the world, Alexander and Caesar. Neither have I made such disturbances, and caused so many dissolutions of particulars, otherwise named deaths, as they did; for I have destroyed but some few men in a little boat, which died through the extremity of cold, and that by the hand of justice, which was necessitated to punish their crime of stealing away a young and beauteous lady. And in the formation of those worlds, I take more delight and glory than ever Alexander or Caesar did in conquering this terrestrial world; and though I have made my Blazing World a peaceable world, allowing it but one religion, one language, and one government, yet could I make another world as full of factions, divisions and wars, as this is of peace and tranquility; and the rational figures of my mind might express as much courage to fight as Hector and Achilles had; and be as wise as Nestor, as eloquent as Ulysses, and as beautiful as Helen.<sup>4</sup> But I esteeming peace before war, wit before policy, honesty before beauty, instead of the figures of Alexander, Caesar, Hector, Achilles, Nestor, Ulysses, Helen, etc. chose rather the figure of honest Margaret Newcastle, which now I would not change for all this terrestrial world; and if any should like the world I have made, and be willing to be my subjects, they may imagine themselves such, and they are such, I mean in their minds, fancies, or imaginations; but if they cannot endure to be subjects, they may create worlds of their own and govern themselves as they please. But yet let them have a care not to prove unjust usurpers and to rob me of mine: for, concerning the philosophical world, I am empress of it myself; and as for the Blazing World, it having an empress already who rules it with great wisdom and conduct, which empress is my dear Platonic friend, I shall never prove so unjust, treacherous, and unworthy to her as to disturb her government, much less to depose her from her imperial throne, for the sake of any other, but rather choose to create another world for another friend.

JOHN MILTON

1608–1674

As a young man, John Milton proclaimed himself the future author of a great English epic. He promised a poem devoted to the glory of the nation, centering on the deeds of King Arthur or some other ancient hero. When Milton finally published his epic thirty years later, readers found instead a poem about the Fall of Satan and humankind, set in Heaven, Hell, and the Garden of Eden, in which traditional heroism is denigrated and England is not mentioned once. What lay between the youthful promise and the eventual fulfillment was a career marked by private tragedy and public controversy.

In his poems and prose tracts, Milton often alludes to crises in his own life: his choice of a vocation, the early death of friends, painful disappointment in marriage, and the catastrophe of blindness. At the same time, no other major English poet has been so deeply involved in the major intellectual debates and political crises of his times, including the new science, freedom of the press, religious liberty and toleration, and republicanism. It is scarcely possible to treat Milton's career separately from the history of England in his lifetime, not only because he was an active participant in affairs of church and state, but also because when he signed himself, as he often did, "John Milton, Englishman," he was presenting himself as England's prophetic bard. He considered himself the spokesman for the nation as a whole even when he found himself isolated in the minority.

From an early age, Milton fashioned himself self-consciously as an author. He deliberately set out to follow the steps of the ideal poetic career—beginning with pastoral (the mode of several of his early poems) and ending with epic. His models for this progression were Virgil and Spenser: he called the latter “a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas.” (Scotus and Aquinas were influential medieval Christian philosopher-theologians, or “Scholastics.”) Milton resembles Spenser in his constant juxtaposition of biblical and classical stories and in his ability to continually transform the ideas, literary forms, and values of his literary and intellectual heritage to make it relevant to himself and to his age.

Milton’s family was middle-class, cultured, and staunchly Protestant. His father was a scrivener—a combination of solicitor, investment adviser, and moneylender—as well as an amateur composer with some reputation in musical circles. At age seventeen Milton wrote a funeral elegy for the death of his sister’s infant daughter and educated her two sons (the older, Edward, would later write his biography). Milton had private tutors at home and also attended one of London’s finest schools, St. Paul’s. At school he began a close friendship with Charles Diodati, with whom he exchanged Latin poems and letters over several years, and for whose death in 1638 he wrote a moving Latin elegy. Milton’s excellent early education gave him special facility in languages (Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Aramaic, Italian, and French; later he learned Spanish and Dutch).

In 1625 Milton entered Christ’s College, Cambridge. He was briefly suspended during his freshman year over a dispute with his tutor, but graduated in 1629 and was made Master of Arts three years later. As his surviving student orations indicate, he was profoundly disappointed in his university education, reviling the scholastic logic and Latin rhetorical exercises that still formed its core as “futile and barren controversies and wordy disputes” that “stupefy and benumb the mind.” Milton expressed contempt for his fellow students: “They thought themselves gallant men, and I thought them fools.” They, in turn, dubbed him “the Lady of Christ’s College,” but whether as compliment or insult is the subject of scholarly debate. He had gone to university with the serious intention of taking orders in the Church of England—the obvious vocation for a young man of his scholarly and religious bent—but became increasingly disenchanted with the lack of reformation in the church under Archbishop William Laud and later proclaimed himself “church-outed by the prelates.”

Above all, Milton came to believe more and more strongly that he was destined to serve his language, his country, and his God as a poet. He began by writing occasional poetry in Latin, the usual language for collegiate poets and for poets who sought a European audience. Milton wrote some of the century’s best Latin poems, but as early as 1628 he announced to a university audience his determination to glorify England in English poetry. In his first major English poem (written, he claimed, when he was twenty-one), the hymn “On the Morning of Christ’s Nativity,” Milton portrayed himself as a prophet. This poem is very different from Richard Crashaw’s Nativity hymn, with its Spenserian echoes, its allusion to Roman Catholic and Laudian “idolatry”, and its stunning shifts from the Creation to Doomsday, from the manger at Bethlehem to the cosmos, and from the shepherd’s chatter to the music of the spheres. A few years later, Milton wrote the companion poems “L’Allegro” and “Il Penseroso,” achieving a stylistic tour de force by creating from the same meter (octosyllabic couplets) entirely different sound qualities, rhythmic effects, and moods. These poems celebrate, respectively, Mirth and Melancholy, as personifications, defining them by their ancestry, lifestyles, associates, landscapes, activities, music, and literature. In 1634, at the invitation of his musician friend Henry Lawes, he wrote a masque popularly known as “Comus,” in which the villain is a refined, seductive, and dissolute Cavalier. “Comus” challenges the royalist politics of previous court masques by locating true virtue and good pleasure in the households of the country magistracy rather than at court.

After university, as part of his preparation for a poetic career, Milton undertook a six-year program of self-directed reading in ancient and modern theology, philosophy, history, science, politics, and literature. He was profoundly grateful to his father for sparing him the grubby business of making money and for financing these years of private study, followed by a fifteen-month "grand tour" of France, Italy, and Switzerland. In 1638 Milton contributed "Lycidas" to a Cambridge volume lamenting the untimely death of a college contemporary. This beautiful pastoral funeral elegy explores Milton's deep anxieties about poetry as a vocation, confronts the terrors of mortality in language of astonishing resonance and power, and incorporates a furious apocalyptic diatribe on the corrupt Church of England clergy. Milton nonetheless maintained relationships across religious and ideological divides; while he was in Italy he exchanged verses and learned compliments with various Catholic intellectuals and men of letters, some of whom became his friends. In 1645 he published his English and Latin poems together in a two-part volume, Poems of Mr. John Milton.

Upon his return to England, Milton opened a school and was soon involved in Presbyterian efforts to depose the bishops and to reform church liturgy, writing five "antiprelatical tracts" denouncing and satirizing bishops. These were the first in a series of political interventions Milton produced over the next twenty years, characterized by remarkable courage and fierce independence of thought. He wrote successively on church government, divorce, education, freedom of the press, and, most radically, on regicide and republicanism. From the outbreak of the Civil War in 1642 until his death, Milton allied himself with the Puritan cause, but his religious opinions developed throughout his life, from relative orthodoxy in his youth to ever more heretical positions in his later years. And while his family belonged to the class that benefited most directly from Europe's first bourgeois revolution, his brother fought on the royalist side. The Milton brothers, like most of their contemporaries, did not see these wars as a confrontation of class interests, but as a conflict between radically differing theories of government and, above all, religion.

Some of Milton's treatises were prompted by personal concerns. He interrupted his polemical tract, The Reason of Church Government Urged Against Prelaty (1642), to devote several pages to a discussion of his poetic vocation and the great works he hoped to produce in the future. His tracts about divorce, which can hardly have seemed the most pressing of issues in the strife-torn years 1643–45, were motivated by his own unhappy marriage. When he was thirty-three, he had married Mary Powell, aged seventeen; just a few months after the wedding, she left him to return to her royalist family. In response, Milton wrote several tracts vigorously advocating the man's right to divorce on the grounds of incompatibility and with the right to remarry—a position almost unheard of at the time and one that required a boldly antiliteral reading of the bible. At its heart this tract was a defense of companionate marriage, a union not just of bodies but of minds, in which the wife was meant to be “an intimate and speaking help.” The fact that these tracts could not be licensed and were roundly denounced in Parliament, from pulpits, and in print prompted him to write Areopagitica (1644), an impassioned attack against prepublication censorship, valorizing a “free and open encounter” between truth and falsehood. He saw these personal issues—reformed poetry, domestic liberty achieved through divorce, and a free press—as vital to the creation of a reformed English culture.

In 1649, just after Parliament executed Charles I, Milton published The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (see p. 1328). This treatise defends the revolution and the regicide and develops a “contract theory” of government based on the inalienable and ongoing sovereignty of the people—a version of contract very different from that of Thomas Hobbes, who argued for a one-time and irrevocable contract between king and people that rendered the monarch's powers absolute. Milton was appointed Latin Secretary to the Commonwealth government (1649–53) and to Oliver Cromwell's Protectorate (1654–58), which meant that he wrote the regimes' official letters—mostly in Latin—to foreign governments and heads of state. He also wrote polemical defenses of the new government:

Eikonoklastes (1649) ("Iconoclast"), to counter the powerful emotional effect of Eikon Basilike ("Royal Portrait"), supposedly written by the king just before his death, and two Latin Defenses upholding the regicide and the new republic to European audiences.

During these years Milton suffered a series of tragedies. Mary Powell returned to him in 1645 but died in childbirth in 1652, leaving four children; his only son, John, died a few months later. That same year Milton became totally blind; he claimed that his boyhood habit of reading until midnight had weakened his eyesight and that writing his first Defense against the political (and personal) attacks of the Frenchman Claudius Salmasius had destroyed it. Milton married again in 1656, apparently happily, but his new wife, Katherine Woodcock, died two years later, along with their infant daughter. Katherine is probably the subject of his sonnet "Methought I Saw My Late Espoused Saint," a moving dream vision poignant with the sense of loss—both of sight and of love. The few sonnets Milton wrote during the height of the Commonwealth and Protectorate revolutionized the genre. He used the small sonnet form, hitherto confined (in England) mainly to matters of love, for new and grand subjects: praises of Cromwell and other statesmen mixed with admonition and political advice; a prophetic denunciation calling down God's vengeance for Protestants massacred in Piedmont; and an emotional account of his continuing struggle to come to terms with his blindness as part of God's providence.

Cromwell's death in 1658 led to mounting political chaos, and soon the restoration of the Stuart monarchy seemed inevitable. Milton held out against that tide. His several tracts of 1659–60 developed radical arguments for broad toleration, church disestablishment, and republican government. And just as he was among the first to attack the power of the bishops, so he was virtually the last defender of the "Good Old Cause" of the Revolution; the second edition of his Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth appeared in late April 1660, scarcely two weeks before the monarchy was restored. For several months after that event, Milton was in hiding, his life in danger. Friends, especially the poet Andrew Marvell, managed to secure his pardon and later his release from a brief imprisonment. He lived out his last years in reduced circumstances, plagued by ever more serious attacks of gout but grateful for the domestic comforts provided by his third wife, Elizabeth Minshull, thirty years his junior, whom he had married in 1663 and who survived him.

In such conditions, dismayed by the defeat of his political and religious cause, totally blind and often ill, threatened by the plague of 1665 and the great fire of 1666, and entirely dependent on amanuenses and friends to transcribe his dictation, Milton completed his great epic poem. Paradise Lost (1667/74) radically reconceives the epic genre and epic heroism, choosing as protagonists a domestic couple rather than martial heroes and degrading the military glory celebrated in epic tradition in favor of "the better fortitude / Of patience and heroic martyrdom." It offers a sweeping imaginative vision of Hell, Chaos, and Heaven; the creation of the world out of "one first matter all"; the sex lives of angels; prelapsarian life in Eden; the power of the devil's political rhetoric; the psychology of Satan, Adam, and Eve; and the high drama of the Fall and its aftermath.

In his final years, Milton published works on grammar and logic chiefly written during his days as a schoolmaster, a history of Britain (1670) from the earliest times to the Norman Conquest, and a treatise urging toleration for Puritan dissenters (1673). He also continued work on his Christian Doctrine, a Latin treatise that reveals how far he had moved from the orthodoxies of his day. The work denies the Trinity (making the Son and the Holy Spirit much inferior to God the Father), insists upon free will against Calvinist predestination, and privileges the inspiration of the Spirit even above the Scriptures and the Ten Commandments. Such heterodox positions could not be made public in Milton's lifetime, and Christian Doctrine was lost to view for over 150 years.

In 1671 Milton published two poems that reflect the harsh repression all Puritan dissenters faced after the Restoration. Paradise Regained, a brief epic in four books, treats Jesus's temptation in the wilderness as an intellectual struggle through which the hero comes to understand both himself and his mission. He defeats Satan by renouncing the whole panoply of faulty versions of the good life and of God's kingdom. Samson Agonistes, a classical tragedy, is the more harrowing for the resemblances between its tragic hero and its author. The deeply flawed, pain-wracked, blind, and defeated Samson struggles, in dialogues with his visitors, to gain self-knowledge, discovering at last a desperate way to triumph over his captors and offer his people a chance to regain their freedom. In these last poems Milton sought to educate his readers in moral and political wisdom and virtue. Only through such inner transformation, Milton now firmly believed, would people come to value—and so perhaps reclaim—the intellectual, religious, and political freedom he so vigorously promoted in his work.

FROM* POEMS

On the Morning of Christ's Nativity<sup>1</sup>

1

This is the month, and this the happy morn
Wherein the son of Heaven's eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring;
5 For so the holy sages once did sing,
That he our deadly forfeit<sup>2</sup> should release,
And with his Father work us a perpetual peace.

2

That glorious form, that light unsufferable,<sup>o</sup>
And that far-beaming blaze of majesty
10 Wherewith he wont<sup>o</sup> at Heaven's high council-table
To sit the midst of Trinal Unity,<sup>3</sup>
He laid aside; and here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay.

3

15 Say, heavenly Muse, shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the infant God?
Hast thou no verse, no hymn, or solemn strain,
To welcome him to this his new abode,
Now while the heaven by the sun's team untrod<sup>4</sup>
20 Hath took no print of the approaching light,
And all the spangled host<sup>o</sup> keep watch in squadrons bright?

4

See how from far upon the eastern road
The star-led wizards<sup>5</sup> haste with odors sweet:
O run, prevent<sup>o</sup> them with thy humble ode,
And lay it lowly at his blessed feet;
25 Have thou the honor first thy Lord to greet,
And join thy voice unto the angel choir,
From out His secret altar touched with hallowed fire.<sup>6</sup>

The Hymn

1

It was the winter wild
While the Heaven-born child
30 All meanly wrapped in the rude manger lies;
Nature in awe to him
Had doffed her gaudy trim<sup>7</sup>
With her great Master so to sympathize;
It was no season then for her
35 To wanton with the sun, her lusty paramour.

Only with speeches fair
She woos the gentle air
To hide her guilty front<sup>o</sup> with innocent snow,
And on her naked shame,
40 Pollute with sinful blame,
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw,<sup>8</sup>
Confounded that her Maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.

3

45 But he her fears to cease
Sent down the meek-eyed Peace;
She, crowned with olive green, came softly sliding
Down through the turning sphere,<sup>9</sup>
His ready harbinger,<sup>o</sup>
50 With turtle<sup>1</sup> wing the amorous clouds dividing,
And waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.

4

No war or battle's sound
Was heard the world around;<sup>2</sup>
The idle spear and shield were high up-hung;
55 The hookèd chariot<sup>3</sup> stood
Unstained with hostile blood,
The trumpet spake not to the armèd throng,
And kings sat still with awful<sup>o</sup> eye,
60 As if they surely knew their sovereign Lord was by.

5

But peaceful was the night
Wherein the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began:
The winds, with wonder whist,<sup>o</sup>
Smoothly the waters kissed,
65 Whispering new joys to the mild ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm<sup>4</sup> sit brooding on the charmèd wave.

The stars with deep amaze

70 Stand fixed in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence,
And will not take their flight
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer<sup>5</sup> that often warned them thence;
But in their glimmering orbs did glow
75 Until their Lord himself bespoke,<sup>o</sup> and bid them go.

7

And though the shady gloom
Had given day her room,
The sun himself withheld his wonted speed,
And hid his head for shame
80 As<sup>o</sup> his inferior flame
The new-enlightened world no more should need;
He saw a greater Sun<sup>6</sup> appear
Than his bright throne or burning axletree<sup>o</sup> could bear.

8

85 The shepherds on the lawn
Or ere the point of<sup>o</sup> dawn
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they than<sup>o</sup>
That the mighty Pan<sup>7</sup>
90 Was kindly<sup>8</sup> come to live with them below;
Perhaps their loves or else their sheep
Was all that did their silly<sup>o</sup> thoughts so busy keep.

9

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet
As never was by mortal finger struck,

95 Divinely warbled voice
Answering the stringèd noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took;
The air, such pleasure loath to lose,
100 With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.◊

10

Nature that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat,<sup>9</sup> the airy region thrilling,◊
Now was almost won
To think her part was done,
105 And that her reign had here its last fulfilling;
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all heaven and earth in happier union.

11

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light
110 That with long beams the shamefaced night arrayed;◊
The helmèd cherubim
And sworded seraphim<sup>1</sup>
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn choir
115 With unexpressive◊ notes to Heaven's newborn heir.

12

Such music (as 'tis said)
Before was never made,
But when of old the sons of morning sung,<sup>2</sup>
120 While the Creator great

His constellations set,
And the well-balanced world on hinges<sup>o</sup> hung,
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the welt'ring waves their oozy channel keep.

13

125 Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears
(If ye have power to touch our senses so),
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time,
And let the bass of Heaven's deep organ blow;
130 And with your ninefold harmony<sup>3</sup>
Make up full consort to th' angelic symphony.

14

For if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
135 Time will run back and fetch the age of gold;<sup>4</sup>
And speckled vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous sin will melt from earthly mold,
And Hell itself will pass away,
140 And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

15

Yea, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Th' enameled arras<sup>o</sup> of the rainbow wearing,
And Mercy set between,<sup>5</sup>
Throned in celestial sheen,
145 With radiant feet the tissued<sup>6</sup> clouds down steering;

And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall.

16

But wisest Fate says no,
This must not yet be so;
150     The Babe lies yet in smiling infancy<sup>7</sup>
That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss,
      So both himself and us to glorify;
Yet first to those ychained<sup>8</sup> in sleep 155     The wakeful trump of doom must thunder through the deep,

17

With such a horrid clang
As on Mount Sinai rang
      While the red fire and smoldering clouds outbrake;
The agèd earth, aghast
160     With terror of that blast,
      Shall from the surface to the center shake,
When at the world's last session,
The dreadful Judge in middle air shall spread His throne.<sup>9</sup>

18

And then at last our bliss
165     Full and perfect is,
      But now begins; for from this happy day
Th' old dragon under ground,<sup>1</sup>
In straiter limits bound,
      Not half so far casts his usurpèd sway,
170     And wroth to see his kingdom fail,

Swinges<sup>9</sup> the scaly horror of his folded tail.

19

The oracles are dumb;<sup>2</sup>
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the archèd roof in words deceiving.
175 Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.<sup>3</sup>
No nightly trance or breathèd spell
180 Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

20

The lonely mountains o'er
And the resounding shore
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament;
From haunted spring and dale
185 Edged with the poplar pale,
The parting genius<sup>4</sup> is with sighing sent;
With flower-in-woven tresses torn
The nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn.

21

In consecrated earth
And on the holy hearth,
190 The lars and lemures<sup>5</sup> moan with midnight plaint;
In urns and altars round
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the flamens<sup>6</sup> at their service quaint;
And the chill marble seems to sweat,
195 While each peculiar power forgoes his wonted seat.

22

Peor and Baalim<sup>7</sup>
Forsake their temples dim,
With that twice-battered god of Palestine,<sup>8</sup>
And moonèd Ashtaroth,<sup>9</sup>
200 Heaven's queen and mother both,
Now sits not girt with tapers' holy shine;
The Libyc Hammon<sup>1</sup> shrinks<sup>o</sup> his horn;
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded Thammuz mourn.<sup>2</sup>

23

And sullen Moloch,<sup>3</sup> fled,
205 Hath left in shadows dread
His burning idol all of blackest hue;
In vain with cymbals' ring
They call the grisly king
In dismal dance about the furnace blue;
210 The brutish gods of Nile as fast,<sup>4</sup>
Isis and Orus and the dog Anubis haste.

24

Nor is Osiris seen
In Memphian grove or green,
215 Trampling the unshowered<sup>o</sup> grass with lowings loud,
Nor can he be at rest
Within his sacred chest;
Naught but profoundest Hell can be his shroud.
In vain with timbrelled anthems dark
220 The sable-stolèd sorcerers bear his worshipped ark.<sup>5</sup>

25

He feels from Judah's land
 The dreaded Infant's hand,
 The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyne;
 Nor all the gods beside Longer dare abide,
 225 Not Typhon huge, ending in snaky twine;
 Our Babe, to show his godhead true,
 Can in his swaddling bands control the damnèd crew.<sup>6</sup>

26

So when the sun in bed,
 Curtained with cloudy red,
 230 Pillows his chin upon an orient<sup>o</sup> wave,
 The flocking shadows pale
 Troop to th' infernal jail;
 Each fettered ghost slips to his several<sup>o</sup> grave;
 And the yellow-skirted fays
 235 Fly after the night-steeds, leaving their moon-loved maze.<sup>7</sup>

27

But see! the Virgin blessed
 Hath laid her Babe to rest.
 Time is our tedious song should here have ending.
 Heaven's youngest-teemèd<sup>o</sup> star
 240 Hath fixed her polished car,<sup>o</sup>
 Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp attending:
 And all about the courtly stable
 Bright-harnessed<sup>o</sup> angels sit in order serviceàble.

- Note 1:

This ode was written on Christmas 1629, a few weeks after Milton's twenty-first birthday. He placed it first in the 1645 edition of his poems, claiming in it his vocation as inspired poet. The poem often looks back to Spenser: the first four stanzas are an adaptation of the Spenserian stanza; there are several Spenserian archaisms (y- prefixes) and some Spenser-like onomatopoeia (lines 156, 172).

- Note 2: The sentence of death consequent on the Fall. "Holy sages": for example, the prophet Isaiah (chaps. 9 and 40) and Job (chap. 19) were thought to have foretold Christ as Messiah.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Trinity: Father, Son (incarnate in Christ), and Holy Ghost.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In classical myth, the sun (Phoebus Apollo) drove across heaven in a chariot drawn by horses.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Magi who followed the star of Bethlehem to find and adore the infant Christ.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Isaiah's lips were touched by a burning coal from the altar, purifying him and confirming him as a prophet (Isaiah 6:7).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Put off her garments of leaves and flowers.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Nature fell also with the Fall, so she is a harlot (line 36), not a pure maiden, despite her white garment of snow.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The Ptolemaic spheres, revolving around the earth.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Like a turtledove, which, like the myrtle (next line), is an emblem of Venus (Love), as the olive crown is of peace.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Around the time of Christ's birth, the "Peace of Augustus" held, during which no major wars disturbed the Roman Empire; that peace was sometimes attributed to Christ.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: War chariots were built with scythelike hooks on the axles, to wound and kill.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Kingfishers (halcyons) were thought to calm the seas during the time they nested on its waves.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Not Satan but the morning star, Venus.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The familiar Son/sun pun.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Pan, patron of shepherds, is a merry, goat-footed god, but he was often conceived in more exalted terms and identified with Christ, because his name in Greek means "all."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: By nature; also, benevolently.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Cynthia is the moon. Nature rules below the moon (the region of the four elements and subject to decay). The unchanging, perfect region above the moon is normally the only place one could hear either angels' hymnody or the music of the spheres.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Seraphim and cherubim are the highest of the traditional nine orders of angels; they are often portrayed in martial attire.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Job 38:4–7: "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? . . . / When the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Pythagorean theory, each of the nine moving spheres sounds a distinctive note (the tenth, the primum mobile, does not move). It was supposed that, after the Fall, this harmonious music of the spheres could not be heard on earth. Earth would be the "bass" of the cosmic organ, sounding under that planetary harmony.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The first age, of human innocence, classical mythology's equivalent to the Garden of Eden.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
This allegorical scene, suggesting a masque descent, alludes to Psalm 85:10, part of the liturgy for Christmas: "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Peace, in the poem, has already descended (lines 45–52). The lines also evoke the flight of Astraea, the classical goddess of justice, at the end of the Golden Age, and her return with its restoration, celebrated by Virgil in his fourth eclogue, applied by him to the birth of Pollio but by Christians to Christ.

- Note 6: Cloth woven with silver and gold. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Latin word, infans, means, literally, "nonspeaking." Return to reference 7
- Note 8: One of Spenser's archaic y- prefixes. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Moses received the Ten Commandments amid thunder and lightning atop Mount Sinai (Exodus 19); the Last Judgment will take place amid similar uproar. "Session": court proceeding. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The devil (Revelation 20:2). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: An ancient tradition held that pagan oracles ceased with the coming of Christ; another identified the pagan gods with the fallen angels. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Apollo's main shrine was at Delphi, on the slopes of Mount Parnassus. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A local deity guarding a particular place. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Spirits of the dead. "Lars": household gods. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Roman priests. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Other manifestations of Baal, a Canaanite sun god. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Dagon, the Philistine god whose image at Ashdod was twice thrown down when the Ark of the Covenant was placed beside it (1 Samuel 5:2–4). Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Ashtaroth, also known as Astarte, was a Phoenician fertility goddess identified with the moon. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Hammon, also Ammon, an Egyptian and Libyan god, depicted as a ram. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Thammuz, lover of Ashtaroth, was killed by a boar and lamented by the Phoenician women; he was taken into the Greek pantheon as Adonis.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Moloch was a Phoenician fire god, a brazen idol with a human body and a calf's head; the statue ("his burning idol," line 207) was heated flaming hot and children were thrown into its embrace, with cymbals drowning out their cries (2 Kings 22:10).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Egyptian gods had some features of animals: Isis (next line) was represented with cow's horns, Orus, or Horus, with a hawk's head; Osiris (lines 213–15) sometimes had the shape of a bull.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Osiris's image was carried from temple to temple in a wooden chest, and his priests accompanied it with tambourines ("timbrels").Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Typhon was a hundred-headed monster who was a serpent below the waist, a figure for the devil. The infant Christ controlling him calls up (as a foreshadowing) the story of the infant Hercules strangling two giant serpents in his cradle.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Fairy rings. "Night-steeds": horses drawing Night's chariot.Return to reference 7

On Shakespeare<sup>1</sup>

What needs my Shakespeare for his honored bones
The labor of an age in pilèd stones,
Or that his hallowed relics should be hid
Under a star-ypointing<sup>2</sup> pyramid?
5 Dear son of memory,<sup>3</sup> great heir of fame,
What<sup>o</sup> need'st thou such weak witness of thy name?
Thou in our wonder and astonishment
Hast built thyself a livelong<sup>o</sup> monument.
For whilst to th' shame of slow-endeavoring art
10 Thy easy numbers<sup>o</sup> flow, and that each heart
Hath from the leaves of thy unvalued<sup>o</sup> book
Those Delphic<sup>4</sup> lines with deep impression took,
Then thou, our fancy of itself bereaving,
Dost make us marble with too much conceiving;<sup>5</sup>
15 And so sepulchred in such pomp dost lie,
That kings for such a tomb would wish to die.

1630 Endnotes

L'Allegro<sup>1</sup>

Hence loathèd Melancholy,<sup>2</sup>
Of Cerberus<sup>3</sup> and blackest midnight born,
In Stygian<sup>4</sup> cave forlorn
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy,
Find out some uncouth<sup>o</sup> cell,
5 Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night raven sings;
There under ebon shades and low-browed rocks,
As ragged as thy locks,
In dark Cimmerian<sup>5</sup> desert ever dwell.
10 But come thou goddess fair and free,
In heaven yclept Euphrosyne,<sup>6</sup>
And by men, heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a birth
With two sister Graces more
15 To ivy-crownèd Bacchus bore;
Or whether (as some sager sing)
The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
Zephyr with Aurora playing,
As he met her once a-Maying,
20 There on beds of violets blue,
And fresh-blown<sup>o</sup> roses washed in dew,
Filled her with thee a daughter fair,
So buxom,<sup>o</sup> blithe, and debonair.
Haste thee nymph, and bring with thee
25 Jest and youthful Jollity,
Quips<sup>o</sup> and Cranks,<sup>o</sup> and wanton Wiles,
Nods, and Becks,<sup>o</sup> and wreathèd Smiles,

Such as hang on Hebe's<sup>7</sup> cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
30 Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.
Come, and trip it<sup>o</sup> as ye go
On the light fantastic toe,
And in thy right hand lead with thee
35 The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty;
And if I give thee honor due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew
To live with her and live with thee,
In unreprovèd<sup>o</sup> pleasures free;
40 To hear the lark begin his flight,
And, singing, startle the dull night,
From his watch tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
Then to come in spite of<sup>o</sup> sorrow,
45 And at my window bid good morrow,
Through the sweetbriar or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine.
While the cock with lively din
Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
50 And to the stack or the barn door,
Stoutly struts his dames before;
Oft listening how the hounds and horn
Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn,
From the side of some hoar<sup>o</sup> hill,
55 Through the high wood echoing shrill.
Sometime walking not unseen
By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate,
Where the great sun begins his state,<sup>8</sup>
60 Robed in flames and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries dight;<sup>o</sup>
While the plowman near at hand

Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
65 And the mower whets his scythe,
And every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
Straight<sup>o</sup> mine eye hath caught new pleasures
Whilst the landscape round it measures,
70 Russet lawns and fallows<sup>o</sup> gray,
Where the nibbling flocks do stray,
Mountains on whose barren breast
The laboring clouds do often rest;
Meadows trim with daisies pied,<sup>o</sup>
75 Shallow brooks, and rivers wide.
Towers and battlements it sees
Bosomed high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure<sup>9</sup> of neighboring eyes.
80 Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes
From betwixt two aged oaks,
Where Corydon and Thyrsis met
Are at their savory dinner set
Of herbs and other country messes,
85 Which the neat-handed<sup>o</sup> Phyllis dresses;
And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis<sup>1</sup> to bind the sheaves;
Or if the earlier season lead
To the tanned<sup>o</sup> haycock in the mead.
90 Sometimes with secure<sup>o</sup> delight
The upland hamlets will invite,
When the merry bells ring round
And the jocund rebecks<sup>2</sup> sound
To many a youth and many a maid,
95 Dancing in the checkered shade;
And young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holiday,

Till the livelong daylight fail;
Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
100 With stories told of many a feat,
How fairy Mab the junkets<sup>3</sup> eat;
She was pinched and pulled, she said,
And he, by friar's lantern led,
105 Tells how the drudging goblin<sup>4</sup> sweat
To earn his cream bowl duly set,
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn
That ten day laborers could not end;
Then lies him down the lubber fiend,<sup>5</sup>
110 And stretched out all the chimney's<sup>o</sup> length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And crop-full<sup>o</sup> out of doors he flings
Ere the first cock his matin rings.
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
115 By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men,
Where throngs of knights and barons bold
In weeds of peace high triumphs<sup>6</sup> hold,
120 With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
Rain influence,<sup>7</sup> and judge the prize
Of wit or arms, while both contend
To win her grace, whom all commend.
There let Hymen<sup>8</sup> oft appear
125 In saffron robe, with taper clear,
And pomp and feast and revelry,
With masque and antique<sup>o</sup> pageantry;
Such sights as youthful poets dream
On summer eves by haunted stream.
130 Then to the well-trod stage anon,
If Jonson's learned sock be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child,

Warble his native woodnotes wild.<sup>9</sup>
 And ever against eating cares;<sup>1</sup>
 135 Lap me in soft Lydian airs,<sup>2</sup>
 Married to immortal verse
 Such as the meeting soul may pierce
 In notes with many a winding bout<sup>o</sup>
 Of linkèd sweetness long drawn out,
 140 With wanton heed and giddy cunning,
 The melting voice through mazes running,
 Untwisting all the chains that tie
 The hidden soul of harmony;
 That Orpheus' self may heave his head
 145 From golden slumber on a bed
 Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear
 Such strains as would have won the ear
 Of Pluto, to have quite set free
 His half-regained Eurydice.<sup>3</sup>
 150 These delights if thou canst give,
 Mirth, with thee I mean to live.<sup>4</sup>

ca. 1631 Endnotes

1645

- Note 1:
 The companion poems "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" are both written in tetrameter couplets, except for the first ten lines, but Milton's virtuosity produces entirely different tempos and sound qualities in the two poems. The Italian titles name, respectively, the cheerful, mirthful man and the melancholy, contemplative man. The poems are carefully balanced and their different values celebrated, though "Il Penseroso's" greater length and final coda may intimate that life's superiority. Mirth, the presiding deity of "L'Allegro," is described in terms that evoke Botticelli's presentation of the Grace Euphrosyne (youthful mirth) and her sisters in his Primavera.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: The black melancholy recognized and here exorcized by Mirth's man is a disease leading to madness. "Il Penseroso" celebrates "white" melancholy as the temperament of the scholarly, contemplative man, represented in Dürer's famous engraving Melancholy.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The three-headed hellhound of classical mythology.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Near the river Styx, in the underworld.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Homer's Cimmerians (Odyssey 11.13–19) live on the outer edge of the world, in perpetual darkness.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The three Graces—Euphrosyne (four syllables) figuring Youthful Mirth; Aglaia, Brilliance; and Thalia, Bloom—were commonly taken to be offspring of Venus (Love and Beauty) and Bacchus (god of wine). Milton proceeds, however, to devise another, more innocent parentage for Euphrosyne (ascribing it to "some sager," lines 17–24): Zephyr, the West Wind, and Aurora, goddess of the Dawn.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Goddess of youth and cupbearer to the gods.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Stately procession, as by a monarch.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Literally, the bright polestar, or North Star, by which mariners steer; here, a splendid object, much gazed at.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Milton uses traditional names from classical pastoral—Corydon, Thyrsis, Phyllis, Thestylis—for his rustic English shepherds.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A small three-stringed fiddle. "Jocund": merry, sprightly.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Sweetmeats, especially with cream. Queen Mab is the fairy queen, consort of Oberon. "She" and "he" in the next two lines are country folk telling of their experiences with fairies.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Robin Goodfellow, alias Puck, Pook, or Hobgoblin. “Friar’s lantern”: will-o’-the-wisp.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Puck, here identified with the folktale goblin, Lob-lie-by-the-fire. Robin traditionally did all manner of drudging work for people, to be rewarded with a bowl of cream.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Pageants. “Weeds of peace”: courtly raiment.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The ladies’ eyes are stars and so have astrological influence over the men.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Roman god of marriage. An orange-yellow (“saffron”) robe and a torch are his attributes.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: It was conventional to contrast Jonson as a “learned” poet and Shakespeare as a “natural” one, but L’Allegro’s views and choices of literature also suits with his nature. “Sock”: the comedian’s low-heeled slipper, contrasted with the tragedian’s buskin, a high-heeled boot.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: “Eating cares” (Horace, Odes 2.11.18) is one of many classical echoes in the poem.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Plato considered “Lydian airs” to be enervating, soft, and sensual; he preferred the solemn Doric mode. Some others thought Lydian airs relaxing and delightful.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Orpheus’s music so moved Pluto that he agreed to release Orpheus’s dead wife Eurydice (four syllables, accent on the second) from the underworld (Elysium), but he violated the condition set—that he not look back at her—and so lost her again. Milton often uses Orpheus as a figure for the poet.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The final lines echo Marlowe’s “The Passionate Shepherd to His Love” (p. 495): “If these delights thy mind may move, / Then live with me and be my love.”Return to reference 4

Il Penseroso<sup>1</sup>

Hence vain deluding joys,<sup>2</sup>
The brood of Folly without father bred,
How little you bestead,<sup>o</sup>
Or fill the fixèd mind with all your toys<sup>o</sup>
Dwell in some idle brain,
5 And fancies fond<sup>o</sup> with gaudy shapes possess,
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams,
Or likest hovering dreams,
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus'<sup>3</sup> train.
10 But hail thou Goddess sage and holy,
Hail, divinest Melancholy,
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit<sup>o</sup> the sense of human sight,
And therefore to our weaker view
15 O'erlaid with black, staid wisdom's hue;<sup>4</sup>
Black, but such as in esteem,
Prince Memnon's sister<sup>5</sup> might beseem,
Or that starred Ethiopie queen<sup>6</sup> that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
20 The sea nymphs, and their powers offended.
Yet thou art higher far descended;
Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore
To solitary Saturn bore;<sup>7</sup>
His daughter she (in Saturn's reign
25 Such mixture was not held a stain).
Oft in glimmering bowers and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woody Ida's inmost grove,
While yet there was no fear of Jove.

30 Come pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,<sup>o</sup>
Flowing with majestic train,
35 And sable stole<sup>8</sup> of cypress lawn
Over thy decent<sup>o</sup> shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted<sup>o</sup> state,<sup>o</sup>
With even step and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
40 There held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble,<sup>9</sup> till
With a sad<sup>o</sup> leaden downward cast<sup>o</sup>
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet,
45 Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses in a ring
Aye<sup>o</sup> round about Jove's altar sing.
And add to these retired Leisure,
That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
50 But first, and chiefest, with thee bring
Him that yon soars on golden wing,
Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne,
The cherub Contemplation;<sup>1</sup>
And the mute Silence hist<sup>o</sup> along,
55 'Less Philomel<sup>2</sup> will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,<sup>o</sup>
Smoothing the rugged brow of night,
While Cynthia<sup>3</sup> checks her dragon yoke
Gently o'er th' accustomed oak;
60 Sweet bird that shunn'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy!
Thee chantress oft the woods among
I woo to hear thy evensong;<sup>4</sup>
And missing thee, I walk unseen

65 On the dry smooth-shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray
Through the heaven's wide pathless way;
70 And oft as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
Oft on a plat<sup>o</sup> of rising ground,
I hear the far-off curfew sound
Over some wide-watered shore,
75 Swinging slow with sullen<sup>o</sup> roar;
Or if the air will not permit,
Some still removèd place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,
80 Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth,
Or the bellman's<sup>5</sup> drowsy charm,
To bless the doors from nightly harm;
Or let my lamp at midnight hour
85 Be seen in some high lonely tower,
Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,<sup>6</sup>
With thrice-great Hermes, or unsphere
The spirit of Plato<sup>7</sup> to unfold
What words or what vast regions hold
90 The immortal mind that hath forsook
Her mansion in this fleshly nook;
And of those demons<sup>8</sup> that are found
In fire, air, flood, or underground,
Whose power hath a true consent<sup>o</sup>
95 With planet, or with element.
Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
In scepter'd pall<sup>9</sup> come sweeping by,
Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,
Or the tale of Troy divine,<sup>1</sup>

100 Or what (though rare) of later age
Ennobled hath the buskined<sup>2</sup> stage.
But, O sad virgin, that thy power
Might raise Musaeus<sup>3</sup> from his bower,
105 Or bid the soul of Orpheus<sup>4</sup> sing
Such notes as, warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
And made Hell grant what love did seek.
Or call up him<sup>5</sup> that left half told
The story of Cambuscan bold,
110 Of Camball and of Algarsife,
And who had Canacee to wife,
That owned the virtuous<sup>o</sup> ring and glass,
And of the wondrous horse of brass,
On which the Tartar king did ride;
115 And if aught<sup>o</sup> else great bards beside
In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
Of tourneys and of trophies hung,
Of forests and enchantments drear,
Where more is meant than meets the ear.<sup>6</sup>
120 Thus, Night, oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not tricked and frownced as she was wont
With the Attic boy to hunt,<sup>7</sup>
But kerchiefed in a comely cloud,
125 While rocking winds are piping loud,
Or ushered with a shower still,<sup>o</sup>
When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
With minute drops from off the eaves.
130 And when the sun begins to fling
His flaring beams, me, Goddess, bring
To archèd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Sylvan<sup>8</sup> loves
Of pine or monumental oak,

135 Where the rude ax with heavèd stroke
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
There in close covert<sup>o</sup> by some brook,
Where no profaner eye may look,
140 Hide me from day's garish eye,
While the bee with honeyed thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring
With such consort<sup>o</sup> as they keep,
145 Entice the dewy-feathered sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream
Wave at his wings in airy stream
Of lively portraiture displayed
Softly on my eyelids laid.
150 And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or th' unseen genius<sup>o</sup> of the wood.
But let my due feet never fail
155 To walk the studious cloister's pale,<sup>o</sup>
And love the high embowèd roof,
With antic pillars massy proof,<sup>9</sup>
And storied windows richly dight,<sup>1</sup>
Casting a dim religious light.
160 There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
165 And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and rightly spell<sup>o</sup>
170

Of every star that heaven doth shew,
And every herb that sips the dew,
Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.
These pleasures, Melancholy, give,<sup>2</sup>
And I with thee will choose to live.

Lycidas Milton wrote this pastoral elegy for a volume of Latin, Greek, and English poems, Justa Edouardo King Naufrago (1638), commemorating the death by shipwreck of his college classmate Edward King, three years younger than himself. King was not a close friend, but Milton's deepest emotions, anxieties, and fears are engaged here because, as poet and minister, King could serve Milton as a kind of alter ego. Still engaged in preparing himself, at the age of twenty-nine, for his projected poetic career, Milton was forced to recognize the uncertainty of all human endeavors. King's death posed the problem of mortality in its most agonizing form: the death of the young, the unfulfilled, the good seems to deny all meaning to life, to demonstrate the uselessness of exceptional talent, lofty ambition, and noble ideals of service to God.

While the poem expresses Milton's anxieties, it also serves as an announcement of his grand ambitions. Like Edmund Spenser, Milton saw mastery of the pastoral mode as the first step in a great poetic career. In "Lycidas" that mastery is complete. In the tradition that Milton received from classical and Renaissance predecessors, including Theocritus, Virgil, Petrarch, and Spenser, the pastoral landscape was invested with profound significances that had little indeed to do with the hard life of agricultural labor. In lines 25–36, Milton evokes the conventional pastoral topic of carefree shepherds who engage in singing contests, watch contentedly over their grazing sheep, fall in love, and write poetry, offering an image of human life in harmony with nature and the seasonal processes of fruition and mellowing before the winter of death. That classical image of the shepherd as poet is mingled with the Christian understanding of the shepherd as pastor (Christ is the Good Shepherd), and sometimes as the prophet called to his mission from the fields, like David or Isaiah. Milton calls on all these associations, along with other motifs specific to pastoral funeral elegy: the recollection of past friendship, a questioning of destiny for cutting short this life, a procession of mourners (often mythological figures), and a "flower passage" in which nature pays tribute to the dead shepherd.

"Lycidas" uses but continually tests and challenges the assumptions and conventions of pastoral elegy, making for profound tensions and clashes of tone. The pastoral "oaten flute" is interrupted by divine pronouncements and bitter invective; nature seems rife with examples of meaningless waste and early death; the "blind Fury" often cuts off the poet's "thin-spun life" before he can win fame; good pastors die young while corrupt "Blind mouths" remain; and Nature cannot even pay her tribute of flowers to Lycidas's funeral bier since he welters in the deep, his bones hurled to the "bottom of the monstrous world." In response to these fierce challenges come pronouncements by Apollo and St. Peter, and images of protection and resurrection in nature and myth, culminating in a new vision of pastoral: in heaven Lycidas enjoys a perfected pastoral existence, and in the coda the consoled shepherd arises and carries his song to "pastures new." Milton's questioning leads to a final reassertion of confidence in his calling as national poet. Moreover, in the headnote added in the 1645 volume of his Poems, he lays claim to prophetic authority, for the Church of England clergy he denounced as corrupt in 1638 had mostly been expelled from their livings by Puritan reformers in 1645.

Lycidas

In this monody<sup>1</sup> the author bewails a learned friend, unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish seas, 1637. And by occasion foretells the ruin of our corrupted clergy, then in their height.

Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more
Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,<sup>2</sup>
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,<sup>o</sup>
And with forced fingers rude,<sup>o</sup>
5 Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.
Bitter constraint, and sad occasion dear,<sup>o</sup>
Compels me to disturb your season due;
For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,<sup>3</sup>
Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.
Who would not sing for Lycidas? He knew
10 Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.<sup>4</sup>
He must not float upon his watery bier
Unwept, and welter<sup>o</sup> to the parching wind,
Without the meed<sup>o</sup> of some melodious tear.<sup>o</sup>
15 Begin then, sisters of the sacred well<sup>5</sup>
That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring,
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse;
So may some gentle muse<sup>6</sup>
20 With lucky words favor my destined urn,
And as he passes turn,
And bid fair peace be to my sable shroud.
For we were nursed upon the selfsame hill,
Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill.
Together both, ere the high lawns<sup>o</sup> appeared

25 Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grayfly winds her sultry horn,<sup>7</sup>
Battening<sup>o</sup> our flocks with the fresh dews of night,
30 Oft till the star that rose at evening bright<sup>8</sup>
Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.
Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
Tempered to th' oaten flute,<sup>9</sup>
Rough satyrs danced, and fauns with cloven heel
From the glad sound would not be absent long,
35 And old Damoetas<sup>1</sup> loved to hear our song.
But O the heavy change, now thou art gone,
Now thou art gone, and never must return!
Thee, shepherd, thee the woods and desert caves,
With wild thyme and the gadding<sup>o</sup> vine o'ergrown,
40 And all their echoes mourn.
The willows and the hazel copses<sup>o</sup> green
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.
As killing as the canker<sup>o</sup> to the rose,
45 Or taint-worm<sup>2</sup> to the weanling herds that graze,
Or frost to flowers that their gay wardrobe wear
When first the white-thorn blows;<sup>3</sup>
Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.
Where were ye, nymphs,<sup>4</sup> when the remorseless
50 deep
Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep
Where your old bards, the famous Druids,<sup>5</sup> lie,
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream:<sup>6</sup>
55 Ay me! I fondly dream—
Had ye been there—for what could that have done?

What could the Muse<sup>7</sup> herself that Orpheus bore,
The Muse herself, for her enchanting<sup>8</sup> son
Whom universal Nature did lament,
60 When by the rout that made the hideous roar
His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?<sup>9</sup>
Alas! What boots<sup>o</sup> it with incessant care
To tend the homely slighted shepherd's trade,
65 And strictly meditate the thankless muse?<sup>1</sup>
Were it not better done as others use,
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neaera's hair?<sup>2</sup>
Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise 70 (That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
But the fair guerdon<sup>o</sup> when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
Comes the blind Fury<sup>3</sup> with th' abhorrèd shears,
75 And slits the thin-spun life. "But not the praise," Phoebus replied, and touched my trembling ears;<sup>4</sup>
"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistening foil<sup>5</sup>
Set off to th' world, nor in broad rumor lies,
80 But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed."<sup>o</sup>
O fountain Arethuse, and thou honored flood,
85 Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds,
That strain I heard was of a higher mood.<sup>6</sup>
But now my oat<sup>o</sup> proceeds,
And listens to the herald of the sea<sup>7</sup>
That came in Neptune's plea.
90 He asked the waves, and asked the felon<sup>o</sup> winds,

"What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?"<sup>o</sup>
 And questioned every gust of rugged<sup>o</sup> wings
 That blows from off each beakèd promontory;
 They knew not of his story,
 95 And sage Hippotades<sup>8</sup> their answer brings,
 That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed;
 The air was calm, and on the level brine,
 Sleek Panope<sup>9</sup> with all her sisters played.
 It was that fatal and perfidious bark,
 100 Built in th' eclipse,<sup>1</sup> and rigged with curses dark,
 That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
 Next Camus,<sup>2</sup> reverend sire, went footing slow,
 His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,<sup>o</sup>
 Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
 105 Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.<sup>3</sup>
 "Ah! who hath reft," quoth he, "my dearest pledge?"
 Last came and last did go
 The pilot of the Galilean lake;<sup>4</sup>
 Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
 110 (The golden opes, the iron shuts amain).<sup>o</sup>
 He shook his mitered locks, and stern bespake:
 "How well could I have spared for<sup>o</sup> thee, young swain,
 Enow<sup>o</sup> of such as for their bellies' sake
 Creep and intrude and climb into the fold!<sup>5</sup>
 115 Of other care they little reckoning make,
 Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,<sup>6</sup>
 And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
 Blind mouths!<sup>7</sup> that scarce themselves know how to hold
 A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least 120 That to the faithful herdsman's art belongs!

What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;<sup>8</sup>
 And when they list,<sup>o</sup> their lean<sup>o</sup> and flashy songs
 Grate on their scrannel<sup>o</sup> pipes of wretched straw.
 The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
 125 But swol'n with wind, and the rank mist they draw,<sup>o</sup>
 Rot inwardly,<sup>9</sup> and foul contagion spread,
 Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw<sup>1</sup>
 Daily devours apace, and nothing said.
 But that two-handed engine at the door<sup>2</sup>
 130 Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more."
 Return, Alpheus,<sup>3</sup> the dread voice is past,
 That shrunk thy streams; return, Sicilian muse,
 And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
 Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues.<sup>4</sup>
 135 Ye valleys low where the mild whispers use,<sup>o</sup>
 Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
 On whose fresh lap the swart star<sup>5</sup> sparely looks,
 Throw hither all your quaint enameled eyes,<sup>6</sup>
 That on the green turf suck the honeyed showers,
 140 And purple all the ground with vernal flowers.
 Bring the rathe<sup>o</sup> primrose that forsaken dies,
 The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,<sup>7</sup>
 The white pink, and the pansy freaked<sup>o</sup> with jet,
 The glowing violet,
 145 The musk rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
 With cowslips wan<sup>o</sup> that hang the pensive head,
 And every flower that sad embroidery wears:
 Bid amaranthus<sup>8</sup> all his beauty shed,
 And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,
 150 To strew the laureate hearse<sup>o</sup> where Lycid lies.
 For so to interpose a little ease,
 Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise.<sup>9</sup>
 Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas

155 Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides,<sup>1</sup>
Where thou perhaps under the whelming<sup>o</sup> tide
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
Or whether thou, to our moist vows denied,
160 Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old,<sup>2</sup>
Where the great vision of the guarded mount
Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold;<sup>3</sup>
Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth:<sup>o</sup>
And, O ye dolphins,<sup>4</sup> waft the hapless youth.
Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no more,
165 For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the wat'ry floor;
So sinks the daystar<sup>o</sup> in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks<sup>o</sup> his beams, and with new-spangled ore
170 Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of him that walked the waves,<sup>5</sup>
Where, other groves and other streams along,<sup>6</sup>
With nectar pure his oozy<sup>o</sup> locks he laves,
175 And hears the unexpressive nuptial song,<sup>7</sup>
In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.
There entertain him all the saints above,
In solemn troops and sweet societies
That sing, and singing in their glory move,
180 And wipe the tears forever from his eyes.
Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the Genius<sup>8</sup> of the shore,
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
To all that wander in that perilous flood.
185 Thus sang the uncouth swain<sup>9</sup> to th' oaks and rills,
While the still morn went out with sandals gray;

190 He touched the tender stops of various quills,<sup>1</sup>
 With eager thought warbling his Doric<sup>2</sup> lay:
 And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
 And now was dropped into the western bay;
 At last he rose, and twitched his mantle blue:<sup>3</sup>
 Tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.

- Note 1: A dirge sung by a single voice, though this one incorporates several other voices. Milton added this headnote in the edition of 1645; it identifies Milton as a prophet in the passage denouncing the clergy in this 1638 poem (lines 112–31) and invites the reader to remember Milton’s 1641–42 polemics against the English bishops and church government (now dismantled).Return to reference 1

From The Reason of Church Government Urged Against Prelaty*<sup>1</sup>

[PLANS AND PROJECTS]

* * * Concerning therefore this wayward subject against prelacy,<sup>2</sup> the touching whereof is so distasteful and disquietous<sup>3</sup> to a number of men, as by what hath been said I may deserve of charitable readers to be credited that neither envy nor gall hath entered me upon this controversy, but the enforcement of conscience only and a preventive fear lest the omitting of this duty should be against me when I would store up to myself the good provision of peaceful hours; so lest it should be still imputed to me, as I have found it hath been, that some self-pleasing humor of vainglory hath incited me to contest with men of high estimation, now while green years are upon my head;<sup>4</sup> from this needless surmisaI shall hope to dissuade the intelligent and equal auditor, if I can but say successfully that which in this exigent<sup>5</sup> behooves me; although I would be heard only, if it might be, by the elegant and learned reader, to whom principally for a while I shall beg leave I may address myself. To him it will be no new thing though I tell him that if I hunted after praise by the ostentation of wit and learning, I should not write thus out of mine own season when I have neither yet completed to my mind the full circle of my private studies,<sup>6</sup> although I complain not of any insufficiency to the matter in hand; or, were I ready to my wishes, it were a folly to commit anything elaborately composed to the careless and interrupted listening of these tumultuous times. Next, if I were wise only to mine own ends, I would certainly take such a subject as of itself might catch applause, whereas this hath all the disadvantages on the contrary, and such a subject as the publishing whereof might be delayed at pleasure, and time enough to pencil it over with all the curious touches of art, even to the perfection of a faultless picture; whenas in this argument the not deferring is of great moment to the good speeding,<sup>7</sup> that if solidity have leisure to do her office, art cannot have much. Lastly, I should not choose this manner of writing, wherein knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature<sup>8</sup> to another task, I have the use, as I may account it, but of my left hand. And though I shall be foolish in saying more to this purpose, yet, since it will be such a folly as wisest men going about to commit have only confessed and so committed, I may trust with more reason, because with more folly, to have courteous pardon. For although a poet, soaring in the high region of his fancies with his garland and singing robes about him, might without apology speak more of himself than I mean to do, yet for me sitting here below in the cool element of prose, a mortal thing among many readers of no empyreal conceit,<sup>9</sup> to venture and divulge unusual things of myself, I shall petition to the gentler sort, it may not be envy<sup>1</sup> to me.

I must say, therefore, that after I had from my first years by the ceaseless diligence and care of my father (whom God recompense) been exercised to the tongues and some sciences, as my age would suffer,<sup>2</sup> by sundry masters and teachers both at home and at the schools, it was found that whether aught was imposed me by them that had the overlooking, or betaken to of mine own choice in English or other tongue, prosing or versing (but chiefly this latter), the style, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live. But much latelier in the private academies of Italy,<sup>3</sup> whither I was favored to resort—perceiving that some trifles which I had in memory, composed at under twenty or thereabout (for the manner is that everyone must give some proof of his wit<sup>4</sup> and reading there) met with acceptance above what was looked for, and other things which I had shifted in scarcity of books and conveniences to patch up amongst them, were received with written encomiums,<sup>5</sup> which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps—I began thus far to assent both to them and divers of my friends here at home, and not less to an inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labor and intent study (which I take to be my portion in this life) joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to aftertimes, as they should not willingly let it die. These thoughts at once possessed me, and these other: that if I were certain to write as men buy leases, for three lives and downward,<sup>6</sup> there ought no regard be sooner had than to God's glory by the honor and instruction of my country. For which cause, and not only for that I knew it would be hard to arrive at the second rank among the Latins, I applied myself to that resolution which Ariosto followed against the persuasions of Bembo,<sup>7</sup> to fix all the industry and art I could unite to the adorning of my native tongue; not to make verbal curiosities the end—that were a toilsome vanity—but to be an interpreter and relater of the best and sagest things among mine own citizens throughout this island in the mother dialect. That what the greatest and choicest wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and those Hebrews of old did for their country, I, in my proportion, with this over and above of being a Christian,<sup>8</sup> might do for mine; not caring to be once named abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with these British islands as my world; whose fortune hath hitherto been that if the Athenians, as some say, made their small deeds great and renowned by their eloquent writers, England hath had her noble achievements made small by the unskillful handling of monks and mechanics.

Time serves not now, and perhaps I might seem too profuse to give any certain account of what the mind at home in the spacious circuits of her musing hath liberty to propose to herself, though of highest hope and hardest attempting: whether that epic form whereof the two poems of Homer and those other two of Virgil and Tasso are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief, model;<sup>9</sup> or whether the rules of Aristotle herein are strictly to be kept, or nature to be followed,<sup>1</sup> which in them that know art and use judgment is no transgression but an enriching of art; and lastly, what king or knight before the conquest<sup>2</sup> might be chosen in whom to lay the pattern of a Christian hero. And as Tasso gave to a prince of Italy his choice whether he would command him to write of Godfrey's expedition against the infidels, or Belisarius against the Goths, or Charlemagne against the Lombards;<sup>3</sup> if to the instinct of nature and the emboldening of art aught may be trusted, and that there be nothing adverse in our climate<sup>4</sup> or the fate of this age, it haply would be no rashness from an equal diligence and inclination to present the like offer in our own ancient stories; or whether those dramatic constitutions<sup>5</sup> wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign shall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation. The Scripture also affords us a divine pastoral drama in the Song of Solomon, consisting of two persons and a double chorus, as Origen rightly judges. And the Apocalypse of St. John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies; and this my opinion the grave authority of Paraeus, commenting that book, is sufficient to confirm.<sup>6</sup> Or if occasion shall lead to imitate those magnific odes and hymns wherein Pindarus and Callimachus<sup>7</sup> are in most things worthy, some others in their frame judicious, in their matter most an end<sup>8</sup> faulty. But those frequent songs throughout the law and prophets beyond all these, not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition, may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy to be incomparable.<sup>9</sup> These abilities, wheresoever they be found, are the inspired gift of God rarely bestowed, but yet to some (though most abuse) in every nation; and are of power beside the office of a pulpit to inbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility, to allay the perturbations of the mind and set the affections in right tune, to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his church, to sing the victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ, to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship. Lastly, whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without or the wily subtleties and reflexes of man's thoughts from within, all these things with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe.<sup>1</sup> Teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue through all the instances of example, with such delight to those especially of soft and delicious temper,<sup>2</sup> who will not so much as look upon truth herself unless they see her elegantly dressed, that whereas the paths of honesty and good life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they would then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a benefit this would be to our youth and gentry may be soon guessed by what we know of the corruption and bane which they suck in daily from the writings and interludes of libidinous and ignorant poetasters,<sup>3</sup> who, having scarce ever heard of that which is the main consistence of a true poem, the choice of such persons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, do for the most part lap up<sup>4</sup> vicious principles in sweet pills to be swallowed down, and make the taste of virtuous documents harsh and sour.

But because the spirit of man cannot demean<sup>5</sup> itself lively in this body without some recreating intermission of labor and serious things, it were happy for the commonwealth if our magistrates, as in those famous governments of old, would take into their care, not only the deciding of our contentious law cases and brawls, but the managing of our public sports and festival pastimes, that they might be, not such as were authorized a while since,<sup>6</sup> the provocations of drunkenness and lust, but such as may inure and harden our bodies by martial exercises to all warlike skill and performance, and may civilize, adorn, and make discreet our minds by the learned and affable meeting of frequent academies, and the procurement of wise and artful recitations sweetened with eloquent and graceful enticements to the love and practice of justice, temperance, and fortitude, instructing and bettering the nation at all opportunities, that the call of wisdom and virtue may be heard everywhere, as Solomon saith: "She crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the streets, in the top of high places, in the chief concourse, and in the openings of the gates."<sup>7</sup> Whether this may not be, not only in pulpits, but after another persuasive method,<sup>8</sup> at set and solemn panegyries, in theaters, porches,<sup>9</sup> or what other place or way may win most upon the people to receive at once both recreation and instruction, let them in authority consult.

The thing which I had to say, and those intentions which have lived within me ever since I could conceive myself anything worth to my country, I return to crave excuse that urgent reason hath plucked from me by an abortive and foredated discovery.<sup>1</sup> And the accomplishment of them lies not but in a power above man's to promise; but that none hath by more studious ways endeavored, and with more unwearied spirit that none shall, that I dare almost aver of myself as far as life and free leisure will extend; and that the land had once enfranchised herself from this impertinent<sup>2</sup> yoke of prelaty, under whose inquisitorious and tyrannical duncery no free and splendid wit can flourish. Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapors of wine, like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorist or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite, nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her siren daughters,<sup>3</sup> but by devout prayer to that Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases.<sup>4</sup> To this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemly and generous arts and affairs; till which in some measure be compassed, at mine own peril and cost I refuse not to sustain this expectation.* * * But were it the meanest under-service, if God by his secretary conscience enjoin it, it were sad for me if I should draw back; for me especially, now when all men offer their aid to help ease and lighten the difficult labors of the church, to whose service by the intentions of my parents and friends I was destined of a child, and in mine own resolutions: till coming to some maturity of years and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the church, that he who would take orders must subscribe slave and take an oath withal,<sup>5</sup> which, unless he took with a conscience that would retch, he must either straight perjure or split his faith; I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing. Howsoever, thus church-outed by the prelates, hence may appear the right I have to meddle in these matters, as before the necessity and constraint appeared.

Endnotes

- Note 1:
This was the fourth of five tracts Milton published attacking the bishops, liturgy, and church government of the Church of England, in support of Presbyterian reform, though these tracts also show signs of the more radical positions he will soon adopt. This 1642 treatise is the first one to carry his name, so the autobiographical passage is in part to introduce himself to the reader and explain why, though a layman and a young man, he feels himself called, and well prepared, to write on theology and ecclesiastical order. Beyond that rhetorical purpose, this is also the fullest account Milton ever set forth of his poetics: his sense of the poet's calling, of the nature and multiple uses of poetry, and of the several genres he already has employed or hopes to attempt. It also registers his inner conflict between duty (to serve God and his church with his learning) and desire (to write poetry).
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Government by prelates (bishops). "Wayward": untoward, unpromising. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Distressing. Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Milton's opponents, Bishops Joseph Hall, James Ussher, and Lancelot Andrewes, were famous, and he was still almost unknown at age thirty-four.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Urgent occasion. "Equal": impartial.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: After taking his B.A. and M.A. degrees from Cambridge, Milton spent nearly six more years in private study at home; he was still continuing that program of reading.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Prompt publication is essential in polemic, so substance rather than art must be the priority. "Office": duty.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Intellectual gifts or natural disposition.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Without sublime and elevated conceits.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Cause for odium or disrespect.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Admit. "Tongues": foreign languages. In Ad Patrem Milton says that as a boy he learned Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Hebrew.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: When on the grand tour of the Continent (1638–39) Milton enjoyed attending academies in Rome and especially Florence, which were centers for literary, scientific, and social exchange.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Ingenuity, creative powers; Milton read some of his Latin poems to the academies.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Praises. Milton published five of these encomiums, four in Latin, one in Italian, as prefatory material to the Latin part of his 1645 Poems.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Leases were often drawn for a tenancy to run through the longest-lived of three named persons.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Rejecting Cardinal Bembo's advice, Ariosto said he would rather be first among the Italian poets than second among those writing Latin.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The advantage would be in having "true" subjects to write about.Return to reference 8

- Note 9:
The great models for the “diffuse” or long, epic were Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey, Virgil’s Aeneid, and Torquato Tasso’s Gerusalemme liberata (“Jerusalem Delivered”) (1581); there was also a long tradition of reading the Book of Job as a “brief” epic, a moral conflict between Job and Satan. Milton’s brief epic, Paradise Regained (1671), makes some use of that model. For all the genres he discusses, Milton cites both classical and biblical models.
Return to reference 9
- Note 1: One contemporary debate concerned whether the Aristotelian rule of beginning in medias res was to be followed, or Ariosto’s “natural” method of beginning at the beginning of the story.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: At first Milton considered as potential epic subjects King Arthur, who fought against invading Saxons, and King Alfred, who warred with invading Danes; he excluded those after the Norman Conquest.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Tasso offered this choice to his patron, Alfonso II d’Este, Duke of Ferrara.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Milton often speculated that the cold climate of England might not be as conducive to poetry as the warmer climates of Italy and Greece had been.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Plays.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Sophocles and Euripides are supreme examples of Greek tragedy; the Scripture models for drama are the Song of Solomon as a “divine pastoral drama” (Milton cites Origen, an Alexandrine Father of the 3rd century), and the Book of Revelation as a “high and stately tragedy” (he cites David Paraeus, a German theologian of the 16th and 17th centuries).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Pindar, a 5th century B.C.E. Greek poet, wrote numerous odes especially on winners of the Olympic games; Callimachus, a 3rd century B.C.E. Alexandrine Greek, wrote elegant elegiac verse on the origin of various myths and rituals.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Almost entirely.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: He thinks especially of the Psalms, often compared to classical lyric.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: See the wide range of kinds and subjects and functions suggested for the serious national poet.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Temperament. Milton here paraphrases Horace's formula, echoed by Sidney and Jonson, that poetry both teaches and delights, and that it encourages virtuous endeavor.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Some of the pseudo-poets of the Cavalier court who wrote on lascivious topics.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Roll up.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Comport.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Charles I's republication (1633) of James I's Book of Sports, encouraging sports, dancing, and rural festivals on Sundays—anathema to Puritans.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The phrases are from Proverbs 1:20–21 and 8:2–3. Milton would not ban recreation or festival pastimes but reform them: his models are the lofty encomiastic poems and recitations Plato would admit into his Republic, the literary and social exchanges of the Italian academies, and martial exercises (to prepare the citizenry for war, now imminent).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, poetry.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Porticos. "Panegyries": solemn public meetings.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, I have been forced to write for my country's sake and to reveal my poetic plans before I was ready to do either.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Unsuitable, absurd.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: True poetry comes not from youth, wine, a full plate, or even Memory (and her daughters the Muses): tradition alone does not make a poet.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The coal from the altar that purifies the prophet's lips (Isaiah 6:6–7): the passage makes poetry first and foremost the product of inspiration, but Milton also insists on his need to attain well-nigh universal knowledge and experience.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Milton was not willing to subscribe the oath affirming that the Book of Common Prayer and the present government of the church by bishops were according to the word of God; still less was he willing to subscribe the notorious “etcetera” oath required in 1640, that the minister would never seek to alter the government of the church “by archbishops, bishops, deacons, and archdeacons, etc.”Return to reference 5

Areopagitica This passionate, trenchant defense of intellectual liberty has had a powerful influence on the evolving liberal conception of freedom of speech, press, and thought. Milton's specific target is the Press Ordinance of June 14, 1643, Parliament's attempt to crack down on the flood of pamphlets (including Milton's own controversial treatises on divorce) that poured forth both from legal and from underground presses as the Civil War raged. Like Tudor and Stuart censorship laws, Parliament's ordinance demanded that works be registered with the stationers and licensed by the censors before publication, and that both author and publisher be identified, on pain of fines and imprisonment for both. Milton vigorously protests the prepublication licensing of books, arguing that such measures have only been used by, and are only fit for, degenerate cultures. In the regenerate English nation, now "rousing herself like a strong man after sleep," men and women must be allowed to develop in virtue by participating in the clash and conflict of ideas. Truth will always overcome falsehood in reasoned debate. Thus, in opposition to the Presbyterians then in power, Milton defends widespread religious toleration, though with restrictions on Roman Catholicism, which, like most of his Protestant contemporaries, he viewed as a political threat and a tyranny binding individual conscience to the pope.

The title associates the tract with the speech of the Greek orator Isocrates to the Areopagus, the Council of the Wise in Athens. Learned readers would have recognized the irony of this. While Isocrates instructed the council to reform Athens by careful supervision of the private lives of citizens, Milton argues that only liberty and removal of censorship can advance reformation. This association explains the oratorical tone of the tract, which was, in fact, subtitled "A Speech." In this most literary of his tracts, Milton's style is elevated, eloquent, dense with poetic figures, and ranges in tone from satire and ridicule to urgent pleading and florid praise. His arguments and principles are often couched in striking images and phrases. One example is his passionate testimony to the potency and inestimable value of books: "As good almost kill a man as kill a good book . . .” Most memorable is his ringing credo that echoes down the centuries to protest every new tyranny: “Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.”

From Areopagitica

I deny not, but that it is of greatest concernment in the church and commonwealth, to have a vigilant eye how books demean<sup>1</sup> themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors:<sup>2</sup> For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon’s teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men.<sup>3</sup> And yet on the other hand unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God’s image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious lifeblood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. ’Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary therefore what persecution we raise against the living labors of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence,<sup>4</sup> the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life. But lest I should be condemned of introducing licence, while I oppose licensing, I refuse not the pains to be so much historical, as will serve to show what hath been done by ancient and famous commonwealths, against this disorder, till the very time that this project of licensing crept out of the Inquisition,<sup>5</sup> was caught up by our prelates, and hath caught some of our presbyters.<sup>6</sup> * * *

* * * Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed on Psyche as an incessant labor to cull out and sort asunder were not more intermixed.<sup>7</sup> It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil.

As therefore the state of man now is, what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear, without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring<sup>8</sup> Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed,<sup>9</sup> that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental<sup>1</sup> whiteness; which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser (whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas), describing true temperance under the person of Guyon, brings him in with his Palmer through the Cave of Mammon and the Bower of Earthly Bliss,<sup>2</sup> that he might see and know, and yet abstain.

Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read.

But of the harm that may result hence, three kinds are usually reckoned. First is feared the infection that may spread; but then all human learning and controversy in religious points must remove out of the world, yea, the Bible itself; for that oftentimes relates blasphemy not nicely,<sup>3</sup> it describes the carnal sense of wicked men not unelegantly, it brings in holiest men passionately murmuring against providence through all the arguments of Epicurus;<sup>4</sup> in other great disputes it answers dubiously and darkly to the common reader.<sup>5</sup>

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian politics,<sup>6</sup> which never can be drawn into use, will not mend our condition, but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. . . . Impunity and remissness, for certain, are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work. If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years were to be under pittance<sup>7</sup> and prescription and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well-doing, what gramercy<sup>8</sup> to be sober, just, or continent?

Many there be that complain of divine providence for suffering Adam to transgress; foolish tongues! When God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions.<sup>9</sup> We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force: God therefore left him free, set before him a

Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasures round about us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue? They are not skillful considerers of human things, who imagine to remove sin by removing the matter of sin; for, besides that it is a huge heap increasing under the very act of diminishing, though some part of it may for a time be withdrawn from some persons, it cannot from all, in such a universal thing as books are; and when this is done, yet the sin remains entire. Though ye take from a covetous man all his treasure, he has yet one jewel left: ye cannot bereave him of his covetousness. Banish all objects of lust, shut up all youth into the severest discipline that can be exercised in any hermitage, ye cannot make them chaste that came not thither so: such great care and wisdom is required to the right managing of this point.

Suppose we could expel sin by this means; look how much we thus expel of sin, so much we expel of virtue: for the matter of them both is the same; remove that, and ye remove them both alike. This justifies the high providence of God, who, though he commands us temperance, justice, continence, yet pours out before us, even to a profuseness, all desirable things, and gives us minds that can wander beyond all limit and satiety. Why should we then affect a rigor contrary to the manner of God and of nature, by abridging or scanting those means, which books freely permitted are, both to the trial of virtue and the exercise of truth? It would be better done to learn that the law must needs be frivolous which goes to restrain things uncertainly and yet equally working to good and to evil. And were I the chooser, a dram of well-doing should be preferred before many times as much the forcible hindrance of evil-doing. For God sure esteems the growth and completing of one virtuous person more than the restraint of ten vicious.

What advantage is it to be a man over it is to be a boy at school, if we have only scaped the ferula to come under the fescue of an imprimatur;<sup>2</sup> if serious and elaborate writings, as if they were no more than the theme of a grammarlad under his pedagogue, must not be uttered without the cursory eyes of a temporizing and extemporizing licenser?<sup>3</sup> He who is not trusted with his own actions, his drift not being known to be evil, and standing to the hazard of law and penalty, has no great argument to think himself reputed, in the commonwealth wherein he was born, for other than a fool or a foreigner.

When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends, after all which done he takes himself to be informed in what he writes, as well as any that writ before him. If in this the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities can bring him to that state of maturity as not to be still mistrusted and suspected (unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expense of Palladian<sup>4</sup> oil, to the hasty view of an unleisured licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labor of book-writing), and if he be not repulsed, or slighted, must appear in print like a puny<sup>5</sup> with his guardian, and his censor's hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety that he is no idiot, or seducer; it cannot be but a dishonor and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of learning.* * *

And how can a man teach with authority, which is the life of teaching, how can he be a doctor<sup>6</sup> in his book as he ought to be, or else had better be silent, whenas all he teaches, all he delivers, is but under the tuition, under the correction of his patriarchal<sup>7</sup> licenser to blot or alter what precisely accords not with the hide-bound humor which he calls his judgment? When every acute reader upon the first sight of a pedantic license, will be ready with these like words to ding the book a quoit's<sup>8</sup> distance from him: "I hate a pupil teacher, I endure not an instructor that comes to me under the wardship of an overseeing fist. I know nothing of the licenser, but that I have his own hand here for his arrogance; who shall warrant me his judgment?"

"The state, sir," replies the stationer,<sup>9</sup> but has a quick return: "The state shall be my governors, but not my critics; they may be mistaken in the choice of a licenser, as easily as this licenser may be mistaken in an author."

* * *

Well knows he who uses to consider, that our faith and knowledge thrives by exercise, as well as our limbs and complexion.<sup>1</sup> Truth is compared in Scripture to a streaming fountain;<sup>2</sup> if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only because his pastor says so, or the Assembly<sup>3</sup> so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.

* * *

Truth indeed came once into the world with her Divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when he ascended, and his apostles after him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris,<sup>4</sup> took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb, still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; he shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mold them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity, forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies<sup>5</sup> to the torn body of our martyred saint.

We boast our light; but if we look not wisely on the sun itself, it smites us into darkness. Who can discern those planets that are oft combust,<sup>6</sup> and those stars of brightest magnitude that rise and set with the sun, until the opposite motion of their orbs bring them to such a place in the firmament where they may be seen evening or morning? The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge. It is not the unfrocking of a priest, the unmitering of a bishop, and the removing him from off the Presbyterian shoulders, that will make us a happy nation. No, if other things as great in the church, and in the rule of life both economical and political, be not looked into and reformed, we have looked so long upon the blaze that Zwinglius and Calvin<sup>7</sup> hath beacons up to us, that we are stark blind.

There be who perpetually complain of schisms and sects, and make it such a calamity that any man dissents from their maxims. 'Tis their own pride and ignorance which causes the disturbing, who neither will hear with meekness, nor can convince; yet all must be suppressed which is not found in their syntagma.<sup>8</sup> They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite those dis severed pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be still searching what we know not by what we know, still closing up truth to truth as we find it (for all her body is homogeneous and proportional), this is the golden rule in theology as well as in arithmetic, and makes up the best harmony in a church; not the forced and outward union of cold and neutral and inwardly divided minds.

Lords and Commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity and ablest judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island.<sup>9</sup> And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola,<sup>1</sup> who governed once here for Caesar, preferred the natural wits of Britain before the labored studies of the French. Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian<sup>2</sup> sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts.

Yet that which is above all this, the favor and the love of heaven we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending<sup>3</sup> towards us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her, as out of Zion,<sup>4</sup> should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wycliffe to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Huss and Jerome,<sup>5</sup> no, nor the name of Luther or of Calvin, had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbors had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and the backwardest scholars of whom<sup>6</sup> God offered to have made us the teachers.

Now once again by all concurrence of signs, and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself; what does he then but reveal himself to his servants, and as his manner is, first to his Englishmen? I say, as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of his counsels, and are unworthy. Behold now this vast city: a city of refuge,<sup>7</sup> the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with his protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates<sup>8</sup> and instruments of armed justice in defense of beleaguered truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and conviction.

What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant<sup>9</sup> soil, but wise and faithful laborers, to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets,<sup>1</sup> of sages, and of worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already.<sup>2</sup> Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city.

What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-deputed care of their religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join, and unite into one general and brotherly search after truth; could we but forgo this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mold and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus did, admiring the Roman docility and courage: "If such were my Epirots, I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted, to make a church or kingdom happy."<sup>3</sup> Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries;<sup>4</sup> as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort of irrational men, who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections<sup>5</sup> made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world; neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay rather the perfection consists in this, that out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilitudes that are not vastly disproportional, arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure. Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses the great prophet may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy elders, but all the Lord's people, are become prophets.<sup>6</sup>

Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks:<sup>7</sup> methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam;<sup>8</sup> purging and unsealing her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate<sup>9</sup> a year of sects and schisms.

What should ye do then, should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city? Should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers<sup>1</sup> over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how.<sup>2</sup>

And now the time in special is by privilege to write and speak what may help to the further discussing of matters in agitation. The temple of Janus with his two controversial faces might now not unsignificantly be set open.<sup>3</sup> And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Her<sup>4</sup> confuting is the best and surest suppressing. He who hears what praying there is for light and clearer knowledge to be sent down among us would think of other matters to be constituted beyond the discipline of Geneva framed and fabricated already to our hands.<sup>5</sup>

Yet when the new light which we beg for shines in upon us, there be who envy and oppose if it come not first in at their casements. What a collusion is this, whenas we are exhorted by the wise man to use diligence, to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasures early and late,<sup>6</sup> that another order shall enjoin us to know nothing but by statute. When a man hath been laboring the hardest labor in the deep mines of knowledge, hath furnished out his findings in all their equipage, drawn forth his reasons as it were a battle<sup>7</sup> ranged, scattered and defeated all objections in his way, calls out his adversary into the plain, offers him the advantage of wind and sun if he please, only that he may try the matter by dint of argument; for his opponents then to skulk, to lay ambushments, to keep a narrow bridge of licensing where the challenger should pass, though it be valor enough in soldiership, is but weakness and cowardice in the wars of Truth.

For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty? She needs no policies nor stratagems nor licensings to make her victorious—those are the shifts and the defenses that error uses against her power. Give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps, for then she speaks not true, as the old Proteus<sup>8</sup> did, who spake oracles only when he was caught and bound, but then rather she turns herself into all shapes except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab,<sup>9</sup> until she be adjured into her own likeness.

Yet it is not impossible that she may have more shapes than one. What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein Truth may be on this side or on the other without being unlike herself? What but a vain shadow else is the abolition of those ordinances, that handwriting nailed to the cross?<sup>1</sup> What great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord.<sup>2</sup> How many other things might be tolerated in peace and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another? I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks; the ghost of a linen decency<sup>3</sup> yet haunts us. We stumble and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals; and through our forwardness to suppress and our backwardness to recover any enthralled piece of truth out of the grip of custom, we care not<sup>4</sup> to keep truth separated from truth, which is the fiercest rent and disunion of all. We do not see that while we still affect by all means a rigid and external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of "wood and hay and stubble,"<sup>5</sup> forced and frozen together, which is more to the sudden degenerating of a church than many subdichotomies of petty schisms.

Not that I can think well of every light separation, or that all in a church is to be expected "gold and silver and precious stones." It is not possible for man to sever the wheat from the tares, the good fish from the other fry; that must be the angels' ministry at the end of mortal things.<sup>6</sup> Yet if all cannot be of one mind—as who looks they should be?—this doubtless is more wholesome, more prudent, and more Christian, that many be tolerated rather than all compelled. I mean not tolerated popery and open superstition, which, as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled; that also which is impious or evil absolutely, either against faith or manners,<sup>7</sup> no law can possibly permit that intends not to unlaw itself; but those neighboring differences or rather indifferences are what I speak of, whether in some point of doctrine or of discipline, which though they may be many yet need not interrupt "the unity of spirit," if we could but find among us the "bond of peace."<sup>8</sup>

In the meanwhile, if anyone would write and bring his helpful hand to the slow-moving reformation which we labor under, if truth have spoken to him before others, or but seemed at least to speak, who hath so bejesuited<sup>9</sup> us that we should trouble that man with asking license to do so worthy a deed? And not consider this, that if it come to prohibiting, there is not aught more likely to be prohibited than truth itself; whose first appearance to our eyes bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom is more unsightly and unpalatable than many errors, even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of theirs, that none must be heard but whom they like, is the worst and newest opinion of all others, and is the chief cause why sects and schisms do so much abound, and true knowledge is kept at distance from us; besides yet a greater danger which is in it. For when God shakes a kingdom<sup>1</sup> with strong and healthful commotions to a general reforming, it is not untrue that many sectaries and false teachers are then busiest in seducing; but yet more true it is that God then raises to his own work men of rare abilities and more than common industry, not only to look back and revise what hath been taught heretofore, but to gain further and go on some new enlightened steps in the discovery of truth.

Sonnets Milton wrote twenty-four sonnets between 1630 and 1658. Five in Italian constitute a mini-Petrarchan sequence on a perhaps imaginary Italian lady. The rest, in English, are individual poems on a wide variety of topics and occasions, though not on the usual sonnet topics (love, as in the sequences of Sidney, Spenser, and Shakespeare, or religious devotion, as in that of Donne). Milton writes sometimes about personal crises (his blindness, the death of his wife), sometimes about political issues or personages (Cromwell, the persecuting Parliament), sometimes about friends and friendship (Cyriack Skinner, Lady Margaret Ley), sometimes about historical events (a threatened royalist attack on London, the massacre of Protestants in Piedmont). His tone ranges from Jonsonian urbanity to prophetic denunciation. The form of the sonnets is Petrarchan (see "Poetic Forms and Literary Terminology," in the appendices to this volume), but in the later sonnets especially (for example, the Blindness and Piedmont sonnets) the sense runs on from line to line, overriding the expected end-stopped lines and the octave/sestet shift. There is some precedent for this in the Italian sonneteer Giovanni della Casa, but not for the powerful tension Milton creates as meaning and emotion strive within and against the formal metrics of the Petrarchan sonnet. Milton's new ways with the sonnet had a profound influence on the Romantic poets, especially Wordsworth and Shelley.

How Soon Hath Time

How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth,
Stol'n on his wing my three and twentieth year!
My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.
5 Perhaps my semblance might deceive<sup>1</sup> the truth,
That I to manhood am arrived so near,
And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.<sup>o</sup>
Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
10 It shall be still in strictest measure even<sup>2</sup>
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heaven;
All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my great Taskmaster's eye.<sup>3</sup>

On the New Forcers of Conscience under the Long Parliament<sup>1</sup>

Because you have thrown off your prelate lord,<sup>2</sup>
And with stiff vows renounced his liturgy,
To seize the widowed whore Plurality<sup>3</sup>
From them whose sin ye envied, not abhorred,
Dare ye for this adjure<sup>o</sup> the civil sword<sup>4</sup>
5 To force our consciences that Christ set free,
And ride us with a classic hierarchy<sup>5</sup>
Taught ye by mere A. S. and Rutherford?<sup>6</sup>
Men whose life, learning, faith, and pure intent
Would have been held in high esteem with Paul
10 Must now be named and printed heretics
By shallow Edwards and Scotch what-d'ye-call:<sup>7</sup>
But we do hope to find out all your tricks,
Your plots and packing<sup>o</sup> worse than those of Trent,<sup>8</sup>
15 That so the Parliament<sup>9</sup>
May with their wholesome and preventive shears
Clip your phylacteries,<sup>1</sup> though balk your ears,<sup>2</sup>
And succor our just fears
When they shall read this clearly in your charge:
20 New presbyter is but old priest writ large.<sup>3</sup>

- Note 1:
The sonnet targets the Presbyterians, whom Milton in The Reason of Church Government (p. 1408) and other antiprelatical tracts of 1641–42 had supported against the bishops. Now that they have overthrown the bishops and dominate the Long Parliament, they seek to become the national church, repressing all others. This sonetto cauduto, or “tailed sonnet” (an Italian form), has the usual fourteen lines followed by two “tails” of three lines each.

- Note 7: Thomas Edwards analyzed hundreds of so-called heresies in a book picturesquely titled Gangraena (1645, 1646). It even identifies Milton as the founder of a sect of Divorcers, promoting “divorce at pleasure.” “Scotch what-d’ye-call” may refer to another Scots cleric, Robert Baillie, or may simply be a sneer at the unpronounceability of Scottish names.Return to reference 7

- Note 1: The sonnet appeals to Cromwell, a longtime supporter of religious toleration but also of some kind of loosely defined national church, to oppose recent proposals by Independents to set up a national church with a paid clergy and some limits to toleration. ## 1655 Endnotes

1673

- Note 1:
The Waldensians (or Vaudois) were a proto-Protestant sect dating to the 12th century who lived in the valleys of northern Italy (the Piedmont) and southern France; Protestants considered them a remnant retaining apostolic purity, free of Catholic superstitions and graven images ("stocks and stones," line 4). The treaty that had allowed them freedom of worship was bypassed in 1655 when the armies of the Catholic duke of Savoy conducted a massacre, razing villages, committing unspeakable atrocities, and hurling women and children from the mountaintops. Protestant Europe was outraged, and in his capacity as Cromwell's Latin secretary Milton translated and wrote several letters about the episode. The sonnet incorporates details from such letters and the contemporary newsbooks. Here Milton transforms the sonnet into a prophetic denunciation.

Methought I saw my late espoused saint
Brought to me like Alcestis<sup>2</sup> from the grave,
Whom Jove's great son to her glad husband gave,
Rescued from death by force though pale and faint.

5 Mine, as whom<sup>3</sup> washed from spot of childbed taint,
Purification in the old law did save,<sup>4</sup>
And such, as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in heaven without restraint,
Came vested all in white, pure as her mind.
10 Her face was veiled, yet to my fancied sight<sup>5</sup>
Love, sweetness, goodness, in her person shined
So clear, as in no face with more delight.
But O, as to embrace me she inclined,
I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

1658 Endnotes

1673

- Note 1: There is some debate as to whether this poem refers to Milton's first wife, Mary Powell, who died in May 1652, three days after giving birth to her third daughter, or his second wife, Katherine Woodcock, who died in February 1658, after giving birth (in October 1657) to a daughter. The text can support either, but the latter seems more likely. The sonnet is couched as a dream vision.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In Euripides' Alcestis, Alcestis, wife of Admetus, is rescued from the underworld by Hercules ("Jove's great son," next line) and restored, veiled, to Admetus; he is overjoyed when he lifts the veil, but she must remain silent until she is ritually cleansed.Return to reference 2

Paradise Lost The setting of Milton's great epic encompasses Heaven, Hell, primordial Chaos, and the planet earth. It features battles among immortal spirits, voyages through space, and lakes of fire. Yet its protagonists are a married couple living in a garden, and its climax consists in the eating of a piece of fruit. Paradise Lost is ultimately about the human condition, the Fall that caused "all our woe," and the promise and means of restoration. It is also about knowing and choosing, about free will. In the opening passages of Books 1, 3, 7, and 9, Milton highlights the choices and difficulties he faced in creating his poem. His central characters—Satan, Beelzebub, Abdiel, Adam, and Eve—are confronted with hard choices under the pressure of powerful desires and sometimes devious temptations. Milton's readers, too, are continually challenged to choose and to reconsider their most basic assumptions about freedom, heroism, work, pleasure, language, nature, and love. The great themes of Paradise Lost are intimately linked to the political questions at stake in the English Revolution and the Restoration, but the connection is by no means straightforward. This is a poem in which Satan leads a revolution against an absolute monarch and in which questions of tyranny, servitude, and liberty are debated in a parliament in Hell. Milton's readers are hereby challenged to rethink these topics and, like Abdiel debating with Satan in Books 5 and 6, to make crucial distinctions between God as monarch and earthly kings.

In Milton's time, the conventions of epic poetry followed a familiar recipe. The action was to begin in medias res (in the middle of things), following the poet's statement of his theme and invocation of his Muse. The reader could expect grand battles and love affairs, supernatural intervention, a descent into the underworld, catalogues of warriors, and epic similes. Milton had absorbed the epic tradition in its entirety, and his poem abounds with echoes of Homer and Virgil, the fifteenth-century Italians Tasso and Ariosto, and the English Spenser. But in Paradise Lost he at once heightens epic conventions and values and utterly transforms them.

This is the epic to end all epics. Milton gives us the first and greatest of all wars (between God and Satan) and the first and greatest of love affairs (between Adam and Eve). His theme is the destiny of the entire human race, caught up in the temptation and Fall of our first “grand parents.”

Milton challenges his readers in Paradise Lost, at once fulfilling and defying all of our expectations. Nothing in the epic tradition or in biblical interpretation can prepare us for the Satan who hurtles into view in Book 1, with his awesome energy and defiance, incredible fortitude, and, above all, magnificent rhetoric. For some readers, including Blake and Shelley, Satan is the true hero of the poem. But Milton is engaged in a radical reevaluation of epic values, and Satan’s version of heroism must be contrasted with those of the loyal Abdiel and the Son of God. Moreover, the poem’s truly epic action takes place not on the battlefield but in the moral and domestic arena. Milton’s Adam and Eve are not conventional epic heroes, but neither are they the conventional Adam and Eve. Their state of innocence is not childlike, tranquil, and free of sexual desire. Instead, the first couple enjoy sex, experience tension and passion, make mistakes of judgment, and grow in knowledge. Their task is to prune what is unruly in their own natures as they prune the vegetation in their garden, for both have the capacity to grow wild. Their relationship exhibits gender hierarchy, but Milton’s early readers may have been surprised by the fullness and complexity of Eve’s character and the centrality of her role, not only in the Fall but in the promised restoration.

We expect in epics a grand style, and Milton’s style engulfs us from the outset with its energy and power, as those rushing, enjambed, blank-verse lines propel us along with only a few pauses for line endings or grammar (there is only one full stop in the first twenty-six lines). The elevated diction and complex syntax, the sonorities and patternings make a magnificent music. But that music is an entire orchestra of tones, including the high political rhetoric of Satan in Books 1 and 2, the evocative sensuousness of the descriptions of Eden, the delicacy of Eve’s love lyric to Adam in Book

4, the relatively plain speech of God in Book 3, and the speech rhythms of Adam and Eve's marital quarrel in Book 9. This majestic achievement depends on the poet's rejection of heroic couplets, the norm for epic and tragedy in the Restoration, vigorously defended by Dryden but denounced by Milton in his note on "The Verse." The choice of verse form was, like so many other things in Milton's life, in part a question of politics. Milton's terms associate the "troublesome and modern bondage of rhyming" with Restoration monarchy and the repression of dissidents and present his use of unrhymed blank verse as a recovery of "ancient liberty."

The first edition (1667) presented Paradise Lost in ten books; the second (1674) recast it into twelve books, after the Virgilian model, splitting the original Books 7 and 10. We present the twelve-book epic in its entirety, to allow readers to experience the impact of the whole.

PARADISE LOST

SECOND EDITION (1674)

The Verse

The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek and of Virgil in Latin; rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter<sup>1</sup> and lame meter; graced indeed since by the use of some famous modern poets,<sup>2</sup> carried away by custom, but much to their own vexation, hindrance, and constraint to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse than else they would have expressed them. Not without cause therefore some both Italian<sup>3</sup> and Spanish poets of prime note have rejected rhyme both in longer and shorter works, as have also long since our best English tragedies, as a thing of itself, to all judicious ears, trivial and of no true musical delight; which consists only in apt numbers,<sup>4</sup> fit quantity of syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned ancients both in poetry and all good oratory. This neglect then of rhyme so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recovered to heroic poem from the troublesome and modern bondage of rhyming.

The Argument<sup>1</sup>

This first book proposes, first in brief, the whole subject, man's disobedience, and the loss thereupon of Paradise wherein he was placed: then touches the prime cause of his fall, the Serpent, or rather Satan in the Serpent; who revolting from God, and drawing to his side many legions of angels, was by the command of God driven out of Heaven with all his crew into the great deep. Which action passed over, the poem hastes into the midst of things,<sup>2</sup> presenting Satan with his angels now fallen into Hell, described here, not in the center<sup>3</sup> (for Heaven and Earth may be supposed as yet not made, certainly not yet accursed) but in a place of utter darkness, fitliest called Chaos: here Satan with his angels lying on the burning lake, thunderstruck and astonished, after a certain space recovers, as from confusion, calls up him who next in order and dignity lay by him; they confer of their miserable fall. Satan awakens all his legions, who lay till then in the same manner confounded; they rise, their numbers, array of battle, their chief leaders named, according to the idols known afterwards in Canaan and the countries adjoining. To these Satan directs his speech, comforts them with hope yet of regaining Heaven, but tells them lastly of a new world and new kind of creature to be created, according to an ancient prophecy or report in Heaven; for that angels were long before this visible creation, was the opinion of many ancient Fathers.<sup>4</sup> To find out the truth of this prophecy, and what to determine<sup>5</sup> thereon he refers to a full council. What his associates thence attempt. Pandemonium the palace of Satan rises, suddenly built out of the deep: the infernal peers there sit in council.

Th' infernal Serpent; he it was, whose guile
Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived
35 The mother of mankind, what time<sup>o</sup> his pride

Had cast him out from Heav'n, with all his host
Of rebel angels, by whose aid aspiring
To set himself in glory above his peers,<sup>o</sup>
He trusted to have equaled the Most High,
40 If he opposed; and with ambitious aim
Against the throne and monarchy of God
Raised impious war in Heav'n and battle proud
With vain attempt. Him the Almighty Power
Hurled headlong flaming from th' ethereal sky
45 With hideous ruin and combustion down
To bottomless perdition, there to dwell
In adamantin<sup>1</sup>e chains and penal fire,
Who durst defy th' Omnipotent to arms.
Nine times the space<sup>2</sup> that measures day and night
50 To mortal men, he with his horrid crew
Lay vanquished, rolling in the fiery gulf
Confounded though immortal: but his doom
Reserved him to more wrath; for now the thought
Both of lost happiness and lasting pain
55 Torments him; round he throws his baleful<sup>o</sup> eyes
That witnessed huge affliction and dismay
Mixed with obdurate pride and steadfast hate:
At once as far as angels' ken<sup>o</sup> he views
The dismal situation waste and wild,
60 A dungeon horrible, on all sides round
As one great furnace flamed, yet from those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible
Served only to discover sights of woe,
Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
65 And rest can never dwell, hope never comes
That comes to all;<sup>3</sup> but torture without end
Still urges,<sup>o</sup> and a fiery deluge, fed
With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed:
Such place Eternal Justice had prepared
70 For those rebellious, here their prison ordained

In utter darkness, and their portion set
As far removed from God and light of Heav'n
As from the center thrice to th' utmost pole.<sup>4</sup>
O how unlike the place from whence they fell!
75 There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelmed
With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
He soon discerns, and welt'ring<sup>o</sup> by his side
One next himself in power, and next in crime,
Long after known in Palestine, and named
80 Beëlzebub.<sup>5</sup> To whom th' Arch-Enemy,
And thence in Heav'n called Satan,<sup>6</sup> with bold words
Breaking the horrid silence thus began.
"If thou beest he; but O how fall'n!<sup>7</sup> how changed
From him, who in the happy realms of light
85 Clothed with transcendent brightness didst outshine
Myriads though bright: if he whom mutual league,
United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
And hazard in the glorious enterprise,
Joined with me once, now misery hath joined 90 In equal ruin: into what pit thou seest
From what height fall'n, so much the stronger proved
He with his thunder:<sup>o</sup> and till then who knew
The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,
Nor what the potent victor in his rage
95 Can else inflict, do I repent or change,
Though changed in outward luster, that fixed mind
And high disdain, from sense of injured merit,
That with the mightiest raised me to contend,
And to the fierce contention brought along 100 Innumerable force of spirits armed
That durst dislike his reign, and me preferring,
His utmost power with adverse power opposed
In dubious<sup>o</sup> battle on the plains of Heav'n,
And shook his throne. What though the field be lost?

105 All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
And study<sup>o</sup> of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield:
And what is else not to be overcome?<sup>8</sup>
That glory never shall his wrath or might 110 Extort from me. To bow and sue for grace
With suppliant knee, and deify his power
Who from the terror of this arm so late
Doubted<sup>o</sup> his empire, that were low indeed,
That were an ignominy and shame beneath
115 This downfall; since by fate the strength of gods<sup>9</sup>
And this empyreal substance cannot fail,<sup>o</sup>
Since through experience of this great event
In arms not worse, in foresight much advanced,
We may with more successful hope resolve
120 To wage by force or guile eternal war
Irreconcilable, to our grand foe,
Who now triúmphs, and in th' excess of joy
Sole reigning holds the tyranny of Heav'n."

125 So spake th' apostate angel, though in pain,
Vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair:
And him thus answered soon his bold compeer.<sup>o</sup>

"O Prince, O Chief of many thronéd Powers,
That led th' embattled Seraphim<sup>1</sup> to war
Under thy conduct, and in dreadful deeds
130 Fearless, endangered Heav'ns perpetual King;
And put to proof his high supremacy,
Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate;
Too well I see and rue the dire event,<sup>o</sup>
That with sad overthrow and foul defeat
135 Hath lost us Heav'n, and all this mighty host
In horrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as gods and heav'nly essences
Can perish: for the mind and spirit remains
Invincible, and vigor soon returns,
140

Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
Here swallowed up in endless misery.
But what if he our conqueror (whom I now
Of force<sup>o</sup> believe almighty, since no less 145 Than such could have o'erpow'ered such force as ours)
Have left us this our spirit and strength entire Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
That we may so suffice<sup>o</sup> his vengeful ire,
Or do him mightier service as his thralls
By right of war, whate'er his business be 150 Here in the heart of Hell to work in fire,
Or do his errands in the gloomy deep;
What can it then avail though yet we feel
Strength undiminished, or eternal being
To undergo eternal punishment?"
155 Whereto with speedy words th' Arch-Fiend replied.
"Fall'n Cherub, to be weak is miserable
Doing or suffering: but of this be sure,
To do aught<sup>o</sup> good never will be our task,
But ever to do ill our sole delight,
160 As being the contrary to his high will Whom we resist. If then his providence
Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
Our labor must be to pervert that end,
And out of good still to find means of evil;
165 Which ofttimes may succeed, so as perhaps Shall grieve him, if I fail<sup>o</sup> not, and disturb
His inmost counsels from their destined aim.
But see the angry victor hath recalled
His ministers of vengeance and pursuit
170 Back to the gates of Heav'n: the sulphurous hail
Shot after us in storm, o'erblown hath laid<sup>o</sup>
The fiery surge, that from the precipice
Of Heav'n received us falling, and the thunder,
Winged with red lightning and impetuous rage,

175 Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.
Let us not slip<sup>o</sup> th' occasion, whether scorn,
Or satiate fury yield it from our foe.
Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild,
180 The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid<sup>o</sup> flames
Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend
From off the tossing of these fiery waves,
There rest, if any rest can harbor there,
185 And reassembling our afflicted powers,<sup>o</sup>
Consult how we may henceforth most offend<sup>o</sup>
Our enemy, our own loss how repair,
How overcome this dire calamity,
What reinforcement we may gain from hope,
190 If not what resolution from despair."<sup>2</sup>
Thus Satan talking to his nearest mate
With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed, his other parts besides
Prone on the flood, extended long and large 195 Lay floating many a rood,<sup>3</sup> in bulk as huge
As whom<sup>o</sup> the fables name of monstrous size,
Titanian, or Earth-born, that warred on Jove,
Briareos or Typhon,<sup>4</sup> whom the den
By ancient Tarsus held, or that sea-beast
200 Leviathan,<sup>5</sup> which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim th' ocean stream:
Him haply<sup>o</sup> slumb'ring on the Norway foam
The pilot of some small night-foundered<sup>o</sup> skiff,
Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell,<sup>6</sup>
205 With fixèd anchor in his scaly rind
Moors by his side under the lee,<sup>o</sup> while night
Invests<sup>o</sup> the sea, and wishèd morn delays:
So stretched out huge in length the Arch-Fiend lay Chained on the burning lake, nor ever thence 210 Had ris'n or heaved his head, but that the will

And high permission of all-ruling Heaven
Left him at large to his own dark designs,
That with reiterated crimes he might 215 Heap on himself damnation, while he sought
Evil to others, and enraged might see
How all his malice served but to bring forth
Infinite goodness, grace, and mercy shown
On man by him seduced, but on himself
220 Treble confusion, wrath, and vengeance poured.
Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool
His mighty stature; on each hand the flames
Driv'n backward slope their pointing spires,<sup>o</sup> and rolled
In billows, leave i' th' midst a horrid<sup>o</sup> vale.
Then with expanded wings he steers his flight
225 Aloft, incumbent on<sup>o</sup> the dusky air
That felt unusual weight, till on dry land
He lights,<sup>o</sup> if it were land that ever burned
With solid, as the lake with liquid fire,
And such appeared in hue; as when the force
230 Of subterranean wind transports a hill
Torn from Pelorus, or the shattered side
Of thund'ring Etna,<sup>z</sup> whose combustible
And fueled entrails thence conceiving fire,
Sublimed<sup>o</sup> with mineral fury, aid the winds,
235 And leave a singèd bottom all involved<sup>o</sup>
With stench and smoke: such resting found the sole
Of unblest feet. Him followed his next mate,
Both glorying to have scaped the Stygian<sup>o</sup> flood
As gods, and by their own recovered strength, 240 Not by the sufferance<sup>o</sup> of supernal power.
"Is this the region, this the soil, the clime,"
Said then the lost Archangel, "this the seat<sup>o</sup>

That we must change for Heav'n, this mournful gloom
245 For that celestial light? Be it so, since he
Who now is sov'reign can dispose and bid
What shall be right: farthest from him is best
Whom reason hath equaled, force hath made supreme
Above his equals. Farewell happy fields
Where joy forever dwells: Hail horrors, hail
250 Infernal world, and thou profoundest Hell
Receive thy new possessor: one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time.
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a Heav'n of Hell, a Hell of Heav'n.<sup>8</sup>
255 What matter where, if I be still the same,
And what I should be, all but less than<sup>o</sup> he Whom thunder hath made greater? Here at least
We shall be free; th' Almighty hath not built
Here for his envy,<sup>9</sup> will not drive us hence:
260 Here we may reign secure, and in my choice
To reign is worth ambition though in Hell:
Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heav'n.<sup>1</sup>
But wherefore let we then our faithful friends,
Th' associates and copartners of our loss
265 Lie thus astonished<sup>o</sup> on th' oblivious pool,<sup>2</sup>
And call them not to share with us their part
In this unhappy mansion, or once more
With rallied arms to try what may be yet
Regained in Heav'n, or what more lost in Hell?"
270 So Satan spake, and him Beëlzebub
Thus answered. "Leader of those armies bright,
Which but th' Omnipotent none could have foiled,
If once they hear that voice, their liveliest pledge
Of hope in fears and dangers, heard so oft
275 In worst extremes, and on the perilous edge<sup>o</sup>

Of battle when it raged, in all assaults
Their surest signal, they will soon resume
New courage and revive, though now they lie
Groveling and prostrate on yon lake of fire,
280 As we erewhile, astounded and amazed,
No wonder, fall'n such a pernicious highth."
He scarce had ceased when the superior Fiend
Was moving toward the shore; his ponderous shield
Ethereal temper,<sup>3</sup> massy, large and round,
285 Behind him cast; the broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views<sup>4</sup>
At evening from the top of Fesole,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands,
290 Rivers or mountains in her spotty globe.
His spear, to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great ammiral,<sup>5</sup> were but a wand
He walked with to support uneasy steps
295 Over the burning marl,<sup>6</sup> not like those steps
On heaven's azure; and the torrid clime
Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire;
Nathless<sup>7</sup> he so endured, till on the beach
Of that inflamed<sup>8</sup> sea, he stood and called 300 His legions, angel forms, who lay entranced
Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks
In Vallombrosa,<sup>9</sup> where th' Etrurian shades
High overarched embow'r;<sup>10</sup> or scattered sedge<sup>11</sup>
Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion armed 305 Hath vexed the Red Sea coast,<sup>12</sup> whose waves o'erthrew
Busiris<sup>13</sup> and his Memphian chivalry,
While with perfidious hatred they pursued
The sojourners of Goshen, who beheld
From the safe shore their floating carcasses

310 And broken chariot wheels; so thick bestrown
Abject and lost lay these, covering the flood,
Under amazement of their hideous change.
He called so loud, that all the hollow deep
Of Hell resounded. "Princes, Potentates,
315 Warriors, the flow'r of Heav'n, once yours, now lost,
If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal Spirits: or have ye chos'n this place
After the toil of battle to repose
Your wearied virtue,<sup>o</sup> for the ease you find 320 To slumber here, as in the vales of Heav'n?
Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
To adore the conqueror? who now beholds
Cherub and Seraph rolling in the flood
With scattered arms and ensigns,<sup>o</sup> till anon
325 His swift pursuers from Heav'n gates discern
Th' advantage, and descending tread us down
Thus drooping, or with linkèd thunderbolts
Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf.
Awake, arise, or be forever fall'n."
330 They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung
Upon the wing, as when men wont<sup>o</sup> to watch
On duty, sleeping found by whom they dread,
Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.
Nor did they not perceive the evil plight
335 In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;<sup>8</sup>
Yet to their general's voice they soon obeyed
Innumerable. As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son<sup>9</sup> in Egypt's evil day
Waved round the coast, up called a pitchy cloud
340 Of locusts, warping<sup>o</sup> on the eastern wind,
That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh hung
Like night, and darkened all the land of Nile:
So numberless were those bad angels seen

345 Hovering on wing under the cope<sup>o</sup> of Hell
'Twixt upper, nether, and surrounding fires;
Till, as a signal giv'n, th' uplifted spear
Of their great Sultan<sup>1</sup> waving to direct
Their course, in even balance down they light
On the firm brimstone, and fill all the plain;
350 A multitude, like which the populous north
Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
Rhene or the Danaw, when her barbarous sons
Came like a deluge on the south, and spread
Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands.<sup>2</sup>
355 Forthwith from every squadron and each band
The heads and leaders thither haste where stood
Their great commander; godlike shapes and forms
Excelling human, princely dignities,
And powers that erst<sup>o</sup> in Heaven sat on thrones;
360 Though of their names in heav'nly records now
Be no memorial, blotted out and razed<sup>o</sup>
By their rebellion, from the Books of Life.
Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve
Got them new names, till wand'ring o'er the earth,
365 Through God's high sufferance for the trial of man,
By falsities and lies the greatest part
Of mankind they corrupted to forsake
God their Creator, and th' invisible
Glory of him that made them, to transform 370 Oft to the image of a brute, adorned
With gay religions<sup>o</sup> full of pomp and gold,
And devils to adore for deities:
Then were they known to men by various names,
And various idols through the heathen world.
375 Say, Muse, their names then known, who first, who last,<sup>3</sup>
Roused from the slumber on that fiery couch,
At their great emperor's call, as next in worth

Came singly<sup>o</sup> where he stood on the bare strand,
While the promiscuous<sup>o</sup> crowd stood yet aloof.
380 The chief were those who from the pit of Hell
Roaming to seek their prey on earth, durst fix
Their seats long after next the seat of God,<sup>4</sup>
Their altars by his altar, gods adored
Among the nations round, and durst abide
385 Jehovah thund'ring out of Zion, throned
Between the Cherubim;<sup>5</sup> yea, often placed Within his sanctuary itself their shrines,
Abomination; and with cursèd things
His holy rites, and solemn feasts profaned,
390 And with their darkness durst affront his light.
First Moloch,<sup>6</sup> horrid king besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears,
Though for the noise of drums and timbrels<sup>o</sup> loud
Their children's cries unheard, that passed through 395 fire
To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite<sup>7</sup>
Worshipped in Rabba and her wat'ry plain,
In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such Audacious neighborhood, the wisest heart
400 Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
His temple right against the temple of God
On that opprobrious hill, and made his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence
And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell.<sup>8</sup>
405 Next Chemos,<sup>9</sup> th' obscene dread of Moab's sons,
From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild
Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
And Horanaim, Seon's realm, beyond
The flow'ry dale of Sibma clad with vines,
410 And Elealè to th' Asphaltic Pool.<sup>1</sup>
Peor<sup>2</sup> his other name, when he enticed

Israel in Sittim on their march from Nile
To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.
Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged
415 Even to that hill of scandal,<sup>3</sup> by the grove
Of Moloch homicide, lust hard by<sup>o</sup> hate;
Till good Josiah drove them thence to Hell.
With these came they, who from the bord'ring flood
Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts
420 Egypt from Syrian ground,<sup>4</sup> had general names
Of Baalim and Ashtaroth, those male,
These feminine.<sup>5</sup> For Spirits when they please
Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
And uncompounded is their essence pure,
425 Not tied or manacled with joint or limb,
Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
Like cumbrous flesh; but in what shape they choose
Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
Can execute their airy purposes,
430 And works of love or enmity fulfill.
For those the race of Israel oft forsook
Their Living Strength, and unfrequented left
His righteous altar, bowing lowly down
To bestial gods; for which their heads as low
435 Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
Of despicable foes. With these in troop
Came Astoreth, whom the Phoenicians called
Astartè, queen of Heav'n, with crescent horns;
To whose bright image nightly by the moon
440 Sidonian virgins<sup>6</sup> paid their vows and songs,
In Sion also not unsung, where stood
Her temple on th' offensive mountain,<sup>7</sup> built
By that uxorious king, whose heart though large,
Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell
445 To idols foul. Thammuz<sup>8</sup> came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured

The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis<sup>9</sup> from his native work
450 Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded: the love-tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel<sup>1</sup> saw, when by the vision led 455 His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah. Next came one
Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
Maimed his brute image, head and hands lopped off
In his own temple, on the grunsel edge,<sup>2</sup>
460 Where he fell flat, and shamed his worshippers:
Dagon his name, sea monster, upward man
And downward fish: yet had his temple high
Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon
465 And Accaron and Gaza's<sup>3</sup> frontier bounds.
Him followed Rimmon,<sup>4</sup> whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams.
He also against the house of God was bold:
470 A leper once he lost and gained a king,
Ahaz his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
God's altar to disparage and displace
For one of Syrian mode,<sup>5</sup> whereon to burn
His odious off'rings, and adore the gods
475 Whom he had vanquished. After these appeared
A crew who under names of old renown,
Osiris, Isis, Orus<sup>6</sup> and their train
With monstrous shapes and sorceries abused
Fanatic Egypt and her priests, to seek 480 Their wand'ring gods disguised in brutish forms
Rather than human. Nor did Israel scape

Th' infection when their borrowed gold composed
 The calf in Oreb:<sup>7</sup> and the rebel king
 Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan,
 485 Lik'ning his Maker to the grazèd ox,<sup>8</sup>
 Jehovah, who in one night when he passed
 From Egypt marching, equaled<sup>9</sup> with one stroke
 Both her firstborn and all her bleating gods.<sup>9</sup>
 Belial came last,<sup>1</sup> than whom a spirit more lewd
 490 Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
 Vice for itself: to him no temple stood
 Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
 In temples and at altars, when the priest
 495 Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons,<sup>2</sup> who filled
 With lust and violence the house of God.
 In courts and palaces he also reigns
 And in luxurious cities, where the noise
 Of riot ascends above their loftiest tow'rs,
 And injury and outrage: and when night
 500 Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
 Of Belial, flown<sup>10</sup> with insolence and wine.<sup>3</sup>
 Witness the streets of Sodom, and that night
 In Gibeah, when the hospitable door
 Exposed a matron to avoid worse rape.<sup>4</sup>
 505       These were the prime in order and in might;
 The rest were long to tell, though far renowned,
 Th' Ionian gods, of Javan's issue held
 Gods, yet confessed later than Heav'n and Earth
 Their boasted parents;<sup>5</sup> Titan Heav'n's firstborn
 510 With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
 By younger Saturn, he from mightier Jove,
 His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;
 So Jove usurping reigned:<sup>6</sup> these first in Crete
 And Ida known, thence on the snowy top
 515 Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air
 Their highest heav'n; or on the Delphian cliff,

Or in Dodona, and through all the bounds
Of Doric land;<sup>7</sup> or who with Saturn old
Fled over Adria to th' Hesperian fields,
520 And o'er the Celtic roamed the utmost isles.<sup>8</sup>
All these and more came flocking; but with looks
Downcast and damp,<sup>9</sup> yet such wherein appeared Obscure some glimpse of joy, to have found their chief
Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost
525 In loss itself; which on his count'nance cast
Like doubtful hue:<sup>9</sup> but he his wonted<sup>9</sup> pride
Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore
Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised
Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears.
530 Then straight<sup>9</sup> commands that at the warlike sound
Of trumpets loud and clarions be upreared
His mighty standard; that proud honor claimed
Azazel<sup>1</sup> as his right, a Cherub tall:
Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
535 Th' imperial ensign, which full high advanced
Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind
With gems and golden luster rich emblazed,
Seraphic arms and trophies:<sup>2</sup> all the while Sonorous metal<sup>9</sup> blowing martial sounds:
540 At which the universal host upsent
A shout that tore Hell's concave,<sup>9</sup> and beyond
Frighted the reign of Chaos and old Night.<sup>3</sup>
All in a moment through the gloom were seen
Ten thousand banners rise into the air
545 With orient<sup>9</sup> colors waving: with them rose
A forest huge of spears: and thronging helms
Appeared, and serried<sup>9</sup> shields in thick array
Of depth immeasurable: anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian<sup>4</sup> mood
550 Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised

To highth of noblest temper heroes old
Arming to battle, and instead of rage
Deliberate valor breathed, firm and unmoved
With dread of death to flight or foul retreat,
555 Nor wanting power to mitigate and swage<sup>o</sup>
With solemn touches, troubled thoughts, and chase
Anguish and doubt and fear and sorrow and pain
From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they Breathing united force with fixèd thought
560 Moved on in silence to soft pipes that charmed
Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil; and now
Advanced in view they stand, a horrid<sup>o</sup> front
Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
Of warriors old with ordered spear and shield,
565 Awaiting what command their mighty chief
Had to impose. He through the armèd files
Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse<sup>o</sup>
The whole battalion views, their order due,
Their visages and stature as of gods,
570 Their number last he sums. And now his heart
Distends with pride, and hard'ning in his strength
Glories: for never since created man<sup>5</sup>
Met such embodied force, as named<sup>o</sup> with these Could merit more than that small infantry
575 Warred on by cranes:<sup>6</sup> though all the giant brood
Of Phlegra with th' heroic race were joined
That fought at Thebes and Ilium,<sup>7</sup> on each side
Mixed with auxiliar<sup>o</sup> gods; and what resounds
In fable or romance of Uther's son
580 Begirt with British and Armoric knights;
And all who since, baptized or infidel
Jousted in Aspramont or Montalban,
Damasco, or Morocco, or Trebisonde,
Or whom Biserta sent from Afric shore
585 When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell

By Fontarabia.<sup>8</sup> Thus far these beyond
Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed<sup>o</sup>
Their dread commander: he above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent
590 Stood like a tow'r; his form had yet not lost
All her<sup>9</sup> original brightness, nor appeared
Less than Archangel ruined, and th' excess
Of glory obscured: as when the sun new-ris'n
Looks through the horizontal<sup>o</sup> misty air
595 Shorn of his beams, or from behind the moon
In dim eclipse disastrous<sup>o</sup> twilight sheds
On half the nations, and with fear of change
Perplexes monarchs. Darkened so, yet shone
Above them all th' Archangel: but his face
600 Deep scars of thunder had intrenched,<sup>o</sup> and care
Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
Of dauntless courage, and considerate<sup>o</sup> pride
Waiting revenge: cruel his eye, but cast
Signs of remorse and passion<sup>o</sup> to behold
605 The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss) condemned
Forever now to have their lot in pain,
Millions of Spirits for his fault amerced<sup>o</sup>
Of Heav'n, and from eternal splendors flung 610 For his revolt, yet faithful how they stood,
Their glory withered: as when Heaven's fire
Hath scathed<sup>o</sup> the forest oaks, or mountain pines,
With singèd top their stately growth though bare
Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared
615 To speak; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
With all his peers: attention held them mute.
Thrice he essayed,<sup>o</sup> and thrice, in spite of scorn,
Tears such as angels weep burst forth: at last 620 Words interwove with sighs found out their way.

“O myriads of immortal Spirits, O Powers
Matchless, but with th’ Almighty, and that strife
Was not inglorious, though th’ event<sup>o</sup> was dire,
As this place testifies, and this dire change
625 Hateful to utter: but what power of mind
Foreseeing or presaging, from the depth
Of knowledge past or present, could have feared,
How such united force of gods, how such
As stood like these, could ever know repulse?
630 For who can yet believe, though after loss,
That all these puissant<sup>o</sup> legions, whose exile
Hath emptied Heav’n, shall fail to reascend
Self-raised, and repossess their native seat?
For me, be witness all the host of Heav’n,
635 If counsels different,<sup>o</sup> or danger shunned
By me, have lost our hopes. But he who reigns
Monarch in Heav’n, till then as one secure
Sat on his throne, upheld by old repute,
Consent or custom, and his regal state
640 Put forth at full, but still<sup>o</sup> his strength concealed,
Which tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall.
Henceforth his might we know, and know our own
So as not either to provoke, or dread
New war, provoked; our better part remains
645 To work in close design, by fraud or guile
What force effected not: that he no less
At length from us may find, who overcomes
By force, hath overcome but half his foe.
Space may produce new worlds; whereof so rife<sup>o</sup>
650 There went a fame<sup>o</sup> in Heav’n that he ere long
Intended to create, and therein plant
A generation, whom his choice regard
Should favor equal to the sons of Heaven:
Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps 655 Our first eruption,<sup>o</sup> thither or elsewhere:
For this infernal pit shall never hold

Celestial Spirits in bondage, not th' abyss
 Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts
 Full counsel must mature: peace is despaired,
 660 For who can think submission? War then, war
 Open or understood<sup>o</sup> must be resolved."

He spake: and to confirm his words, out flew
 Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
 Of mighty Cherubim; the sudden blaze
 665 Far round illumined Hell: highly they raged
 Against the Highest, and fierce with grasped arms
 Clashed on their sounding shields the din of war,<sup>1</sup>
 Hurling defiance toward the vault of Heav'n.

There stood a hill not far whose grisly top
 670 Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire Shone with a glossy scurf,<sup>o</sup> undoubted sign
 That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
 The work of sulphur.<sup>2</sup> Thither winged with speed
 A numerous brigade hastened. As when bands
 675 Of pioneers<sup>o</sup> with spade and pickax armed Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
 Or cast a rampart. Mammon<sup>3</sup> led them on,
 Mammon, the least erected Spirit that fell
 From Heav'n, for ev'n in Heav'n his looks and 680 thoughts
 Were always downward bent, admiring more
 The riches of Heav'n's pavement, trodden gold,
 Than aught divine or holy else enjoyed
 In vision beatific: by him first
 Men also, and by his suggestion taught,
 685 Ransacked the center, and with impious hands
 Rifled the bowels of their mother earth
 For treasures better hid. Soon had his crew
 Opened into the hill a spacious wound
 And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire<sup>o</sup>
 690 That riches grow in Hell; that soil may best

Deserve the precious bane.° And here let those Who boast in mortal things, and wond'ring tell
Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings,<sup>4</sup>
Learn how their greatest monuments of fame,
695 And strength and art are easily outdone
By Spirits reprobate, and in an hour
What in an age they with incessant toil
And hands innumerable scarce perform.
Nigh on the plain in many cells prepared,
700 That underneath had veins of liquid fire
Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
With wondrous art founded° the massy ore,
Severing° each kind, and scummed the bullion dross:°
A third as soon had formed within the ground
705 A various mold, and from the boiling cells
By strange conveyance filled each hollow nook,
As in an organ from one blast of wind
To many a row of pipes the soundboard breathes.
Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
710 Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
Built like a temple,<sup>5</sup> where pilasters° round
Were set, and Doric pillars<sup>6</sup> overlaid
With golden architrave; nor did there want
715 Cornice or frieze, with bossy° sculptures grav'n;
The roof was fretted° gold. Not Babylon,
Nor great Alcairo such magnificence
Equaled in all their glories, to enshrine
Belus or Serapis<sup>7</sup> their gods, or seat
720 Their kings, when Egypt with Assyria strove
In wealth and luxury. Th' ascending pile Stood fixed° her stately height, and straight° the doors
Opening their brazen folds discover° wide

725      Within, her ample spaces, o'er the smooth
And level pavement: from the archèd roof
Pendent by subtle magic many a row
Of starry lamps and blazing cressets<sup>8</sup> fed
With naphtha and asphaltus yielded light
As from a sky. The hasty multitude
730      Admiring entered, and the work some praise
And some the architect: his hand was known
In Heav'n by many a towered structure high,
Where sceptered angels held their residence,
And sat as princes, whom the Súpreme King
735      Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.
Nor was his name unheard or unadored
In ancient Greece and in Ausonian land
Men called him Mulciber<sup>9</sup> and how he fell
740      From Heav'n, they fabled, thrown by angry Jove
Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn
To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
A summer's day; and with the setting sun
Dropped from the zenith like a falling star,
745      On Lemnos th' Aégean isle: thus they relate,
Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
To have built in Heav'n high tow'rs; nor did he scape
By all his engines, but was headlong sent 750      With his industrious crew to build in Hell.

    Meanwhile the wingèd heralds by command
Of sov'reign power, with awful ceremony
And trumpet's sound throughout the host proclaim
A solemn council forthwith to be held
755      At Pandemonium,<sup>1</sup> the high capitol
Of Satan and his peers:<sup>o</sup> their summons called
From every band and squarèd regiment
By place<sup>o</sup> or choice<sup>o</sup> the worthiest; they anon

760 With hundreds and with thousands trooping came Attended: all access was thronged, the gates
And porches wide, but chief the spacious hall
(Though like a covered field, where champions bold
Wont ride in armed, and at the soldan's<sup>o</sup> chair
Defied the best of paynim<sup>o</sup> chivalry
765 To mortal combat or career with lance)
Thick swarmed, both on the ground and in the air,
Brushed with the hiss of rustling wings. As bees
In springtime, when the sun with Taurus rides,<sup>2</sup>
Pour forth their populous youth about the hive
770 In clusters; they among fresh dews and flowers
Fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank,
The suburb of their straw-built citadel,
New rubbed with balm, expatiate and confer<sup>3</sup>
Their state affairs. So thick the aery crowd
775 Swarmed and were straitened; till the signal giv'n,
Behold a wonder! They but now who seemed
In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons
Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
Throng numberless, like that Pygmean race
780 Beyond the Indian mount,<sup>4</sup> or fairy elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest side
Or fountain some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees, while overhead the moon
Sits arbitress,<sup>o</sup> and nearer to the earth 785 Wheels her pale course: they on their mirth and dance
Intent, with jocund<sup>o</sup> music charm his ear;<sup>5</sup>
At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
Thus incorporeal Spirits to smallest forms
Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large,
790 Though without number still amidst the hall
Of that infernal court. But far within
And in their own dimensions like themselves

The great Seraphic Lords and Cherubim
 In close recess and secret conclave sat,
 A thousand demigods on golden seats,
 Frequent and full.<sup>6</sup> After short silence then
 And summons read, the great consult<sup>7</sup> began.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Paradise Lost appeared originally without any sort of prose aid to the reader, but the printer asked Milton for some "Arguments," or summary explanations of the action in the various books, and these were prefixed to later issues of the poem.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: According to Horace, the epic poet should begin "in medias res."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, of the earth.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Church Fathers, the Christian writers of the first centuries.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, what action to take.Return to reference 5
- Note 1: Eve's apple, and all the consequences of eating it. This first proem (lines 1–26) combines the epic statement of theme and invocation.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Christ, the second Adam.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Greek mythology, Urania, Muse of astronomy; here, however, by the references to Oreb (Horeb) and Sinai (following), identified with the Muse who inspired Moses ("that shepherd") to write Genesis and the other four books of the Pentateuch for the instruction of the Jews ("the chosen seed").Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Mount Zion: the site of Solomon's Temple. "Siloa's brook" (next line): a spring near the Temple where Christ cured a blind man.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Helicon, home of the classical Muses. Milton will attempt to surpass Homer and Virgil.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Paradoxically, Milton vaunts his originality in a translated line from Ariosto's Orlando Furioso 1.2. The allusion also challenges the romantic epic in Ariosto's tradition.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Here identified with God's creating power.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A composite of phrases and ideas from Genesis 1:2 ("And the earth was without form, and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters"). Only a small number of Milton's many allusions to the Bible (in many versions) can be indicated in the notes. Milton's brooding dove image comes from the Latin (Tremellius) Bible version, incubabat, "incubated."Return to reference 8
- Note 9: An opening question like this is an epic convention.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A mythical substance of great hardness.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Extent of time.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The phrase alludes to Dante ("All hope abandon, ye who enter here").Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Milton makes use of various images of the cosmos in Paradise Lost: (1) the earth is the center of the (Ptolemaic) cosmos of ten concentric spheres; (2) the earth and the whole cosmos are an appendage hanging from Heaven by a golden chain; (3) the cosmos seems Copernican from the angels' perspective (see Book 8). Here, the fall from Heaven to Hell is described as thrice as far as the distance from the center (earth) to the outermost sphere.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A Phoenician deity, or Baal (the name means "Lord of Flies"). He is called the prince of devils in Matthew 12:24. As with the other fallen angels, his angelic name has been obliterated, and he is now called by the name he will bear as a pagan deity. That literary strategy evokes all the evil associations attaching to those names in human history.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: In Hebrew the name means “adversary.”Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Alludes to Isaiah 14:12: “How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, Son of the morning.”Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, what else does it mean not to be overcome?
Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A term commonly used in the poem for angels. But to Satan and his followers it means more, as Satan claims the position of a god, subject to fate but nothing else. Their substance is “empyrean” (next line), of the empyrean.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: According to tradition, there were nine orders of angels, arranged hierarchically—seraphim, cherubim, thrones, dominions, virtues, powers, principalities, archangels, and angels. The poem makes use of some of these titles but does not keep this hierarchy.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Five of the last nine lines of Satan’s speech rhyme.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: An old unit of measure, between six and eight yards.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Both the Titans, led by Briareos (said to have had a hundred hands), and the earth-born Giants, represented by Typhon (who lived in Cilicea near Tarsus and was said to have had a hundred heads), fought with Jove. They were punished by being thrown into the underworld. Christian mythographers found in these stories an analogy to Satan’s revolt and punishment.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The whale, often identified with the great sea monster and enemy of the Lord in Isaiah 17:1 and the crocodile-like dragon of Job 41. Both were also identified with Satan.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The story of the deceived sailor and the illusory island was a commonplace, but the reference to Norway suggests a 16th-century version by Olaus Magnus, a Swedish historian.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Pelorus and Etna are volcanic mountains in Sicily.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Compare Satan's soliloquy, 4.32–113.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, because he desires this place.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: An ironic echo of Odyssey 11.489–91, where the shade of Achilles tells Odysseus that it is better to be a farmhand on earth than king among the dead.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The epithet "oblivious" is transferred from the fallen angels to the pool into which they have fallen.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, tempered in celestial fire.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Galileo, who looked through a telescope ("optic glass") from the hill town of Fiesole, outside Florence, in the valley of the Arno River ("Valdarno," val d'Arno, line 290). In 1610 he published a book describing the mountains on the moon.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The name means "shady valley" and refers to a region high in the Apennines, about twenty miles from Florence, in Tuscany ("Etruria"). Similes comparing the numberless dead to falling leaves are frequent in epic (for example, Aeneid 6.309–10).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Orion is a constellation whose rising near sunset in late summer and autumn was associated with storms in the Red Sea.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Mythical Egyptian pharaoh, whom Milton associates with the pharaoh of Exodus 14, who pursued the Israelites ("sojourners of Goshen," line 309) into the Red Sea, which God parted for them. His "chivalry" (following) are horsemen from Memphis.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The double negatives make a positive: they did perceive both plight and pain.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Moses, who drew down a plague of locusts on Egypt (Exodus 10:12–15).Return to reference 9

- Note 1: A first use of this description of Satan as an Oriental despot.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The barbarian invasions of Rome began with crossings of the Rhine ("Rhene") and Danube ("Danaw") rivers and spread across Spain, via Gibraltar, to North Africa.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The catalogue of gods here is an epic convention; Homer catalogues ships; Virgil, warriors.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The first group of devils come from the Middle East, close neighbors of Jehovah "throned" in his sanctuary in Jerusalem.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Golden cherubim adorned opposite ends of the gold cover on the Ark of the Covenant.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Moloch was a sun god, sometimes represented as a roaring bull or with a calf's head, within whose brazen image living children were supposedly burned as sacrifices.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Ammonites lived east of the Jordan River. "Rabba" (next line) is modern Amman, in Jordan; "Argob," "Basan," "utmost Arnon" (lines 398–99) are lands east of the Dead Sea.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The rites of Moloch on "that opprobrious hill" (the Mount of Olives), just opposite the Jewish temple, and in the valley of Hinnom so polluted those places that they were turned into the refuse dump of Jerusalem. Under the name "Tophet" and "Gehenna," Hinnom became a type of Hell.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Chemos, or Chemosh, associated with Moloch in 1 Kings 11:7, was the god of the Moabites, whose lands (many drawn from Isaiah 15–16) are mentioned in the following lines.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The Dead Sea.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The story of Peor seducing the Israelites in Sittim is told in Numbers 25.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Mount of Olives, where Solomon built temples for Chemos and Moloch (1 Kings 11:7); epithets were commonly attached to the names of gods, as in the next line, Moloch “homicide.” Josiah (following line) destroyed pagan idols in Jerusalem and other cities (2 Chronicles 34).Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Palestine lies between the Euphrates and “the brook Besor” (1 Samuel 30:10).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Plural forms, masculine and feminine, respectively, denoting aspects of the sun god Baal and the moon goddess Astarte (called “Astareth” in line 438, below).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Sidon and Tyre were the chief cities of Phoenicia.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Mount of Olives again. “That uxorious king” (next line) is Solomon, who “loved many strange women” (2 Kings 11:1–8).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A Syrian god, supposedly killed by a boar in Lebanon; his Greek form was Adonis, beloved of Aphrodite and god of the solar year. Annual festivals mourned his death and celebrated his revival as signifying the death and rebirth of vegetation.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Here, the Lebanese river named for the deity because every spring it turned bloodred from sedimentary mud.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The prophet complained that Jewish women were worshipping Thammuz (Ezekiel 8:14).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: When the Philistines stole the ark of God, they placed it in the temple of their sea god, Dagon, but in the morning the mutilated statue of Dagon was found on the threshold (“grunsel edge”) (1 Samuel 5:1–5).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The five chief cities of the Philistines, sites of Dagon’s worship.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A Phoenician god whose temple was in Damascus.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A Syrian general, Naaman, was cured of leprosy and converted from worship of Rimmon by the waters of the Jordan (2 Kings 5), while King Ahaz, an Israelite monarch who conquered Damascus, was converted there to Rimmon's worship.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: The second group of devils includes the Egyptian gods driven from Heaven by the revolt of the giants (Ovid, Metamorphoses 5) and forced to wander in "monstrous" (next line) animal disguises.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In the wilderness of Egypt, while Moses was receiving the Law, Aaron made a golden calf, thought to be an idol of the Egyptian god Apis and made of ornaments brought out of Egypt (Exodus 32).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Jeroboam, "the rebel king" who led the ten tribes of Israel in revolt against Solomon's son, Rehoboam; he doubled Aaron's sin by making two golden calves (1 Kings 12:25–30).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Jehovah smote the firstborn of all Egyptian families as well as their gods (Exodus 12:12).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Belial was never worshipped as a god; his name means "wickedness," but its use in phrases like "sons of Belial" encouraged personification.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Priests who were termed "sons of Belial" because they seized for themselves offerings made to God and lay with women who assembled at the door of the tabernacle (1 Samuel 2:12–22).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: This passage, with its present-tense verbs, invites application to current examples—at court and in Restoration London.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Lot begged the Sodomites to rape his daughters rather than his (male) angel guests (Genesis 19); in Gibeah a Levite avoided "worse" (homosexual) rape by surrendering his concubine to riotous "sons of Belial" (Judges 19:21–30).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Ionian Greeks ("Javan's issue," that is, of the line of Javan, grandson of Noah) regarded the Titans as gods; their supposed parents were Heaven (Uranus) and Earth (Gaia).Return to reference 5

- Note 6: The Titan Cronos, or Saturn, deposed his father, married his sister Rhea, and ruled until he was deposed by his son, Zeus (Jove), who had been reared in secret on Mount Ida in Crete.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Zeus and the other Olympian gods had their seat on Mount Olympus, in “middle air”; they were worshipped in Delphi, Dodona, and throughout Greece (“Doric lands”).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Saturn, after his downfall, fled over “Adria” (the Adriatic Sea) to the “Hesperian fields” (Italy), crossed the “Celtic” fields of France, and thence to Britain, the “utmost isles.”Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Satan’s face reflected the same mixed emotions.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Traditionally, one of the four standard-bearers in Satan’s army. “Clarions” (line 532): small, shrill trumpets.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Their flags bear the heraldic arms of the various orders of angels and memorials of their battles.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Paradise Lost 2.894–909, 959–70 Chaos and Night rule the region of unformed matter between Heaven and earth.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Severe, martial music used by the Spartans marching to battle. “Phalanx”: battle formation.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, since the creation of man.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Pygmies (little people, with a pun, in “infantry” on “infants”) had periodic fights with the cranes, in Pliny’s account. Compared with Satan’s forces, all other armies are puny.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In Greek mythology, the Giants fought the gods at Phlegra in Macedonia; in Roman myth, it was at Phlegra in Italy. Satan’s forces surpass them, even if joined with the Seven who fought against Thebes and the whole Greek host that besieged Troy (“Ilium”).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Satan’s forces also surpass the “British and Armoric” (from Brittany) knights who fought with King Arthur (“Uther’s son”) and all the romance knights who fought at the famous named sites in the following lines. Roncesvalles, near Fontarabia, was the place where Charlemagne’s “peerage,” including his best knight, Roland, were defeated in battle (though not Charlemagne himself).Return to reference 8

- Note 9: Forma in Latin is feminine.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Like Roman legionnaires, the fallen angels applaud by beating swords on shields.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Sulfur and mercury were considered the basic substances of all metals.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: “Mammon,” an abstract word for riches, came to be personified and associated with the god of wealth, Plutus, and so with Pluto, god of the underworld. See Matthew 6:24: “Ye cannot serve God and mammon.”Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Tower of Babel and the pyramids of Egypt.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: After melting the gold with fire from the lake and pouring it into molds, the devils cause their building to rise as by magic, to the sounds of marvelous music.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Doric pillars are severe and plain. The devils’ palace combines classical architectural features with elaborate ornamentation, suggesting, perhaps, St. Peter’s in Rome.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: At Babylon, in Assyria, there were temples to “Belus” or Baal; at Alcairo (modern Cairo, ancient Memphis), in Egypt, they were to Osiris (“Serapis”).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Basketlike lamps, hung from the ceiling.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Hephaestus, or Vulcan, was sometimes known in “Ausonian land” (Italy) as “Mulciber.” The story of Jove’s tossing him out of Heaven (see following lines) is told in Book 1 of the Iliad.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: “Pandemonium” (a Miltonic coinage) means literally “all demons,” an inversion of “pantheon,” “all gods.”Return to reference 1

- Note 2: The sun is in the zodiacal sign of Taurus from about April 19 to May 20.Return to reference 2

Book 2

The Argument

The consultation begun, Satan debates whether another battle be to be hazarded for the recovery of heaven: some advise it, others dissuade: a third proposal is preferred, mentioned before by Satan, to search the truth of that prophecy or tradition in heaven concerning another world, and another kind of creature equal or not much inferior to themselves, about this time to be created: their doubt who shall be sent on this difficult search; Satan their chief undertakes alone the voyage, is honored and applauded. The council thus ended, the rest betake them several ways and to several employments, as their inclinations lead them, to entertain the time till Satan return. He passes on his journey to hell gates, finds them shut, and who sat there to guard them, by whom at length they are opened, and discover to him the great gulf between hell and heaven; with what difficulty he passes through, directed by Chaos, the power of that place, to the sight of this new world which he sought.

High on a throne of royal state, which far
Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind,<sup>1</sup>
Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand
Show'rs on her kings barbaric pearl and gold,
Satan exalted sat, by merit raised
5 To that bad eminence; and from despair
Thus high uplifted beyond hope, aspires
Beyond thus high, insatiate to pursue
Vain war with Heav'n, and by success<sup>o</sup> untaught
His proud imaginations<sup>o</sup> thus displayed.
10 "Powers and Dominions,<sup>2</sup> deities of Heaven,

For since no deep within her gulf can hold
Immortal vigor, though oppressed and fall'n,
I give not Heav'n for lost. From this descent
Celestial Virtues rising, will appear
15 More glorious and more dread than from no fall,
And trust themselves to fear no second fate.
Me though just right, and the fixed laws of Heav'n
Did first create your leader, next, free choice,
With what besides, in counsel or in fight,
20 Hath been achieved of merit, yet this loss
Thus far at least recovered, hath much more
Established in a safe unenvied throne
Yielded with full consent. The happier state
In Heav'n, which follows dignity, might draw
25 Envy from each inferior; but who here
Will envy whom the highest place exposes
Foremost to stand against the Thunderer's aim
Your bulwark, and condemns to greatest share
Of endless pain? Where there is then no good
30 For which to strive, no strife can grow up there
From faction; for none sure will claim in Hell
Precédence, none, whose portion is so small
Of present pain, that with ambitious mind
Will covet more. With this advantage then 35 To union, and firm faith, and firm accord,
More than can be in Heav'n, we now return
To claim our just inheritance of old,
Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us;<sup>3</sup> and by what best way,
40 Whether of open war or covert guile,<sup>4</sup>
We now debate; who can advise, may speak."
He ceased, and next him Moloch, sceptered king
Stood up, the strongest and the fiercest Spirit
That fought in Heav'n; now fiercer by despair:
45 His trust was with th' Eternal to be deemed

Equal in strength, and rather than be less
Cared not to be at all; with that care lost
Went all his fear: of God, or Hell, or worse
He recked<sup>o</sup> not, and these words thereafter spake.
50     “My sentence<sup>o</sup> is for open war: of wiles,
More unexpért,<sup>o</sup> I boast not: them let those Contrive who need, or when they need, not now.
For while they sit contriving, shall the rest,
Millions that stand in arms, and longing wait
55     The signal to ascend, sit lingering here
Heav’n’s fugitives, and for their dwelling place
Accept this dark opprobrious den of shame,
The prison of his tyranny who reigns
By our delay? No, let us rather choose
60     Armed with Hell flames and fury all at once
O’er Heav’n’s high tow’rs to force resistless way,
Turning our tortures into horrid<sup>o</sup> arms
Against the Torturer; when to meet the noise
Of his almighty engine<sup>o</sup> he shall hear
65     Infernal thunder, and for lightning see
Black fire and horror shot with equal rage
Among his angels; and his throne itself
Mixed with Tartarean<sup>5</sup> sulfur, and strange fire,
His own invented torments. But perhaps 70     The way seems difficult and steep to scale
With upright wing against a higher foe.
Let such bethink them, if the sleepy drench<sup>o</sup>
Of that forgetful<sup>o</sup> lake benumb not still,
That in our proper<sup>o</sup> motion we ascend
75     Up to our native seat: descent and fall
To us is adverse. Who but felt of late
When the fierce foe hung on our broken rear
Insulting,<sup>6</sup> and pursued us through the deep,
With what compulsion and laborious flight
80     We sunk thus low? Th’ ascent is easy then;

Th' event<sup>o</sup> is feared; should we again provoke
Our stronger, some worse way his wrath may find
To our destruction: if there be in Hell
Fear to be worse destroyed: what can be worse
85 Than to dwell here, driven out from bliss, condemned
In this abhorrèd deep to utter woe;
Where pain of unextinguishable fire
Must exercise<sup>o</sup> us without hope of end
The vassals<sup>7</sup> of his anger, when the scourge
90 Inexorably, and the torturing hour
Calls us to penance? More destroyed than thus
We should be quite abolished and expire.
What fear we then? What<sup>o</sup> doubt we to incense
His utmost ire? which to the height enraged,
95 Will either quite consume us, and reduce
To nothing this essential,<sup>o</sup> happier far
Than miserable to have eternal being:
Or if our substance be indeed divine,
And cannot cease to be, we are at worst
100 On this side nothing;<sup>8</sup> and by proof we feel
Our power sufficient to disturb his Heav'n,
And with perpetual inroads to alarm,
Though inaccessible, his fatal<sup>9</sup> throne:
Which if not victory is yet revenge."
105 He ended frowning, and his look, denounced<sup>o</sup>
Desperate revenge, and battle dangerous
To less than gods. On th' other side up rose
Belial, in act more graceful and humane;<sup>o</sup>
A fairer person lost not Heav'n; he seemed 110 For dignity composed and high exploit:
But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
Dropped manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason,<sup>1</sup> to perplex and dash<sup>o</sup>
Maturest counsels: for his thoughts were low;

115 To vice industrious, but to nobler deeds
Timorous and slothful: yet he pleased the ear,
And with persuasive accent thus began.
    "I should be much for open war, O Peers,
As not behind in hate; if what was urged
120 Main reason to persuade immediate war,
Did not dissuade me most, and seem to cast
Ominous conjecture on the whole success:
When he who most excels in fact<sup>o</sup> of arms,
In what he counsels and in what excels
125 Mistrustful, grounds his courage on despair
And utter dissolution, as the scope
Of all his aim, after some dire revenge.
First, what revenge? The tow'rs of Heav'n are filled
With armèd watch, that render all access
130 Impregnable; oft on the bordering deep
Encamp their legions, or with óbscure wing
Scout far and wide into the realm of Night,
Scorning surprise. Or could we break our way
By force, and at our heels all Hell should rise
135 With blackest insurrection, to confound
Heav'n's purest light, yet our great enemy
All incorruptible would on his throne
Sit unpolluted, and th' ethereal mold<sup>2</sup>
Incapable of stain would soon expel
140 Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire
Victorious. Thus repulsed, our final hope
Is flat despair: we must exasperate
Th' almighty victor to spend all his rage,
And that must end us, that must be our cure,
145 To be no more; sad cure; for who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
To perish rather, swallowed up and lost
In the wide womb of uncreated night,
150

Devoid of sense and motion? And who knows,
Let this be good, whether our angry foe
Can give it, or will ever? How he can
Is doubtful; that he never will is sure.
Will he, so wise, let loose at once his ire,
155 Belike<sup>o</sup> through impotence, or unaware,
To give his enemies their wish, and end
Them in his anger, whom his anger saves
To punish endless? 'Wherefore cease we then?'
Say they who counsel war, 'We are decreed,
160 Reserved and destined to eternal woe;
Whatever doing, what can we suffer more,
What can we suffer worse?' Is this then worst,
Thus sitting, thus consulting, thus in arms?
What when we fled amain,<sup>o</sup> pursued and strook<sup>o</sup>
165 With Heav'n's afflicting thunder, and besought
The deep to shelter us? This Hell then seemed
A refuge from those wounds. Or when we lay Chained on the burning lake? That sure was worse.
What if the breath that kindled those grim fires
170 Awaked should blow them into sevenfold rage
And plunge us in the flames? Or from above
Should intermitted<sup>o</sup> vengeance arm again
His red right hand to plague us? What if all
Her<sup>o</sup> stores were opened, and this firmament<sup>o</sup>
175 Of Hell should spout her cataracts<sup>o</sup> of fire,
Impendent<sup>3</sup> horrors, threat'ning hideous fall
One day upon our heads; while we perhaps
Designing or exhorting glorious war,
Caught in a fiery tempest shall be hurled
180 Each on his rock transfixed, the sport and prey
Of racking whirlwinds, or forever sunk
Under yon boiling ocean, wrapped in chains;
There to converse with everlasting groans,
Unrespited, unpitied, unreprieved,
185

Ages of hopeless end; this would be worse.
War therefore, open or concealed, alike
My voice dissuades; for what can force or guile<sup>4</sup>
With him, or who deceive his mind, whose eye
Views all things at one view? He from Heav'n's high 190 All these our motions<sup>o</sup> vain, sees and derides;
Not more almighty to resist our might
Than wise to frustrate all our plots and wiles.
Shall we then live thus vile, the race of Heav'n
Thus trampled, thus expelled to suffer here
195 Chains and these torments? Better these than worse
By my advice; since fate inevitable
Subdues us, and omnipotent decree,
The victor's will. To suffer, as to do,
Our strength is equal, nor the law unjust
200 That so ordains: this was at first resolved,
If we were wise, against so great a foe
Contending, and so doubtful what might fall.
I laugh, when those who at the spear are bold
And vent'rous, if that fail them, shrink and fear
205 What yet they know must follow, to endure
Exile, or ignominy, or bonds, or pain,
The sentence of their conqueror: This is now
Our doom; which if we can sustain and bear,
Our Súpreme Foe in time may much remit
210 His anger, and perhaps thus far removed
Not mind us not offending, satisfied
With what is punished; whence these raging fires
Will slacken, if his breath stir not their flames.
Our purer essence then will overcome
215 Their noxious vapor, or inured<sup>o</sup> not feel,
Or changed at length, and to the place conformed
In temper and in nature, will receive
Familiar the fierce heat, and void of pain;
This horror will grow mild, this darkness light,
220

Besides what hope the never-ending flight
Of future days may bring, what chance, what change
Worth waiting, since our present lot appears
For happy though but ill, for ill not worst,<sup>5</sup>
If we procure not to ourselves more woe.”
225       Thus Belial, with words clothed in reason’s garb,
Counseled ignoble ease and peaceful sloth,
Not peace: and after him thus Mammon spake.
“Either to disenthroned the King of Heav’n
We war, if war be best, or to regain
230       Our own right lost: him to unthroned we then
May hope when everlasting Fate shall yield
To fickle Chance, and Chaos judge the strife:
The former vain to hope argues<sup>o</sup> as vain
The latter: for what place can be for us
235       Within Heav’n’s bound, unless Heav’n’s Lord supreme
We overpower? Suppose he should relent
And publish grace to all, on promise made
Of new subjection; with what eyes could we Stand in his presence humble, and receive
240       Strict laws imposed, to celebrate his throne
With warbled hymns, and to his Godhead sing
Forced hallelujahs; while he lordly sits
Our envied Sov’reign, and his altar breathes
Ambrosial<sup>o</sup> odors and ambrosial flowers,
245       Our servile offerings. This must be our task
In Heav’n, this our delight; how wearisome
Eternity so spent in worship paid
To whom we hate. Let us not then pursue
By force impossible, by leave obtained
250       Unacceptable, though in Heav’n, our state
Of splendid vassalage,<sup>o</sup> but rather seek
Our own good from ourselves, and from our own
Live to ourselves, though in this vast recess,
Free, and to none accountable, preferring
255

Hard liberty before the easy yoke
Of servile pomp. Our greatness will appear
Then most conspicuous, when great things of small,
Useful of hurtful, prosperous of adverse
We can create, and in what place soe'er
260 Thrive under evil, and work ease out of pain
Through labor and endurance. This deep world
Of darkness do we dread? How oft amidst Thick clouds and dark doth Heav'n's all-ruling Sire
Choose to reside, his glory unobscured,
265 And with the majesty of darkness round
Covers his throne; from whence deep thunders roar
Must'ring their rage, and Heav'n resembles Hell?
As he our darkness, cannot we his light
Imitate when we please? This desert soil
270 Wants<sup>o</sup> not her hidden luster, gems and gold;
Nor want we skill or art, from whence to raise
Magnificence; and what can Heav'n show more?
Our torments also may in length of time
Become our elements, these piercing fires
275 As soft as now severe, our temper<sup>o</sup> changed
Into their temper; which must needs remove
The sensible of pain.<sup>6</sup> All things invite
To peaceful counsels, and the settled state
Of order, how in safety best we may 280 Compose<sup>o</sup> our present evils, with regard
Of what we are and where, dismissing quite
All thoughts of war: ye have what I advise."
He scarce had finished, when such murmur filled
Th' assembly, as when hollow rocks retain 285 The sound of blust'ring winds, which all night long
Had roused the sea, now with hoarse cadence lull
Seafaring men o'erwatched,<sup>o</sup> whose bark by chance
Or pinnace<sup>o</sup> anchors in a craggy bay
After the tempest: such applause was heard
290

As Mammon ended, and his sentence pleased,
Advising peace: for such another field<sup>o</sup>
They dreaded worse than Hell: so much the fear
Of thunder and the sword of Michaël<sup>7</sup>
Wrought still within them; and no less desire
295 To found this nether empire, which might rise
By policy,<sup>o</sup> and long process of time,
In emulation opposite to Heav'n.
Which then Beëlzebub perceived, than whom,
Satan except, none higher sat, with grave
300 Aspect he rose, and in his rising seemed
A pillar of state; deep on his front<sup>o</sup> engraven
Deliberation sat and public care;
And princely counsel in his face yet shone,
Majestic though in ruin: sage he stood
305 With Atlantean<sup>8</sup> shoulders fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies; his look
Drew audience and attention still as night
Or summer's noontide air, while thus he spake.
"Thrones and imperial Powers, offspring of Heav'n
310 Ethereal Virtues; or these titles<sup>9</sup> now
Must we renounce, and changing style<sup>o</sup> be called Princes of Hell? for so the popular vote
Inclines, here to continue, and build up here
A growing empire. Doubtless! while we dream,
315 And know not that the King of Heav'n hath doomed
This place our dungeon, not our safe retreat
Beyond his potent arm, to live exempt
From Heav'n's high jurisdiction, in new league
Banded against his throne, but to remain
320 In strictest bondage, though thus far removed,
Under th' inevitable curb, reserved
His captive multitude: for he, be sure,
In height or depth, still first and last will reign
Sole King, and of his kingdom lose no part 325

By our revolt, but over Hell extend
His empire, and with iron scepter rule
Us here, as with his golden those in Heav'n.
What<sup>o</sup> sit we then projecting peace and war?
War hath determined us,<sup>1</sup> and foiled with loss
330 Irreparable; terms of peace yet none
Vouchsafed<sup>o</sup> or sought; for what peace will be giv'n
To us enslaved, but custody severe,
And stripes, and arbitrary punishment
Inflicted? And what peace can we return,
335 But, to our power,<sup>2</sup> hostility and hate,
Untamed reluctance,<sup>o</sup> and revenge though slow,
Yet ever plotting how the conqueror least
May reap his conquest, and may least rejoice
In doing what we most in suffering feel?
340 Nor will occasion want,<sup>o</sup> nor shall we need
With dangerous expedition to invade
Heav'n, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,
Or ambush from the deep. What if we find
Some easier enterprise? There is a place
345 (If ancient and prophetic fame<sup>o</sup> in Heav'n Err not) another world, the happy seat
Of some new race called Man, about this time
To be created like to us, though less
In power and excellence, but favored more 350 Of him who rules above; so was his will Pronounced among the gods, and by an oath,
That shook Heav'n's whole circumference, confirmed.
Thither let us bend all our thoughts, to learn
What creatures there inhabit, of what mold,
355 Or substance, how endued,<sup>o</sup> and what their power,
And where their weakness, how attempted<sup>o</sup> best,
By force or subtlety. Though Heav'n be shut,
And Heav'n's high arbitrator sit secure
In his own strength, this place may lie exposed, 360

The utmost border of his kingdom, left
To their defense who hold it:<sup>3</sup> here perhaps
Some advantageous act may be achieved
By sudden onset, either with hellfire
To waste<sup>o</sup> his whole creation, or possess
365 All as our own, and drive as we were driven,
The puny habitants, or if not drive,
Seduce them to our party, that their God
May prove their foe, and with repenting hand
370 Abolish his own works.<sup>4</sup> This would surpass
Common revenge, and interrupt his joy
In our confusion, and our joy upraise
In his disturbance; when his darling sons
Hurled headlong to partake with us, shall curse
Their frail original,<sup>o</sup> and faded bliss,
375 Faded so soon. Advise<sup>o</sup> if this be worth
Attempting, or to sit in darkness here
Hatching vain empires." Thus Beëlzebub
Pleaded his devilish counsel, first devised
By Satan, and in part proposed: for whence,
380 But from the author of all ill could spring
So deep a malice, to confound<sup>o</sup> the race
Of mankind in one root,<sup>5</sup> and earth with Hell
To mingle and involve, done all to spite
The great Creator? But their spite still serves 385 His glory to augment. The bold design
Pleased highly those infernal States,<sup>o</sup> and joy
Sparkled in all their eyes; with full assent
They vote: whereat his speech he thus renews.
"Well have ye judged, well ended long debate,
390 Synod of gods, and like to what ye are,
Great things resolved, which from the lowest deep
Will once more lift us up, in spite of fate,
Nearer our ancient seat; perhaps in view

395

Of those bright confines, whence with neighboring arms
And opportune excursion we may chance
Reenter Heav'n; or else in some mild zone
Dwell not unvisited of Heav'n's fair light
Secure, and at the bright'ning orient<sup>o</sup> beam
Purge off this gloom; the soft delicious air,
400 To heal the scar of these corrosive fires
Shall breathe her balm. But first whom shall we send
In search of this new world, whom shall we find Sufficient? Who shall tempt<sup>o</sup> with wand'ring feet
The dark unbottomed infinite abyss
405 And through the palpable obscure<sup>6</sup> find out
His uncouth<sup>o</sup> way, or spread his aery flight
Upborne with indefatigable wings
Over the vast abrupt,<sup>7</sup> ere he arrive
The happy isle? What strength, what art can then 410 Suffice, or what evasion bear him safe
Through the strict senteries<sup>o</sup> and stations thick
Of angels watching round? Here he had need
All circumspection, and we now no less
Choice<sup>o</sup> in our suffrage; for on whom we send,
415 The weight of all and our last hope relies."
This said, he sat; and expectation held
His look suspense,<sup>8</sup> awaiting who appeared
To second, or oppose, or undertake
The perilous attempt: but all sat mute,
420 Pondering the danger with deep thoughts; and each
In other's count'nance read his own dismay
Astonished. None among the choice and prime
Of those Heav'n-warring champions could be found
So hardy as to proffer or accept
425 Alone the dreadful voyage; till at last
Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised
Above his fellows, with monarchal pride

Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spake.
430 "O progeny of Heav'n, empyreal Thrones,
With reason hath deep silence and demur<sup>o</sup>
Seized us, though undismayed: long is the way
And hard, that out of Hell leads up to light;
Our prison strong, this huge convex of fire,
435 Outrageous to devour, immures us round
Ninefold,<sup>9</sup> and gates of burning adamant
Barred over us prohibit all egress.
These passed, if any pass, the void profound
Of unessential Night receives him next
440 Wide gaping, and with utter loss of being Threatens him, plunged in that abortive gulf.<sup>1</sup>
If thence he scape into whatever world,
Or unknown region, what remains him less<sup>o</sup>
Than unknown dangers and as hard escape?
445 But I should ill become this throne, O Peers,
And this imperial sov'reignty, adorned
With splendor, armed with power, if aught proposed
And judged of public moment,<sup>o</sup> in the shape
Of difficulty or danger could deter
450 Me from attempting. Wherefore do I assume
These royalties, and not refuse to reign,
Refusing<sup>o</sup> to accept as great a share
Of hazard as of honor, due alike
To him who reigns, and so much to him due
Of hazard more, as he above the rest
455 High honored sits? Go therefore mighty Powers,
Terror of Heav'n, though fall'n; intend<sup>o</sup> at home,
While here shall be our home, what best may ease
The present misery, and render Hell
More tolerable; if there be cure or charm
460 To respite or deceive, or slack the pain
Of this ill mansion: intermit no watch
Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad

Through all the coasts<sup>o</sup> of dark destruction seek Deliverance for us all: this enterprise
465 None shall partake with me." Thus saying rose
The monarch, and prevented<sup>o</sup> all reply,
Prudent, lest from his resolution raised<sup>o</sup>
Others among the chief might offer now
(Certain to be refused) what erst<sup>o</sup> they feared;
470 And so refused might in opinion stand
His rivals, winning cheap the high repute
Which he through hazard huge must earn. But they Dreaded not more th' adventure than his voice
Forbidding; and at once with him they rose;
475 Their rising all at once was as the sound
Of thunder heard remote. Towards him they bend
With awful<sup>o</sup> reverence prone; and as a god
Extol him equal to the Highest in Heav'n:
Nor failed they to express how much they praised,
480 That for the general safety he despised
His own: for neither do the Spirits damned
Lose all their virtue; lest bad men should boast
Their specious<sup>o</sup> deeds on earth, which glory excites,
Or close<sup>o</sup> ambition varnished o'er with zeal.
485     Thus they their doubtful consultations dark
Ended rejoicing in their matchless chief:
As when from mountaintops the dusky clouds
Ascending, while the north wind sleeps, o'erspread
Heav'n's cheerful face, the louring element<sup>o</sup>
490 Scowls o'er the darkened landscape snow, or show'r;
If chance the radiant sun with farewell sweet
Extend his evening beam, the fields revive,
The birds their notes renew, and bleating herds
Attest their joy, that hill and valley rings.
495 O shame to men! Devil with devil damned
Firm concord holds, men only disagree
Of creatures rational, though under hope
Of heavenly grace: and God proclaiming peace,

500 Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife
Among themselves, and levy cruel wars,
Wasting the earth, each other to destroy:
As if (which might induce us to accord)
Man had not hellish foes enow<sup>o</sup> besides,
That day and night for his destruction wait.

505 The Stygian<sup>o</sup> council thus dissolved; and forth
In order came the grand infernal peers:
Midst came their mighty paramount,<sup>o</sup> and seemed Alone th' antagonist of Heav'n, nor less
Than Hell's dread emperor with pomp supreme,
510 And godlike imitated state; him round
A globe<sup>o</sup> of fiery Seraphim enclosed
With bright emblazonry and horrent<sup>2</sup> arms.
Then of their session ended they bid cry
With trumpet's regal sound the great result:

515 Toward the four winds four speedy Cherubim
Put to their mouths the sounding alchemy<sup>3</sup>
By herald's voice explained; the hollow abyss
Heard far and wide, and all the host of Hell
With deaf'ning shout, returned them loud acclaim.

520 Thence more at ease their minds and somewhat raised
By false presumptuous hope, the rangèd<sup>o</sup> powers
Disband, and wand'ring, each his several way
Pursues, as inclination or sad choice
Leads him perplexed, where he may likeliest find

525 Truce to his restless thoughts, and entertain
The irksome hours, till his great chief return.
Part on the plain, or in the air sublime<sup>o</sup>
Upon the wing, or in swift race contend,
As at th' Olympian games or Pythian fields;<sup>4</sup>

530 Part curb their fiery steeds, or shun the goal<sup>5</sup>
With rapid wheels, or fronted<sup>o</sup> brígades form.
As when to warn proud cities war appears

Waged in the troubled sky, and armies rush
To battle in the clouds,<sup>6</sup> before each van<sup>o</sup>
535 Prick<sup>o</sup> forth the aery knights, and couch their spears
Till thickest legions close; with feats of arms
From either end of Heav'n the welkin<sup>o</sup> burns.
Others with vast Typhoean<sup>z</sup> rage more fell<sup>o</sup>
540 Rend up both rocks and hills, and ride the air
In whirlwind; Hell scarce holds the wild uproar.
As when Alcides from Oechalia crowned
With conquest, felt th' envenomed robe, and tore
Through pain up by the roots Thessalian pines,
545 And Lichas from the top of Oeta threw
Into th' Euboic sea.<sup>8</sup> Others more mild,
Retreated in a silent valley, sing
With notes angelical to many a harp
Their own heroic deeds and hapless fall
550 By doom of battle; and complain that fate
Free virtue should enthrall to force or chance.
Their song was partial,<sup>o</sup> but the harmony
(What could it less when Spirits immortal sing?)
Suspended<sup>o</sup> Hell, and took with ravishment
555 The thronging audience. In discourse more sweet
(For eloquence the soul, song charms the sense)
Others apart sat on a hill retired,
In thoughts more elevate, and reasoned high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,
560 Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end, in wand'ring mazes lost.
Of good and evil much they argued then,
Of happiness and final misery,
Passion and apathy,<sup>9</sup> and glory and shame,
Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy:
565 Yet with a pleasing sorcery could charm
Pain for a while or anguish, and excite
Fallacious hope, or arm th' obdured<sup>o</sup> breast

With stubborn patience as with triple steel.
Another part in squadrons and gross<sup>o</sup> bands,
570 On bold adventure to discover wide
That dismal world, if any clime perhaps
Might yield them easier habitation, bend
Four ways their flying march, along the banks
Of four infernal rivers that disgorge
575 Into the burning lake their baleful streams:<sup>1</sup>
Abhorred Styx the flood of deadly hate,
Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep;
Cocytus, named of lamentation loud
Heard on the rueful stream; fierce Phlegethon
580 Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
Far off from these a slow and silent stream,
Lethe the river of oblivion rolls
Her wat'ry labyrinth, whereof who drinks,
Forthwith his former state and being forgets,
585 Forgets both joy and grief, pleasure and pain.
Beyond this flood a frozen continent
Lies dark and wild, beat with perpetual storms
Of whirlwind and dire hail, which on firm land
Thaws not, but gathers heap,<sup>2</sup> and ruin seems 590 Of ancient pile; all else deep snow and ice,
A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog<sup>3</sup>
Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,
Where armies whole have sunk: the parching air
Burns froze,<sup>o</sup> and cold performs th' effect of fire.
595 Thither by harpy-footed<sup>4</sup> Furies haled,<sup>o</sup>
At certain revolutions<sup>o</sup> all the damned
Are brought: and feel by turns the bitter change
Of fierce extremes, extremes by change more fierce,
From beds of raging fire to starve<sup>o</sup> in ice
600 Their soft ethereal warmth, and there to pine
Immovable, infixed, and frozen round,
Periods of time; thence hurried back to fire.

They ferry over this Lethean sound
Both to and fro, their sorrow to augment,
605 And wish and struggle, as they pass, to reach
The tempting stream, with one small drop to lose
In sweet forgetfulness all pain and woe,
All in one moment, and so near the brink;
But fate withstands, and to oppose th' attempt 610 Medusa<sup>5</sup> with Gorgonian terror guards
The ford, and of itself the water flies
All taste of living wight,<sup>o</sup> as once it fled
The lip of Tantalus.<sup>6</sup> Thus roving on
In cónfused march forlorn, th' advent'rous bands
615 With shudd'ring horror pale, and eyes aghast
Viewed first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest: through many a dark and dreary vale
They passed, and many a region dolorous,
O'er many a frozen, many a fiery alp,<sup>o</sup> 620 Rocks, caves, lakes, fens, bogs, dens, and shades of death,
A universe of death, which God by curse
Created evil, for evil only good,
Where all life dies, death lives, and nature breeds,
Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
625 Abominable, inutterable, and worse
Than fables yet have feigned, or fear conceived,
Gorgons and Hydras, and Chimeras<sup>7</sup> dire.
Meanwhile the Adversary<sup>8</sup> of God and man,
Satan, with thoughts inflamed of highest design,
630 Puts on swift wings,<sup>o</sup> and towards the gates of Hell
Explores his solitary flight; sometimes
He scours the right-hand coast, sometimes the left,
Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave<sup>o</sup> tow'ring high.
635 As when far off at sea a fleet descried
Hangs on the clouds, by equinoctial<sup>o</sup> winds

Close sailing from Bengala,<sup>o</sup> or the isles
Of Ternate and Tidore,<sup>9</sup> whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs: they on the trading flood
640 Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape
Ply stemming nightly toward the pole:<sup>1</sup> so seemed Far off the flying Fiend. At last appear
Hell bounds high reaching to the horrid roof,
And thrice threefold the gates; three folds were 645 brass,
Three iron, three of adamantine rock,
Impenetrable, impaled with circling fire,
Yet unconsumed. Before the gates there sat
On either side a formidable shape;<sup>2</sup>
The one seemed woman to the waist, and fair,
650 But ended foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed
With mortal sting: about her middle round
A cry<sup>o</sup> of hellhounds never ceasing barked
With wide Cerberean<sup>3</sup> mouths full loud, and rung
655 A hideous peal: yet, when they list,<sup>o</sup> would creep,
If aught disturbed their noise, into her womb,
And kennel there, yet there still barked and howled,
Within unseen. Far less abhorred than these Vexed Scylla<sup>4</sup> bathing in the sea that parts
660 Calabria from the hoarse Trinacrian shore:
Nor uglier follow the night-hag,<sup>5</sup> when called
In secret, riding through the air she comes Lured with the smell of infant blood, to dance
With Lapland witches, while the laboring<sup>o</sup> moon
665 Eclipses at their charms.<sup>o</sup> The other shape,
If shape it might be called that shape had none
Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb,
Or substance might be called that shadow seemed,
For each seemed either; black it stood as night,
670 Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as hell,

And shook a dreadful dart; what seemed his head
 The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
 Satan was now at hand, and from his seat
 The monster moving onward came as fast
 675 With horrid strides. Hell trembled as he strode.
 Th' undaunted Fiend what this might be admired,
 Admired, not feared; God and his Son except,
 Created thing naught valued he nor shunned;
 And with disdainful look thus first began.
 680 "Whence and what art thou, execrable shape,
 That dar'st, though grim and terrible, advance
 Thy miscreated front<sup>o</sup> athwart my way
 To yonder gates? Through them I mean to pass,
 That be assured, without leave asked of thee:
 685 Retire, or taste<sup>o</sup> thy folly, and learn by proof,
 Hell-born, not to contend with Spirits of Heav'n."
 To whom the goblin full of wrath replied:
 "Art thou that traitor angel, art thou he,
 Who first broke peace in Heav'n and faith, till then 690 Unbroken, and in proud rebellious arms
 Drew after him the third part of Heav'n's sons
 Conjured<sup>o</sup> against the Highest, for which both thou
 And they outcast from God, are here condemned
 To waste eternal days in woe and pain?
 695 And reckon'st thou thyself with Spirits of Heav'n,
 Hell-doomed, and breath'st defiance here and scorn,
 Where I reign king, and to enrage thee more,
 Thy king and lord? Back to thy punishment,
 False fugitive, and to thy speed add wings,
 700 Lest with a whip of scorpions I pursue
 Thy ling'ring, or with one stroke of this dart
 Strange horror seize thee, and pangs unfelt before."
 So spake the grisly terror, and in shape,
 So speaking and so threat'ning, grew tenfold
 705 More dreadful and deform: on th' other side
 Incensed with indignation Satan stood

Unterrified, and like a comet burned
That fires the length of Ophiuchus<sup>6</sup> huge
In th' arctic sky, and from his horrid<sup>o</sup> hair
710 Shakes pestilence and war. Each at the head
Leveled his deadly aim; their fatal hands
No second stroke intend, and such a frown
Each cast at th' other, as when, two black clouds
715 With Heav'n's artillery fraught,<sup>7</sup> come rattling on Over the Caspian,<sup>8</sup> then stand front to front
Hov'ring a space, till winds the signal blow
To join their dark encounter in mid-air:
So frowned the mighty combatants, that Hell
720 Grew darker at their frown, so matched they stood;
For never but once more was either like
To meet so great a foe.<sup>9</sup> And now great deeds
Had been achieved, whereof all Hell had rung,
Had not the snaky sorceress that sat
725 Fast by Hell gate, and kept the fatal key,
Ris'n, and with hideous outcry rushed between.
"O father, what intends thy hand," she cried,
"Against thy only son?<sup>1</sup> What fury O son,
Possesses thee to bend that mortal dart
730 Against thy father's head? And know'st for whom;
For him who sits above and laughs the while
At thee ordained his drudge, to execute
Whate'er his wrath, which he calls justice, bids,
His wrath which one day will destroy ye both."
735 She spake, and at her words the hellish pest Forbore, then these to her Satan returned.
"So strange thy outcry, and thy words so strange
Thou interposest, that my sudden hand
Prevented<sup>o</sup> spares to tell thee yet by deeds
740 What it intends; till first I know of thee,
What thing thou art, thus double-formed, and why
In this infernal vale first met thou call'st

Me father, and that phantasm call'st my son?
 I know thee not, nor ever saw till now
 Sight more detestable than him and thee."
 745 T' whom thus the portress of Hell gate replied:
 "Hast thou forgot me then, and do I seem
 Now in thine eye so foul, once deemed so fair
 In Heav'n, when at th' assembly, and in sight
 Of all the Seraphim with thee combined
 750 In bold conspiracy against Heav'n's King,
 All on a sudden miserable pain
 Surprised thee, dim thine eyes, and dizzy swum
 In darkness, while thy head flames thick and fast
 Threw forth, till on the left side op'ning wide,
 755 Likest to thee in shape and count'nance bright,
 Then shining heav'nly fair, a goddess armed
 Out of thy head I sprung:<sup>2</sup> amazement seized
 All th' host of Heav'n; back they recoiled afraid
 At first, and called me Sin, and for a sign
 760 Portentous held me; but familiar grown,
 I pleased, and with attractive graces won
 The most averse, thee chiefly, who full oft
 Thyself in me thy perfect image viewing
 Becam'st enamored, and such joy thou took'st
 765 With me in secret, that my womb conceived
 A growing burden. Meanwhile war arose,
 And fields were fought in Heav'n; wherein remained (For what could else) to our almighty foe
 Clear victory, to our part loss and rout
 770 Through all the empyrean: down they fell
 Driv'n headlong from the pitch<sup>o</sup> of Heaven, down
 Into this deep, and in the general fall
 I also; at which time this powerful key
 Into my hand was giv'n, with charge to keep 775 These gates forever shut, which none can pass
 Without my op'ning. Pensive here I sat

Alone, but long I sat not, till my womb
Pregnant by thee, and now excessive grown
Prodigious motion felt and rueful throes.
780 At last this odious offspring whom thou seest
Thine own begotten, breaking violent way
Tore through my entrails, that with fear and pain
Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew
Transformed: but he my inbred enemy
785 Forth issued, brandishing his fatal dart
Made to destroy: I fled, and cried out 'Death';
Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
From all her caves, and back resounded 'Death.'
I fled, but he pursued (though more, it seems, 790 Inflamed with lust than rage) and swifter far,
Me overtook his mother all dismayed,
And in embraces forcible and foul
Engend'ring with me, of that rape begot
These yelling monsters that with ceaseless cry
795 Surround me, as thou saw'st, hourly conceived
And hourly born, with sorrow infinite
To me, for when they list, o into the womb
That bred them they return, and howl and gnaw
My bowels, their repast; then bursting forth
800 Afresh with conscious terrors vex me round,
That rest or intermission none I find.
Before mine eyes in opposition sits
Grim Death my son and foe, who sets them on,
And me his parent would full soon devour
805 For want of other prey, but that he knows
His end with mine involved; and knows that I
Should prove a bitter morsel, and his bane, o
Whenever that shall be; so fate pronounced.
But thou O father, I forewarn thee, shun
810 His deadly arrow; neither vainly hope
To be invulnerable in those bright arms,
Though tempered heav'nly, for that mortal dint, o

Save he who reigns above, none can resist.”
815 She finished, and the subtle Fiend his lore<sup>o</sup>
Soon learned, now milder, and thus answered smooth.
“Dear daughter, since thou claim’st me for thy sire,
And my fair son here show’st me, the dear pledge
Of dalliance had with thee in Heav’n, and joys 820 Then sweet, now sad to mention, through dire change
Befall’n us unforeseen, unthought of, know
I come no enemy, but to set free
From out this dark and dismal house of pain,
Both him and thee, and all the heav’nly host
Of Spirits that in our just pretenses<sup>o</sup> armed 825 Fell with us from on high: from them I go
This uncouth errand<sup>3</sup> sole, and one for all Myself expose, with lonely steps to tread
Th’ unfounded<sup>o</sup> deep, and through the void immense
To search with wand’ring quest a place foretold
830 Should be, and, by concurring signs, ere now
Created vast and round, a place of bliss
In the purlieus<sup>o</sup> of Heav’n, and therein placed
A race of upstart creatures, to supply
Perhaps our vacant room, though more removed,
835 Lest Heav’n surcharged<sup>o</sup> with potent multitude
Might hap to move new broils:<sup>o</sup> be this or aught
Than this more secret now designed, I haste
To know, and this once known, shall soon return,
And bring ye to the place where thou and Death
840 Shall dwell at ease, and up and down unseen
Wing silently the buxom<sup>o</sup> air, embalmed<sup>o</sup>
With odors; there ye shall be fed and filled
Immeasurably, all things shall be your prey.”
He ceased, for both seemed highly pleased, and 845 Death

Grinned horrible a ghastly smile, to hear
His famine<sup>o</sup> should be filled, and blessed his maw<sup>o</sup>
Destined to that good hour: no less rejoiced
His mother bad, and thus bespake her sire.

850     "The key of this infernal pit by due,
And by command of Heav'n's all-powerful King
I keep, by him forbidden to unlock
These adamantine gates; against all force
Death ready stands to interpose his dart,
Fearless to be o'ermatched by living might.
855     But what owe I to his commands above
Who hates me, and hath hither thrust me down
Into this gloom of Tartarus profound,
To sit in hateful office here confined,
Inhabitant of Heav'n, and heav'nly-born,
860     Here in perpetual agony and pain,
With terrors and with clamors compassed round
Of mine own brood, that on my bowels feed?
Thou art my father, thou my author, thou
My being gav'st me; whom should I obey
865     But thee, whom follow? Thou wilt bring me soon
To that new world of light and bliss, among
The gods who live at ease, where I shall reign
At thy right hand voluptuous,<sup>4</sup> as beseems
Thy daughter and thy darling, without end."
870     Thus saying, from her side the fatal key,
Sad instrument of all our woe, she took;
And towards the gate rolling her bestial train,<sup>5</sup>
Forthwith the huge portcullis high up drew,
Which but herself not all the Stygian powers<sup>o</sup>
875     Could once have moved; then in the keyhole turns
Th' intricate wards, and every bolt and bar
Of massy iron or solid rock with ease
Unfastens: on a sudden open fly
880     With impetuous recoil and jarring sound

Th' infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook
Of Erebus.<sup>o</sup> She opened, but to shut
Excelled<sup>o</sup> her power; the gates wide open stood,
885 That with extended wings a bannered host
Under spread ensigns<sup>o</sup> marching might pass through
With horse and chariots ranked in loose array;
So wide they stood, and like a furnace mouth
Cast forth redounding<sup>o</sup> smoke and ruddy flame.
890 Before their eyes in sudden view appear
The secrets of the hoary<sup>o</sup> deep, a dark
Illimitable<sup>o</sup> ocean without bound,
Without dimension, where length, breadth, and height,
And time and place are lost; where eldest Night
And Chaos, ancestors of Nature, hold
895 Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.
For Hot, Cold, Moist, and Dry, four champions fierce Strive here for mastery, and to battle bring 900 Their embryon atoms;<sup>6</sup> they around the flag
Of each his faction, in their several clans,
Light-armed or heavy, sharp, smooth, swift or slow,
Swarm populous, unnumbered as the sands
Of Barca or Cyrene's torrid soil,<sup>7</sup>
905 Levied to side with warring winds, and poise<sup>8</sup>
Their lighter wings. To whom these most adhere,
He rules a moment; Chaos<sup>9</sup> umpire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray
By which he reigns: next him high arbiter
Chance governs all. Into this wild abyss,
910 The womb of Nature and perhaps her grave,
Of neither sea, nor shore, nor air, nor fire,
But all these in their pregnant causes<sup>o</sup> mixed
Confus'dly, and which thus must ever fight,

915 Unless th' Almighty Maker them ordain
His dark materials to create more worlds,
Into this wild abyss the wary Fiend
Stood on the brink of Hell and looked a while,
Pondering his voyage; for no narrow frith<sup>o</sup>
920 He had to cross. Nor was his ear less pealed<sup>o</sup>
With noises loud and ruinous (to compare
Great things with small) than when Bellona<sup>1</sup> storms,
With all her battering engines bent to raze
Some capital city; or less than if this frame<sup>o</sup>
925 Of Heav'n were falling, and these elements
In mutiny had from her axle torn
The steadfast earth. At last his sail-broad vans<sup>o</sup>
He spreads for flight, and in the surging smoke
Uplifted spurns the ground, thence many a league
As in a cloudy chair ascending rides
930 Audacious, but that seat soon failing, meets
A vast vacuity: all unawares
Flutt'ring his pennons<sup>2</sup> vain plumb down he drops
Ten thousand fathom deep, and to this hour
Down had been falling, had not by ill chance
935 The strong rebuff<sup>o</sup> of some tumultuous cloud
Instinct<sup>o</sup> with fire and niter<sup>o</sup> hurried him
As many miles aloft: that fury stayed,
Quenched in a boggy Syrtis,<sup>3</sup> neither sea,
Nor good dry land: nigh foundered<sup>o</sup> on he fares,
940 Treading the crude consistence, half on foot,
Half flying; behoves<sup>o</sup> him now both oar and sail.
As when a griffin through the wilderness
With wingèd course o'er hill or moory<sup>o</sup> dale,
Pursues the Arimasbian, who by stealth
945 Had from his wakeful custody purloined
The guarded gold:<sup>4</sup> so eagerly the Fiend
O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,

With head, hands, wings, or feet pursues his way,
And swims or sinks, or wades, or creeps, or flies:
950 At length a universal hubbub wild
Of stunning sounds and voices all confused
Borne through the hollow dark assaults his ear
With loudest vehemence: thither he plies,
Undaunted to meet there whatever Power
955 Or Spirit of the nethermost abyss
Might in that noise reside, of whom to ask
Which way the nearest coast of darkness lies
Bordering on light; when straight behold the throne
Of Chaos, and his dark pavilion spread
960 Wide on the wasteful deep; with him enthroned
Sat sable-vested Night, eldest of things,
The consort of his reign; and by them stood
Orcus and Ades,<sup>5</sup> and the dreaded name
Of Demogorgon,<sup>6</sup> Rumor next and Chance,
965 And Tumult and Confusion all embroiled,
And Discord with a thousand various mouths.
T' whom Satan turning boldly, thus. "Ye Powers
And Spirits of this nethermost abyss,
Chaos and ancient Night, I come no spy,
970 With purpose to explore or to disturb
The secrets of your realm, but by constraint
Wand'ring this darksome desert, as my way
Lies through your spacious empire up to light,
Alone, and without guide, half lost, I seek 975 What readiest path leads where your gloomy bounds
Confine with<sup>o</sup> Heav'n; or if some other place
From your dominion won, th' Ethereal King
Possesses lately, thither to arrive
I travel this profound;<sup>o</sup> direct my course;
980 Directed, no mean recompense it brings
To your behoof,<sup>o</sup> if I that region lost,
All usurpation thence expelled, reduce

To her original darkness and your sway
 (Which is my present journey)<sup>7</sup> and once more
 985 Erect the standard there of ancient Night;
 Yours be th' advantage all, mine the revenge."
 Thus Satan; and him thus the anarch<sup>8</sup> old
 With falt'ring speech and visage incomposed<sup>o</sup>
 990 Answered. "I know thee, stranger, who thou art,
 That mighty leading angel, who of late
 Made head against Heav'n's King, though overthrown.
 I saw and heard, for such a numerous host
 Fled not in silence through the frightened deep
 With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout,
 995 Confusion worse confounded; and Heav'n gates
 Poured out by millions her victorious bands
 Pursuing. I upon my frontiers here
 Keep residence; if all I can will serve,
 That little which is left so to defend,
 1000 Encroached on still<sup>o</sup> through our intestine broils<sup>o</sup>
 Weak'ning the scepter of old Night: first Hell
 Your dungeon stretching far and wide beneath;
 Now lately heaven and earth,<sup>9</sup> another world
 Hung o'er my realm, linked in a golden chain
 1005 To that side Heav'n from whence your legions fell:
 If that way be your walk, you have not far;
 So much the nearer danger; go and speed;
 Havoc and spoil and ruin are my gain."
 He ceased; and Satan stayed not to reply,
 1010 But glad that now his sea should find a shore,
 With fresh alacrity and force renewed
 Springs upward like a pyramid of fire
 Into the wild expanse, and through the shock
 Of fighting elements, on all sides round
 1015 Environed wins his way; harder beset
 And more endangered, than when Argo passed

Through Bosphorus betwixt the justling rocks:<sup>1</sup>
Or when Ulysses on the larboard shunned
Charybdis, and by th' other whirlpool steered.<sup>2</sup>
1020 So he with difficulty and labor hard
Moved on, with difficulty and labor he;
But he once passed, soon after when man fell,
Strange alteration! Sin and Death amain<sup>o</sup>
Following his track, such was the will of Heav'n,
1025 Paved after him a broad and beaten way
Over the dark abyss, whose boiling gulf
Tamely endured a bridge of wondrous length
From Hell continued reaching th' utmost orb<sup>3</sup>
Of this frail world; by which the Spirits perverse
1030 With easy intercourse pass to and fro
To tempt or punish mortals, except whom
God and good angels guard by special grace.
But now at last the sacred influence
Of light appears, and from the walls of Heav'n
1035 Shoots far into the bosom of dim Night
A glimmering dawn; here Nature first begins
Her farthest verge,<sup>o</sup> and Chaos to retire
As from her outmost works a broken foe
With tumult less and with less hostile din,
1040 That<sup>o</sup> Satan with less toil, and now with ease
Wafts on the calmer wave by dubious light
And like a weather-beaten vessel holds<sup>o</sup>
Gladly the port, though shrouds and tackle torn;
Or in the emptier waste, resembling air
1045 Weighs<sup>o</sup> his spread wings, at leisure to behold
Far off th' empyreal Heav'n, extended wide
In circuit, undetermined square or round,
With opal tow'rs and battlements adorned
Of living sapphire, once his native seat;
1050 And fast by hanging in a golden chain
This pendent world,<sup>o</sup> in bigness as a star

Of smallest magnitude close by the moon.
Thither full fraught with mischievous revenge,
Accursed, and in a cursèd hour, he hies.

Endnotes

- Note 1: India. "Ormus": an island in the Persian Gulf, modern Hormuz, famous for pearls.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Angelic orders.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Note the play on "surer," "prosper," "prosperity," "assured," a favorite device of Milton's.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A typical epic convention (in Homer, Virgil, Tasso, and elsewhere) involved councils debating war or peace, with spokesmen on each side. Satan offers only the option of war, open or covert.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Tartarus is a classical name for hell.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: With the Latin sense of stamping on; also, triumphantly scorning.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Servants, but perhaps also vessels. See Romans 9:22: "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, we cannot be worse off than we are now, and still live.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Established by Fate; also, deadly.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The Sophists, mercenary teachers of rhetoric in ancient Greece, were denounced by Plato for making "the worse appear / The better reason." "His tongue / Dropped manna": his honeyed words seemed like the manna supplied to the Israelites in the desert.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Heavenly substance, derived from "ether," the fifth and purest element, thought to be incorruptible.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In the Latin sense, hanging down, threatening.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: The verb “accomplish” or “achieve” is understood.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, from the point of view of happiness, the devils are in an ill state, but it could be worse.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Pain felt by the senses.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The warrior angel, chief of the angelic armies.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Worthy of Atlas, the Titan who as a punishment for rebellion was condemned to hold up the heavens on his shoulders.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The official titles of angelic orders.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, war has decided the question for us, but also limited us.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, to the best of our power.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: To be defended by the occupants.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See Genesis 6:7: “And the Lord said, ‘I will destroy man [and all other creatures]; for it repenteth me that I have made them.’ ”Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Adam, the first man, is the “root” of the human race.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Darkness so thick it can be felt (see Exodus 10:21).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Chaos, a striking example of sound imitating sense.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, he sat waiting in suspense.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Hell’s fiery walls and gates have nine thicknesses (see lines 645ff.). “Adamant” (following): a fabulously hard metal.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Chaos is a womb in which all potential forms fragment (see lines 895ff.) “Unessential” (line 439): having no real essence.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Bristling. “Emblazonry”: decorated shields.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Trumpets (made of the goldlike alloy brass).Return to reference 3

- Note 4: The Olympic games were held at Olympia, the Pythian games at Delphi. Games celebrating a (usually dead) hero are an epic convention.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: To drive a chariot as close as possible around a column without hitting it.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The appearance of warfare in the skies, reported before several notable battles, portends trouble on earth.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Like that of Typhon, the hundred-headed Titan (see 1.199).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Wearing a poisoned robe given him in a deception, Hercules ("Alcides") in his dying agonies threw his beloved companion Lichas, along with a good part of Mount Oeta, into the Euboean Sea, near Thermopylae.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The Stoic goal of freedom from passion.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: These four rivers are traditional in hellish geography. Milton distinguishes them by the original meanings of their Greek names: Styx means "hateful," Acheron "woeful," etc. Lethe is "far off" and quite different from the others, oblivion being a desired state in Hell.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In a heap, resembling the ruin of an old building ("ancient pile," next line).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Lake Serbonis, once famous for its quicksands, lies near the city of Damietta ("Damiata," next line), just east of the Nile.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Taloned. In Greek mythology the Harpies (monsters with women's faces) carried off individuals to the Furies, who avenged crimes.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: One of the three Gorgons, women with snaky hair, scaly bodies, and boar tusks, the sight of whose faces changed men to stone.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Tantalus, afflicted with a raging thirst, stood in the middle of a lake, the water of which always receded when he tried to drink (hence, "tantalize").Return to reference 6

- Note 7: The Hydra was a serpent whose multiple heads grew back when severed; the Chimera was a fire-breathing creature, part lion, part dragon, part goat.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Satan in Hebrew means “adversary.”Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Two of the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, modern Indonesia.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The South Pole. “Ethiopian”: the Indian Ocean. “The Cape” is the Cape of Good Hope.Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
The allegorical figures of Sin and Death are founded on James 1:15: “Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.” But the incestuous relations of Sin and Death are Milton’s own invention. Physically, Sin is modeled on Virgil’s or Ovid’s Scylla, with some touches adopted from Spenser’s Error. Death is a traditional figure, vague and vast.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Like Cerberus, the multiheaded hound of Hell.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Circe, out of jealousy, threw poison into the water where Scylla bathed, in the straits between Calabria and Sicily (“Trinacria,” next line); the poison caused Scylla to develop a ring of barking, snapping dogs around her waist.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Hecate (three syllables), goddess of sorcery. She attends orgies of witches in Lapland (line 665, famous for witchcraft), drawn by the blood of babies sacrificed for the occasion.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A vast northern constellation, “the Serpent Bearer.”Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Loaded with thunderbolts.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Caspian is a particularly stormy area.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, the Son of God.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Sin, Death, and Satan, in their various interrelations, parody obscenely the relations between God and the Son, Adam and Eve.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: As Athena sprang full grown from the head of Zeus.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Unknown journey—a parody of Christ’s errand on earth (3.236–65).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: As the Son sits at God’s right hand, Sin will at Satan’s, a blasphemous parody of the Apostles’ Creed and of Paradise Lost 3.250–80.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, propelling her yelping offspring.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: These subatomic qualities combine together in nature to form the four elements, fire, earth, water, and air, but they struggle endlessly in Chaos, where the atoms of these elements remain undeveloped (in “embryo”).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Cities built on the shifting sands of North Africa.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Give weight to. “Levied”: both enlisted and raised up.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Chaos is both the place where confusion reigns and personified confusion itself.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Goddess of war.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Useless wings (“pinions”).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Quicksand in North African gulfs, famous for their shifting sandbars.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Griffins, mythical creatures, half-eagle, half-lion, hoarded gold that was stolen from them by the one-eyed Arimaspians.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Latin and Greek names of Pluto, god of Hell.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A mysterious deity associated with Fate; Milton elsewhere identifies him with Chaos.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The purpose of my present journey.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Chaos is not monarch of his realm but, appropriately, “anarch,” nonruler.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The cosmos, with its own “heaven” (not the empyrean, the Heaven of God and the angels).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Jason and his fifty Argonauts, sailing through the Bosphorus to the Black Sea in pursuit of the Golden Fleece, had to pass through the Symplegades, or clashing rocks.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Homer’s Ulysses, sailing where Italy almost touches Sicily, had to pass between Charybdis, a whirlpool, and Scylla, a monster who devoured six of his men (not another whirlpool, as used here).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The bridge ends on the outermost sphere of the ten concentric spheres making up the universe.Return to reference 3

Book 3

The Argument

God sitting on his throne sees Satan flying towards this world, then newly created; shows him to the Son who sat at his right hand; foretells the success of Satan in perverting mankind; clears his own justice and wisdom from all imputation, having created man free and able enough to have withstood his tempter; yet declares his purpose of grace towards him, in regard he fell not of his own malice, as did Satan, but by him seduced. The Son of God renders praises to his Father for the manifestation of his gracious purpose towards man; but God again declares, that grace cannot be extended towards man without the satisfaction of divine justice; man hath offended the majesty of God by aspiring to Godhead, and therefore with all his progeny devoted to death must die, unless someone can be found sufficient to answer for his offense, and undergo his punishment. The Son of God freely offers himself a ransom for man: the Father accepts him, ordains his incarnation, pronounces his exaltation about all names in heaven and earth; commands all the angels to adore him; they obey, and hymning to their harps in full choir, celebrate the Father and the Son. Meanwhile Satan alights upon the bare convex of this world's outermost orb; where wandering he first finds a place since called the Limbo of Vanity; what persons and things fly up thither; thence comes to the gate of heaven, described ascending by stairs, and the waters above the firmament that flow about it: his passage thence to the orb of the sun; he finds there Uriel the regent of that orb, but first changes himself into the shape of a meaner angel; and pretending a zealous desire to behold the new creation and man whom God had placed there, inquires of him the place of his habitation, and is directed; alights first on Mount Niphates.

Hail holy Light, offspring of Heav'n firstborn,

Or of th' Eternal coeternal beam
May I express thee unblamed?<sup>1</sup> Since God is light,
And never but in unapproachèd light
Dwelt from eternity, dwelt then in thee,
5 Bright effluence of bright essence increate.<sup>o</sup>
Or hear'st thou rather<sup>2</sup> pure ethereal stream,
Whose fountain who shall tell? Before the sun,
Before the heavens thou wert, and at the voice
Of God, as with a mantle, didst invest<sup>o</sup>
10 The rising world of waters dark and deep,
Won from the void and formless infinite.
Thee I revisit now with bolder wing,
Escaped the Stygian pool, though long detained
In that obscure sojourn, while in my flight
15 Through utter and through middle darkness<sup>3</sup> borne
With other notes than to th' Orphéan lyre<sup>4</sup>
I sung of Chaos and eternal Night,
Taught by the Heav'nly Muse<sup>5</sup> to venture down
The dark descent, and up to reascend,
20 Though hard and rare: thee I revisit safe,
And feel thy sov'reign vital I but thou
Revisit'st not these eyes, that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs,
25 Or dim suffusion<sup>6</sup> veiled. Yet not the more
Cease I to wander where the Muses haunt
Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
Smit with the love of sacred song; but chief
Thee Sion<sup>7</sup> and the flow'ry brooks beneath
30 That wash thy hallowed feet, and warbling flow,
Nightly I visit: nor sometimes forget<sup>o</sup>
Those other two equaled with me in fate,<sup>8</sup>
So were I equaled with them in renown,
Blind Thamyras and blind Maeonides,
35 And Tiresias and Phineus prophets old,<sup>9</sup>

Then feed on thoughts, that voluntary move
Harmonious numbers; o as the wakeful bird o
Sings darkling, o and in shadiest covert hid 40 Tunes her nocturnal note. Thus with the year
Seasons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever-during o dark
45 Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge o fair
Presented with a universal blank
Of nature's works to me expunged and razed, o
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
50 So much the rather thou celestial Light
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate, there plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.
55 Now had the Almighty Father from above,
From the pure empyrean o where he sits
High throned above all height, bent down his eye,
His own works and their works at once to view:
Above him all the sanctities o of Heaven
60 Stood thick as stars, and from his sight received
Beatitude past utterance; on his right
The radiant image of his glory sat,
His only Son; on earth he first beheld
Our two first parents, yet the only two 65 Of mankind, in the happy garden placed,
Reaping immortal fruits of joy and love,
Uninterrupted joy, unrivaled love
In blissful solitude; he then surveyed
Hell and the gulf between, and Satan there
70 Coasting the wall of Heav'n on this side Night
In the dun o air sublime, o and ready now

To stoop<sup>o</sup> with wearied wings, and willing feet
On the bare outside of this world,<sup>o</sup> that seemed Firm land embosomed without firmament,<sup>o</sup>
75 Uncertain which, in ocean or in air.
Him God beholding from his prospect high,
Wherein past, present, future he beholds,
Thus to his only Son foreseeing spake.
“Only begotten Son, seest thou what rage
80 Transports our Adversary, whom no bounds
Prescribed, no bars of Hell, nor all the chains
Heaped on him there, nor yet the main<sup>o</sup> abyss
Wide interrupt<sup>1</sup> can hold; so bent he seems
On desperate revenge, that shall redound<sup>o</sup>
85 Upon his own rebellious head. And now
Through all restraint broke loose he wings his way
Not far off Heav’n, in the precincts of light,
Directly towards the new-created world,
And man there placed, with purpose to essay<sup>o</sup>
90 If him by force he can destroy, or worse,
By some false guile pervert; and shall pervert;
For man will hearken to his glozing<sup>o</sup> lies,
And easily transgress the sole command,
Sole pledge of his obedience: so will fall
95 He and his faithless progeny: whose fault?
Whose but his own? Ingrate, he had of me
All he could have; I made him just and right,
Sufficient to have stood, though free to fall.
Such I created all th’ ethereal Powers 100 And Spirits, both them who stood and them who failed;
Freely they stood who stood, and fell who fell.
Not free, what proof could they have giv’n sincere
Of true allegiance, constant faith or love,
Where only what they needs must do, appeared,
105

Not what they would? What praise could they receive?

What pleasure I from such obedience paid,
When will and reason (reason also is choice)
Useless and vain, of freedom both despoiled,
Made passive both, had served necessity,
110 Not me. They therefore as to right belonged,
So were created, nor can justly accuse
Their Maker, or their making, or their fate,
As if predestination overruled
Their will, disposed by absolute decree
115 Or high foreknowledge; they themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I: if I foreknew,
Foreknowledge had no influence on their fault,
Which had no less proved certain unforeknown.<sup>2</sup>
So without least impulse or shadow of fate,
120 Or aught by me immutably foreseen,
They trespass, authors to themselves in all
Both what they judge and what they choose; for so
I formed them free, and free they must remain,
Till they enthrall themselves: I else must change
125 Their nature, and revoke the high decree
Unchangeable, eternal, which ordained
Their freedom, they themselves ordained their fall.
The first sort<sup>3</sup> by their own suggestion fell,
Self-tempted, self-depraved: man falls deceived
130 By the other first: man therefore shall find grace,
The other none: in mercy and justice both,
Through Heav'n and earth, so shall my glory excel,
But mercy first and last shall brightest shine."
Thus while God spake, ambrosial<sup>o</sup> fragrance filled
135 All Heav'n, and in the blessèd Spirits elect<sup>o</sup>
Sense of new joy ineffable<sup>o</sup> diffused:
Beyond compare the Son of God was seen
Most glorious, in him all his Father shone

140 Substantially expressed, and in his face
Divine compassion visibly appeared,
Love without end, and without measure grace,
Which uttering thus he to his Father spake.
    "O Father, gracious was that word which closed
Thy sov'reign sentence, that man should find grace;
145 For which both Heav'n and earth shall high extol
Thy praises, with th' innumerable sound
Of hymns and sacred songs, wherewith thy throne
Encompassed shall resound thee ever blessed.
For should man finally be lost, should man
150 Thy creature late so loved, thy youngest son
Fall circumvented thus by fraud, though joined
With his own folly? That be from thee far,
That far be from thee, Father, who art judge
Of all things made, and judgest only right.<sup>4</sup>
155 Or shall the Adversary thus obtain
His end, and frustrate thine, shall he fulfill
His malice, and thy goodness bring to naught,
Or proud return though to his heavier doom,
Yet with revenge accomplished, and to Hell
160 Draw after him the whole race of mankind,
By him corrupted? Or wilt thou thyself
Abolish thy creation, and unmake,
For him, what for thy glory thou hast made?
So should thy goodness and thy greatness both 165 Be questioned and blasphemed<sup>o</sup> without defense."
    To whom the great Creator thus replied.
"O Son, in whom my soul hath chief delight,
Son of my bosom, Son who art alone
My Word, my wisdom, and effectual might,<sup>5</sup>
170 All hast thou spoken as my thoughts are, all
As my eternal purpose hath decreed:
Man shall not quite be lost, but saved who will,
Yet not of will in him, but grace in me

175 Freely vouchsafed;<sup>o</sup> once more I will renew
His lapsèd powers, though forfeit and enthralled
By sin to foul exorbitant desires;
Upheld by me, yet once more he shall stand
On even ground against his mortal foe,
180 By me upheld, that he may know how frail
His fall'n condition is, and to me owe
All his deliv'rance, and to none but me.
Some I have chosen of peculiar grace
Elect above the rest;<sup>6</sup> so is my will:
The rest shall hear me call, and oft be warned<sup>o</sup>
185 Their sinful state, and to appease betimes
Th' incensèd Deity, while offered grace
Invites; for I will clear their senses dark,
What may suffice, and soften stony hearts
To pray, repent, and bring obedience due.
190 To prayer, repentance, and obedience due,
Though but endeavored with sincere intent,
Mine ear shall not be slow, mine eye not shut.
And I will place within them as a guide
My umpire conscience, whom if they will hear,
195 Light after light well used they shall attain,<sup>7</sup>
And to the end persisting, safe arrive.
This my long sufferance and my day of grace
They who neglect and scorn, shall never taste;
But hard be hardened, blind be blinded more,
200 That they may stumble on, and deeper fall;
And none but such from mercy I exclude.
But yet all is not done; man disobeying,
Disloyal breaks his fealty, and sins
Against the high supremacy of Heav'n, 205 Affecting<sup>o</sup> Godhead, and so losing all,
To expiate his treason hath naught left,
But to destruction sacred and devote,<sup>o</sup>
He with his whole posterity must die,

210 Die he or justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death.
Say heav'nly Powers, where shall we find such love,
Which of ye will be mortal to redeem
215 Man's mortal crime,<sup>8</sup> and just th' unjust to save,
Dwells in all Heaven charity so dear?"

He asked, but all the heav'nly choir stood mute,<sup>9</sup>
And silence was in Heav'n; on man's behalf
Patron or intercessor none appeared,
Much less that durst upon his own head draw
220 The deadly forfeiture, and ransom set.
And now without redemption all mankind
Must have been lost, adjudged to death and Hell
By doom severe, had not the Son of God,
In whom the fullness dwells of love divine,
225 His dearest mediation<sup>o</sup> thus renewed.

"Father, thy word is passed, man shall find grace;
And shall grace not find means, that finds her way,
The speediest of thy wingèd messengers,
To visit all thy creatures, and to all
230 Comes unprevented,<sup>o</sup> unimplored, unsought,
Happy for man, so coming; he her aid
Can never seek, once dead in sins and lost;
Atonement for himself or offering meet,<sup>o</sup>
Indebted and undone, hath none to bring:
235 Behold me then, me for him, life for life
I offer, on me let thine anger fall;
Account me man; I for his sake will leave
Thy bosom, and this glory next to thee
Freely put off, and for him lastly die
240 Well pleased, on me let Death wreak all his rage;
Under his gloomy power I shall not long
Lie vanquished; thou hast giv'n me to possess
Life in myself forever, by thee I live,

245 Though now to Death I yield, and am his due
 All that of me can die, yet that debt paid,
 Thou wilt not leave me in the loathsome grave
 His prey, nor suffer my unspotted soul
 Forever with corruption there to dwell;
 But I shall rise victorious, and subdue
 250 My vanquisher, spoiled of his vaunted spoil; Death his death's wound shall then receive, and stoop
 Inglorious, of his mortal sting disarmed.
 I through the ample air in triumph high
 Shall lead Hell captive maugre<sup>o</sup> Hell, and show
 255 The powers of darkness bound. Thou at the sight
 Pleased, out of Heaven shalt look down and smile,
 While by thee raised I ruin<sup>1</sup> all my foes,
 Death last, and with his carcass glut the grave:
 Then with the multitude of my redeemed
 260 Shall enter Heaven long absent, and return,
 Father, to see thy face, wherein no cloud
 Of anger shall remain, but peace assured,
 And reconcilment; wrath shall be no more
 Thenceforth, but in thy presence joy entire."
 265 His words here ended, but his meek aspect
 Silent yet spake, and breathed immortal love
 To mortal men, above which only shone
 Filial obedience: as a sacrifice
 Glad to be offered, he attends the will 270 Of his great Father. Admiration<sup>o</sup> seized
 All Heav'n, what this might mean, and whither tend Wond'ring; but soon th' Almighty thus replied:
 "O thou in Heav'n and earth the only peace
 Found out for mankind under wrath, O thou
 275 My sole complacence!<sup>o</sup> well thou know'st how dear
 To me are all my works, nor man the least
 Though last created, that for him I spare

280 Thee from my bosom and right hand, to save,
By losing thee a while, the whole race lost.
Thou therefore whom<sup>2</sup> thou only canst redeem,
Their nature also to thy nature join;
And be thyself man among men on earth,
Made flesh, when time shall be, of virgin seed,
285 By wondrous birth: be thou in Adam's room
The head of all mankind, though Adam's son.<sup>3</sup>
As in him perish all men, so in thee
As from a second root shall be restored,
As many as are restored, without thee none.
290 His crime makes guilty all his sons; thy merit
Imputed shall absolve them who renounce
Their own both righteous and unrighteous deeds,
And live in thee transplanted, and from thee
Receive new life.<sup>4</sup> So man, as is most just,
295 Shall satisfy for man, be judged and die,
And dying rise, and rising with him raise
His brethren, ransomed with his own dear life.
So heav'nly love shall outdo hellish hate,
Giving to death, and dying to redeem,
300 So dearly to redeem what hellish hate
So easily destroyed, and still destroys
In those who, when they may, accept not grace.
Nor shalt thou by descending to assume Man's nature, lessen or degrade thine own.
305 Because thou hast, though throned in highest bliss
Equal to God, and equally enjoying
Godlike fruition,<sup>o</sup> quitted all to save
A world from utter loss, and hast been found
By merit more than birthright Son of God,<sup>5</sup>
310 Found worthiest to be so by being good,
Far more than great or high; because in thee
Love hath abounded more than glory abounds.
Therefore thy humiliation shall exalt

With thee thy manhood also to this throne;
 Here shalt thou sit incarnate, here shalt reign
 315 Both God and man, Son both of God and man,
 Anointed<sup>6</sup> universal King; all power
 I give thee, reign forever, and assume Thy merits; under thee as Head Supreme 320 Thrones, Princedoms, Powers, Dominions<sup>7</sup> I reduce:
 All knees to thee shall bow, of them that bide
 In Heaven, or earth, or under earth in Hell;
 When thou attended gloriously from Heav'n
 Shalt in the sky appear, and from thee send
 The summoning Archangels to proclaim
 325 Thy dread tribunal: forthwith from all winds<sup>o</sup>
 The living, and forthwith the cited<sup>o</sup> dead
 Of all past ages to the general doom<sup>o</sup>
 Shall hasten, such a peal shall rouse their sleep.
 Then all thy saints assembled, thou shalt judge
 330 Bad men and angels, they arraigned<sup>o</sup> shall sink
 Beneath thy sentence; Hell, her numbers full,
 Thenceforth shall be forever shut. Meanwhile
 The world shall burn, and from her ashes spring
 New heav'n<sup>o</sup> and earth, wherein the just shall 335 dwell,<sup>8</sup>
 And after all their tribulations long
 See golden days, fruitful of golden deeds,
 With joy and love triumphing, and fair truth.
 Then thou thy regal scepter shalt lay by,
 For regal scepter then no more shall need,<sup>o</sup>
 340 God shall be all in all. But all ye gods,<sup>o</sup>
 Adore him, who to compass all this dies,
 Adore the Son, and honor him as me."
 No sooner had th' Almighty ceased, but all
 The multitude of angels with a shout
 345 Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
 As from blest voices, uttering joy, Heav'n rung<sup>9</sup>

With jubilee, and loud hosannas filled
Th' eternal regions: lowly reverent
Towards either throne<sup>1</sup> they bow, and to the ground
350 With solemn adoration down they cast
Their crowns inwove with amarant<sup>2</sup> and gold,
Immortal amarant, a flow'r which once
In Paradise, fast by the Tree of Life
Began to bloom, but soon for man's offense
355 To Heav'n removed where first it grew, there grows,
And flow'rs aloft shading the Fount of Life,
And where the river of bliss through midst of Heav'n
Rolls o'er Elysian<sup>3</sup> flow'rs her amber stream;
With these that never fade the Spirits elect
360 Bind their resplendent locks inwreathed with beams,
Now in loose garlands thick thrown off, the bright
Pavement that like a sea of jasper shone
Impurpled with celestial roses smiled.
Then crowned again their golden harps they took,
365 Harps ever tuned, that glittering by their side
Like quivers hung, and with preamble sweet
Of charming symphony they introduce
Their sacred song, and waken raptures high;
No voice exempt,<sup>o</sup> no voice but well could join 370 Melodious part, such concord is in Heav'n.
Thee Father first they sung omnipotent,
Immutable, immortal, infinite,
Eternal King; thee Author of all being,
Fountain of light, thyself invisible
375 Amidst the glorious brightness where thou sitt'st
Throned inaccessible, but<sup>o</sup> when thou shad'st
The full blaze of thy beams, and through a cloud
Drawn round about thee like a radiant shrine,<sup>4</sup>
Dark with excessive bright thy skirts appear,
380 Yet dazzle Heav'n, that brightest Seraphim
Approach not, but with both wings veil their eyes.

Thou next they sang of all creation first,<sup>5</sup>
Begotten Son, Divine Similitude,
In whose conspicuous count'nance, without cloud
385 Made visible, th' Almighty Father shines,
Whom else no creature can behold;<sup>6</sup> on thee
Impressed th' effulgence of his glory abides,
Transfused on thee his ample spirit rests.
He Heav'n of heavens and all the Powers therein
390 By thee created, and by thee threw down
Th' aspiring Dominations.<sup>7</sup> Thou that day
Thy Father's dreadful thunder didst not spare,
Nor stop thy flaming chariot wheels, that shook
Heav'n's everlasting frame, while o'er the necks
395 Thou drov'st of warring angels disarrayed.
Back from pursuit thy Powers<sup>8</sup> with loud acclaim
Thee only extolled, Son of thy Father's might,
To execute fierce vengeance on his foes,
Not so on man; him through their malice fall'n,
400 Father of mercy and grace, thou didst not doom
So strictly, but much more to pity incline:
No sooner did thy dear and only Son
Perceive thee purposed not to doom<sup>9</sup> frail man
So strictly, but much more to pity inclined,
405 He to appease thy wrath, and end the strife
Of mercy and justice in thy face discerned,
Regardless of the bliss wherein he sat
Second to thee, offered himself to die
For man's offense. O unexampled love,
410 Love nowhere to be found less than divine!
Hail Son of God, Savior of men, thy name
Shall be the copious matter of my<sup>8</sup> song
Henceforth, and never shall my harp thy praise
Forget, nor from thy Father's praise disjoin.
415 Thus they in Heav'n, above the starry sphere,
Their happy hours in joy and hymning spent.

Meanwhile upon the firm opacous<sup>o</sup> globe
Of this round world, whose first convex divides
The luminous inferior orbs, enclosed
420 From Chaos and th' inroad of Darkness old,
Satan alighted walks:<sup>9</sup> a globe far off
It seemed, now seems a boundless continent
Dark, waste, and wild, under the frown of Night
Starless exposed, and ever-threatening storms
425 Of Chaos blust'ring round, inclement sky;
Save on that side which from the wall of Heav'n
Though distant far some small reflection gains
Of glimmering air less vexed with tempest loud:
Here walked the Fiend at large in spacious field.
430 As when a vulture on Imaus bred,
Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds,<sup>1</sup>
Dislodging from a region scarce of prey
To gorge the flesh of lambs or yeanling<sup>o</sup> kids
On hills where flocks are fed, flies toward the springs
435 Of Ganges or Hydaspes, Indian streams;<sup>2</sup>
But in his way lights on the barren plains
Of Sericana, where Chinesees drive
With sails and wind their cany wagons light:
So on this windy sea of land, the Fiend
440 Walked up and down alone bent on his prey,
Alone, for other creature in this place
Living or lifeless to be found was none,
None yet, but store hereafter from the earth
Up hither like aërial vapors flew
445 Of all things transitory and vain, when sin
With vanity had filled the works of men:
Both all things vain, and all who in vain things
Built their fond<sup>o</sup> hopes of glory or lasting fame,
Or happiness in this or th' other life;
450 All who have their reward on earth, the fruits
Of painful superstition and blind zeal,

Naught seeking but the praise of men, here find
Fit retribution, empty as their deeds;
455 All th' unaccomplished<sup>o</sup> works of nature's hand,
Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly<sup>o</sup> mixed,
Dissolved on earth, fleet<sup>o</sup> hither, and in vain,
Till final dissolution, wander here,
Not in the neighboring moon, as some<sup>3</sup> have dreamed;
Those argent<sup>o</sup> fields more likely habitants,
460 Translated saints,<sup>4</sup> or middle Spirits hold
Betwixt th' angelical and human kind:
Hither of ill-joined sons and daughters born
First from the ancient world those giants came 465 With many a vain exploit, though then renowned:<sup>5</sup>
The builders next of Babel on the plain
Of Sennaär,<sup>6</sup> and still with vain design
New Babels, had they wherewithal, would build:
Others came single; he who to be deemed 470 A god, leaped fondly<sup>o</sup> into Etna flames,
Empedocles, and he who to enjoy
Plato's Elysium, leaped into the sea,
Cleombrotus, and many more too long,<sup>7</sup>
Embryos and idiots, eremites<sup>o</sup> and friars
475 White, black, and gray, with all their trumpery.<sup>8</sup>
Here pilgrims roam, that strayed so far to seek
In Golgotha<sup>9</sup> him dead, who lives in Heav'n;
And they who to be sure of paradise
Dying put on the weeds<sup>o</sup> of Dominic,
Or in Franciscan think to pass disguised;<sup>1</sup>
480 They pass the planets seven, and pass the fixed,
And that crystalline sphere whose balance weighs
The trepidation talked, and that first moved;<sup>2</sup>
And now Saint Peter at Heav'n's wicket seems 485 To wait them with his keys, and now at foot
Of Heav'n's ascent they lift their feet, when lo

A violent crosswind from either coast
Blows them transverse ten thousand leagues awry
Into the devious<sup>o</sup> air. Then might ye see 490 Cows, hoods, and habits<sup>3</sup> with their wearers tossed
And fluttered into rags; then relics, beads,
Indulgences, dispenses, pardons, bulls,
The sport of winds: all these upwhirled aloft
Fly o'er the backside<sup>o</sup> of the world far off
495 Into a limbo large and broad, since called
The Paradise of Fools, to few unknown
Long after, now unpeopled, and untrod;
All this dark globe the Fiend found as he passed,
And long he wandered, till at last a gleam
500 Of dawning light turned thitherward in haste
His traveled<sup>o</sup> steps; far distant he descries
Ascending by degrees<sup>o</sup> magnificent
Up to the wall of Heaven a structure high,
At top whereof, but far more rich appeared
505 The work as of a kingly palace gate
With frontispiece<sup>o</sup> of diamond and gold
Embellished; thick with sparkling orient<sup>o</sup> gems
The portal shone, inimitable on earth,
By model, or by shading pencil drawn.
510 The stairs were such as whereon Jacob saw
Angels ascending and descending, bands
Of guardians bright, when he from Esau fled
To Padan-Aram in the field of Luz,
Dreaming by night under the open sky,
515 And waking cried, "This is the gate of Heav'n."<sup>4</sup>
Each stair mysteriously was meant, nor stood
There always, but drawn up to Heav'n sometimes
Viewless,<sup>o</sup> and underneath a bright sea flowed
Of jasper, or of liquid pearl, whereon
520 Who after came from earth, sailing arrived,
Wafted by angels, or flew o'er the lake

Rapt in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds.<sup>5</sup>
The stairs were then let down, whether to dare
The Fiend by easy ascent, or aggravate
His sad exclusion from the doors of bliss.
525 Direct against which opened from beneath,
Just o'er the blissful seat of Paradise,
A passage down to th' earth, a passage wide,<sup>6</sup>
Wider by far than that of aftertimes
Over Mount Zion, and, though that were large,
530 Over the Promised Land to God so dear,
By which, to visit oft those happy tribes,
On high behests his angels to and fro
Passed frequent, and his eye with choice<sup>o</sup> regard
From Paneas the fount of Jordan's flood
535 To Beërsaba, where the Holy Land
Borders on Egypt and the Arabian shore;<sup>7</sup>
So wide the op'ning seemed, where bounds were set
To darkness, such as bound the ocean wave.
Satan from hence now on the lower stair
540 That scaled by steps of gold to Heaven gate
Looks down with wonder at the sudden view
Of all this world at once. As when a scout
Through dark and desert ways with peril gone
All night; at last by break of cheerful dawn
545 Obtains<sup>o</sup> the brow of some high-climbing hill,
Which to his eye discovers unaware
The goodly prospect of some foreign land
First seen, or some renowned metropolis
With glistening spires and pinnacles adorned,
550 Which now the rising sun gilds with his beams.
Such wonder seized, though after Heaven seen,
The Spirit malign, but much more envy seized
At sight of all this world beheld so fair.
Round he surveys, and well might, where he stood
555 So high above the circling canopy

Of night's extended shade; from eastern point
Of Libra to the fleecy star that bears
Andromeda far off Atlantic seas<sup>8</sup>
Beyond th' horizon; then from pole to pole
560 He views in breadth, and without longer pause
Down right into the world's first region throws
His flight precipitant, and winds with ease
Through the pure marble<sup>o</sup> air his oblique way
Amongst innumerable stars, that shone
565 Stars distant, but nigh hand seemed other worlds,
Or other worlds they seemed, or happy isles,
Like those Hesperian gardens famed of old,
Fortunate fields, and groves and flow'ry vales,<sup>9</sup>
Thrice happy isles, but who dwelt happy there
570 He stayed not to inquire: above them all
The golden sun in splendor likest Heaven
Allured his eye: thither his course he bends
Through the calm firmament;<sup>o</sup> but up or down
By center, or eccentric, hard to tell,
575 Or longitude,<sup>1</sup> where the great luminary
Aloof the vulgar constellations thick,
That from his lordly eye keep distance due,
Dispenses light from far; they as they move
Their starry dance in numbers that compute 580 Days, months, and years, towards his all-cheering lamp
Turn swift their various motions, or are turned
By his magnetic beam, that gently warms
The universe, and to each inward part
With gentle penetration, though unseen,
585 Shoots invisible virtue<sup>o</sup> even to the deep:
So wondrously was set his station bright.
There lands the Fiend, a spot like which perhaps Astronomer in the sun's lucent orb
590 Through his glazed optic tube yet never saw.<sup>2</sup>

The place he found beyond expression bright,
Compared with aught on earth, metal or stone;
Not all parts like, but all alike informed
With radiant light, as glowing iron with fire;
If metal, part seemed gold, part silver clear;
595 If stone, carbuncle most or chrysolite,<sup>3</sup>
Ruby or topaz, to the twelve that shone
In Aaron's breastplate,<sup>4</sup> and a stone besides
Imagined rather oft than elsewhere seen,<sup>5</sup>
That stone, or like to that which here below
600 Philosophers in vain so long have sought,<sup>6</sup>
In vain, though by their powerful art they bind
Volatile Hermes, and call up unbound
In various shapes old Proteus from the sea,
Drained through a limbec to his native form.<sup>7</sup>
605 What wonder then if fields and regions here
Breathe forth elixir pure,<sup>8</sup> and rivers run
Potable<sup>o</sup> gold, when with one virtuous<sup>o</sup> touch
Th' arch-chemic<sup>o</sup> sun so far from us remote
Produces with terrestrial humor<sup>o</sup> mixed
610 Here in the dark so many precious things
Of color glorious and effect so rare?
Here matter new to gaze the Devil met
Undazzled, far and wide his eye commands,
For sight no obstacle found here, nor shade,
615 But all sunshine, as when his beams at noon
Culminate from th' equator, as they now
Shot upward still direct, whence no way round
Shadow from body opaque can fall,<sup>9</sup> and the air,
Nowhere so clear, sharpened his visual ray
620 To objects distant far,<sup>1</sup> whereby he soon
Saw within ken<sup>o</sup> a glorious angel stand,
The same whom John saw also in the sun:<sup>2</sup>
His back was turned, but not his brightness hid;
Of beaming sunny rays, a golden tiar<sup>o</sup>

625      Circled his head, nor less his locks behind
Illustrious<sup>o</sup> on his shoulders fledge<sup>o</sup> with wings
Lay waving round; on some great charge employed
He seemed, or fixed in cogitation deep.
630      Glad was the Spirit impure; as now in hope
To find who might direct his wand'ring flight
To Paradise the happy seat of man,
His journey's end and our beginning woe.
But first he casts<sup>o</sup> to change his proper shape,
Which else might work him danger or delay:
635      And now a stripling Cherub he appears,
Not of the prime,<sup>3</sup> yet such as in his face
Youth smiled celestial, and to every limb
Suitable grace diffused, so well he feigned;
Under a coronet his flowing hair
640      In curls on either cheek played, wings he wore
Of many a colored plume sprinkled with gold,
His habit fit for speed succinct,<sup>o</sup> and held
Before his decent<sup>o</sup> steps a silver wand.
He drew not nigh unheard; the angel bright,
645      Ere he drew nigh, his radiant visage turned,
Admonished by his ear, and straight<sup>o</sup> was known
Th' Archangel Uriel, one of the sev'n
Who in God's presence, nearest to his throne<sup>4</sup>
Stand ready at command, and are his eyes
650      That run through all the heav'ns, or down to th'
earth
Bear his swift errands over moist and dry,
O'er sea and land: him Satan thus accosts:
    "Uriel, for thou of those sev'n Spirits that stand
In sight of God's high throne, gloriously bright, 655      The first art wont<sup>o</sup> his great authentic<sup>o</sup> will Interpreter through highest Heav'n to bring,
Where all his sons thy embassy attend;
And here art likeliest by supreme decree

660 Like honor to obtain, and as his eye
To visit oft this new creation round;
Unspeakable desire to see, and know
All these his wondrous works, but chiefly man,
His chief delight and favor, o him for whom 665 All these his works so wondrous he ordained,
Hath brought me from the choirs of Cherubim
Alone thus wand'ring. Brightest Seraph tell
In which of all these shining orbs hath man
His fixèd seat, or fixèd seat hath none,
670 But all these shining orbs his choice to dwell;
That I may find him, and with secret gaze,
Or open admiration him behold
On whom the great Creator hath bestowed
Worlds, and on whom hath all these graces poured;
That both in him and all things, as is meet, o
675 The Universal Maker we may praise;
Who justly hath driv'n out his rebel foes
To deepest Hell, and to repair that loss
Created this new happy race of men
To serve him better: wise are all his ways."
680     So spake the false dissembler unperceived;
For neither man nor angel can discern
Hypocrisy, the only evil that walks
Invisible, except to God alone,
By his permissive will, through Heav'n and earth:
685 And oft though wisdom wake, suspicion sleeps
At wisdom's gate, and to simplicity
Resigns her charge, while goodness thinks no ill
Where no ill seems: which now for once beguiled
Uriel, though regent of the sun, and held
690 The sharpest-sighted Spirit of all in Heav'n;
Who to the fraudulent impostor foul
In his uprightness answer thus returned:
"Fair angel, thy desire which tends o to know
The works of God, thereby to glorify

695 The great Work-Master, leads to no excess
That reaches blame, but rather merits praise
The more it seems excess, that led thee hither
From thy empyreal mansion thus alone,
700 To witness with thine eyes what some perhaps Contented with report hear only in Heav'n:
For wonderful indeed are all his works,
Pleasant to know, and worthiest to be all
Had in remembrance always with delight;
705 But what created mind can comprehend
Their number, or the wisdom infinite
That brought them forth, but hid their causes deep.
I saw when at his word the formless mass,
This world's material mold,<sup>o</sup> came to a heap:
710 Confusion heard his voice, and wild uproar
Stood ruled, stood vast infinitude confined;
Till at his second bidding darkness fled,
Light shone, and order from disorder sprung:
Swift to their several quarters hasted then
715 The cumbrous elements, earth, flood, air, fire,
And this ethereal quintessence<sup>5</sup> of Heav'n
Flew upward, spirited with various forms,
That rolled orbicular,<sup>6</sup> and turned to stars
Numberless, as thou seest, and how they move;
Each had his place appointed, each his course,
720 The rest in circuit walls this universe.
Look downward on that globe whose hither side
With light from hence, though but reflected, shines;
That place is earth the seat of man, that light
His day, which else as th' other hemisphere
725 Night would invade, but there the neighboring moon
(So call that opposite fair star) her aid
Timely interposes, and her monthly round
Still ending, still renewing through mid-Heav'n,
730 With borrowed light her countenance triform<sup>7</sup>

Hence<sup>8</sup> fills and empties to enlighten th' earth,
 And in her pale dominion checks the night.
 That spot to which I point is Paradise,
 Adam's abode, those lofty shades his bow'r.
 Thy way thou canst not miss, me mine requires."
 735        Thus said, he turned, and Satan bowing low,
              As to superior Spirits is wont in Heav'n,
              Where honor due and reverence none neglects,
              Took leave, and toward the coast of earth beneath,
 740        Down from th' ecliptic,<sup>9</sup> sped with hoped success,
              Throws his steep flight in many an airy wheel,
              Nor stayed, till on Niphates' top<sup>9</sup> he lights.

Endnotes

- Note 1: This second proem or invocation (3.1–55) is a hymn to Light, addressed either as the first creature of God or as coeternal with God, with allusion to 1 John 1:5, "God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all."Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, would you rather be called (a Latinism).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Hell is "utter" (outer) darkness; Chaos is middle darkness.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: One of the so-called Orphic hymns is "To Night," and Orpheus himself visited the underworld. But Milton's song, Christian and epic, is of a different kind.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Urania (though not named until 7.1).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Cataract—suffusio nigra. "Drop serene": gutta serena, the medical term for Milton's kind of blindness.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The mountain of scriptural inspiration, with its brooks Siloa and Kidron.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, blind like me.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: Thamyras was a blind Thracian poet who lived before Homer; "Maeonides" is an epithet of Homer; Tiresias was the blind prophet of Thebes; Phineus was a blind king and seer (Aeneid 3).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Forming a wide breach between Heaven and Hell.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, if I had not foreknown it.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Satan and his crew.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Son echoes (or rather foreshadows) Abraham pleading with the Lord to spare Sodom: "That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked . . . that be far from thee: Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Genesis 18:25).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: God's speech is rhythmic and sometimes rhymed.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: In this speech, Milton's God rejects the Calvinist doctrine that he had from the beginning predestined the damnation or salvation of each individual soul; he claims rather that grace sufficient for salvation is offered to all, enabling everyone, if they choose to do so, to believe and persevere. He does, however, assert his right to give special grace to some.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: By using the light of conscience well they will gain more light.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: "Mortal" means "human" in line 214, but "deadly" in line 215.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Compare the devils in the Great Consult, 2.420–26.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: In the Latin sense, throw down.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The antecedent of "whom" is, loosely construed, the "their nature" that follows it.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Son of God, who long antedates the creation of Adam and who is actually the first created being (3.383), is later incarnated in Jesus Christ; he is called Second Adam and Son of Man by reason of his descent from the first man, Adam. See 1

Corinthians 15:22: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."Return to reference 3

- Note 4: The merit of Christ attributed vicariously ("imputed") to human beings frees from original sin those who renounce their own deeds, good and bad, and hope to be saved by faith.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A heterodox doctrine, that Christ was Son of God by merit. Compare with Satan (2.5).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: In Hebrew "Messiah" means "the anointed one."Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Orders of angels.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Milton's description of the Last Judgment draws on several biblical texts, including Matthew 24:30–31 and 25:31–32; the account of the burning and re-creation of the heavens and earth is from 2 Peter 3:12–13.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: "Multitude" (line 345) is the subject of the sentence, "rung" the verb, and "Heav'n" the object.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Thrones of God and the Son.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In Greek, "unfading," a legendary immortal flower.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Milton draws freely, for his Christian Heaven, on descriptions of the classical paradisaical place, the Elysian Fields.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The turn from theological debate to images that evoke a more mystical aspect of God.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Son is not eternal, as in Trinitarian doctrine, but rather, God's first creation.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: If it were not for the Son who is God's image, no creature could see God.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The rebel angels.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Either Milton here quotes the angels singing as a single chorus, or he associates himself with their song, or both.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Satan is on the outermost of the ten concentric spheres that make up the cosmos.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Imaus, a ridge of mountains beyond the modern Himalayas, runs north through Asia from modern Afghanistan to the Arctic Circle.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Both the Ganges and the Hydaspes (a tributary of the Indus) rise from the mountains of northern India. Sericana (line 438) is a region in northwest China.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Milton's Paradise of Fools (named in line 496) was inspired by Ariosto's Limbo of Vanity in Orlando Furioso (Book 34, lines 73ff.); Milton's region is reserved for deluded victims of misplaced devotion, chiefly Roman Catholics.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Holy men like Enoch and Elijah, transported to Heaven while yet alive (Genesis 5:24; 2 Kings 2:11–12).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Giants, born of unnatural marriages between the "sons of God" and the daughters of men (Genesis 6:4), are creatures unkindly mixed.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Shinar, the plain of Babel (Genesis 11:2–9); the Tower of Babel is an emblem of human pride and folly.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, it would take too long to name them. Both Empedocles and Cleombrotus foolishly carried piety to the point of suicide.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Religious paraphernalia. The white friars are Carmelites; the black, Dominicans; and the gray, Franciscans.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Place where Christ was crucified.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Some try to trick God into granting them salvation by wearing on their deathbeds the garb of various religious orders.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Milton follows their souls through the spheres of the moon and sun, the five then-known planets, the fixed stars, and the sphere responsible for the "trepidation" (a periodic corrective shudder of the cosmos), up to the primum mobile, or prime mover. The next step seems to be the empyreal Heaven.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: The dress of religious orders, together with (next lines) saints' relics, rosary beads, various kinds of pardon for sins, and papal decrees ("bulls").Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The story of Jacob's vision is summarized from Genesis 28:1–19; the stairs of the ladder (next line) allegorically ("mysteriously") represent stages of spiritual growth.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Elijah was wafted to heaven in a chariot.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A passage through the crystalline spheres, otherwise impenetrable.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: From Paneas (or Dan) in northern Palestine to Beersaba, or Beersheba, near the Egyptian border—the entire land of Israel.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: In the zodiac, Libra is diametrically opposite Aries, or the Ram ("the fleecy star"), which seems to carry the constellation Andromeda on its back.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The gardens of the Hesperides and the "fortunate isles" of Greek mythology, classical versions of paradise, lay far out in the Atlantic.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The passage leaves open whether the sun or the earth is at the center of the cosmos.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Galileo first observed sunspots through his telescope in 1609.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Any green stone. "Carbuncle": any red stone.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In Exodus 28:15–20, Aaron's "breastplate" is described as decorated with twelve different gems, of which Milton lists the first four.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, elsewhere imagined more often than seen.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Alchemists had identified the "philosophers" stone with the urim on Aaron's breastplate (Exodus 28:30); that stone reputedly could heal all diseases, restore paradise, and transmute base metals to gold.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: “Hermes”: the winged god and the element mercury, which evaporated readily (“volatile”). “Proteus”: the shape-shifting sea god, a symbol of matter. Alchemists would “bind” (solidify) mercury and dissolve or refine matter to its “native form” in a vessel (alembic, “limbec”).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The liquid form of the philosopher’s stone. “Here”: in the sun.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Before the Fall (and the consequent tipping of the earth’s axis) the sun at noon, on the equator, never cast a shadow. “Culminate”: reach their zenith.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The eye was thought to emit a beam into the object perceived.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: “I saw an angel standing in the sun” (Revelation 19:17).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Not yet in the prime of life.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Uriel—in Hebrew, “light” (or “fire”) of God—is the angel named first (in 2 Esdras 4:1–5, apocrypha) among the seven angels who stood before God’s throne.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The fifth element, of which the incorruptible heavenly bodies were made.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The spherical shape of the stars and their orbits. “Spirited with various forms”: presided over or inhabited by various angelic spirits or intelligences (Plato, Timaeus 41E).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The moon was said to have a triple nature: Luna in Heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate in Hell.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: From here (the sun).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A mountain in Assyria.Return to reference 9

Book 4

The Argument

Satan now in prospect of Eden, and nigh the place where he must now attempt the bold enterprise which he undertook alone against God and man, falls into many doubts with himself, and many passions, fear, envy, and despair; but at length confirms himself in evil, journeys on to Paradise, whose outward prospect and situation is described, overleaps the bounds, sits in the shape of a cormorant on the Tree of Life, as highest in the Garden to look about him. The Garden described; Satan's first sight of Adam and Eve; his wonder at their excellent form and happy state, but with resolution to work their fall; overhears their discourse, thence gathers that the Tree of Knowledge was forbidden them to eat of, under penalty of death; and thereon intends to found his temptation, by seducing them to transgress: then leaves them a while, to know further of their state by some other means. Meanwhile Uriel descending on a sunbeam warns Gabriel, who had in charge the gate of Paradise, that some evil Spirit had escaped the deep, and passed at noon by his sphere in the shape of a good angel down to Paradise, discovered after by his furious gestures in the mount. Gabriel promises to find him ere morning. Night coming on, Adam and Eve discourse of going to their rest: their bower described; their evening worship. Gabriel drawing forth his bands of nightwatch to walk the round of Paradise, appoints two strong angels to Adam's bower, lest the evil Spirit should be there doing some harm to Adam or Eve sleeping; there they find him at the ear of Eve, tempting her in a dream, and bring him, though unwilling, to Gabriel; by whom questioned, he scornfully answers, prepares resistance, but hindered by a sign from heaven, flies out of Paradise.

O for that warning voice, which he who saw

Th' Apocalypse, heard cry in Heaven aloud,
Then when the Dragon, put to second rout,
Came furious down to be revenged on men,
"Woe to the inhabitants on earth!"<sup>1</sup> that now,
5 While time was, our first parents had been warned
The coming of their secret foe, and scaped
Haply<sup>o</sup> so scaped his mortal<sup>o</sup> snare; for now
Satan, now first inflamed with rage, came down,
The tempter ere<sup>o</sup> th' accuser of mankind,
10 To wreak<sup>o</sup> on innocent frail man his loss
Of that first battle, and his flight to Hell:
Yet not rejoicing in his speed, though bold,
Far off and fearless, nor with cause to boast,
Begins his dire attempt, which nigh the birth
15 Now rolling, boils in his tumultuous breast,
And like a devilish engine back recoils
Upon himself; horror and doubt distract
His troubled thoughts, and from the bottom stir
The Hell within him, for within him Hell
20 He brings, and round about him, nor from Hell
One step no more than from himself can fly
By change of place: now conscience wakes despair
That slumbered, wakes the bitter memory
Of what he was, what is, and what must be 25 Worse; of worse deeds worse sufferings must ensue.
Sometimes towards Eden which now in his view
Lay pleasant, his grieved look he fixes sad,
Sometimes towards Heav'n and the full-blazing sun,
Which now sat high in his meridian tow'r:<sup>2</sup>
30 Then much revolving,<sup>o</sup> thus in sighs began.
"O thou that with surpassing glory crowned,<sup>3</sup>
Look'st from thy sole dominion like the god
Of this new world: at whose sight all the stars
Hide their diminished heads; to thee I call,
35 But with no friendly voice, and add thy name

O sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams
That bring to my remembrance from what state
I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere;
Till pride and worse ambition threw me down
40 Warring in Heav'n against Heav'n's matchless King:
Ah wherefore! he deserved no such return
From me, whom he created what I was
In that bright eminence, and with his good
Upbraided<sup>4</sup> none, nor was his service hard.
45 What could be less than to afford him praise,
The easiest recompense, and pay him thanks,
How due! yet all his good proved ill in me,
And wrought but malice; lifted up so high
I 'sdained<sup>o</sup> subjection, and thought one step higher
50 Would set me highest, and in a moment quit<sup>o</sup>
The debt immense of endless gratitude,
So burthensome still<sup>o</sup> paying, still to owe;
Forgetful what from him I still received,
And understood not that a grateful mind
55 By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
Indebted and discharged; what burden then?
O had his powerful destiny ordained
Me some inferior angel, I had stood
Then happy; no unbounded hope had raised
60 Ambition. Yet why not? some other Power<sup>o</sup>
As great might have aspired, and me though mean
Drawn to his part; but other Powers as great Fell not, but stand unshaken, from within
Or from without, to all temptations armed.
65 Hadst thou<sup>5</sup> the same free will and power to stand?
Thou hadst: whom hast thou then or what to accuse,
But Heav'n's free love dealt equally to all?
Be then his love accursed, since love or hate,
To me alike, it deals eternal woe.
70

Nay cursed be thou; since against his thy will Chose freely what it now so justly rues.
Me miserable!<sup>6</sup> which way shall I fly
Infinite wrath, and infinite despair?
Which way I fly is Hell; myself am Hell;<sup>7</sup>
75 And in the lowest deep a lower deep
Still threat'ning to devour me opens wide,
To which the Hell I suffer seems a Heav'n.
O then at last relent! is there no place
Left for repentance, none for pardon left?
80 None left but by submission; and that word
Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame
Among the Spirits beneath, whom I seduced
With other promises and other vaunts
Than to submit, boasting I could subdue
85 Th' Omnipotent. Ay me, they little know
How dearly I abide<sup>8</sup> that boast so vain,
Under what torments inwardly I groan:
While they adore me on the throne of Hell,
With diadem and scepter high advanced 90 The lower still I fall, only supreme
In misery; such joy ambition finds.
But say I could repent and could obtain
By act of grace<sup>9</sup> my former state; how soon
Would height recall high thoughts, how soon unsay
95 What feigned submission swore: ease would recant
Vows made in pain, as violent<sup>10</sup> and void.
For never can true reconciliation grow
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep:
Which would but lead me to a worse relapse,
100 And heavier fall: so should I purchase dear
Short intermission bought with double smart.
This knows my punisher; therefore as far
From granting he, as I from begging peace:
All hope excluded thus, behold instead
105

Of us outcast, exiled, his new delight,
 Mankind created, and for him this world.
 So farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear,
 Farewell remorse: all good to me is lost;
 110 Evil be thou my good; by thee at least Divided empire with Heav'n's King I hold
 By thee, and more than half perhaps will reign;
 As man ere long, and this new world shall know."
 Thus while he spake, each passion dimmed his face
 115 Thrice changed with pale, <sup>o</sup>ire, envy, and despair,
 Which marred his borrowed visage, and betrayed
 Him counterfeit, if any eye beheld.
 For heav'nly minds from such distempers foul
 Are ever clear. Whereof he soon aware,
 Each perturbation smoothed with outward calm,
 120 Artificer of fraud; and was the first
 That practiced falsehood under saintly show,
 Deep malice to conceal, couched <sup>o</sup> with revenge:
 Yet not enough had practiced to deceive
 Uriel once warned; whose eye pursued him down
 125 The way he went, and on th' Assyrian mount <sup>o</sup>
 Saw him disfigured, more than could befall
 Spirit of happy sort: his gestures fierce
 He marked and mad demeanor, then alone,
 As he supposed, all unobserved, unseen.
 130 So on he fares, and to the border comes
 Of Eden, where delicious Paradise, <sup>9</sup>
 Now nearer, crowns with her enclosure green,
 As with a rural mound the champaign head <sup>o</sup>
 Of a steep wilderness, whose hairy sides
 135 With thicket overgrown, grotesque <sup>1</sup> and wild,
 Access denied; and overhead up grew
 Insuperable heighth of loftiest shade,
 Cedar, and pine, and fir, and branching palm,

140 A sylvan scene, and as the ranks ascend
Shade above shade, a woody theater<sup>2</sup>
Of stateliest view. Yet higher than their tops
The verdurous wall of Paradise up sprung:
Which to our general sire gave prospect large
145 Into his nether empire neighboring round.
And higher than that wall a circling row
Of goodliest trees loaden with fairest fruit,
Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue
Appeared, with gay enameled<sup>o</sup> colors mixed:
150 On which the sun more glad impressed his beams
Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow,<sup>o</sup>
When God hath show'ed the earth; so lovely seemed
That landscape: and of pure now purer air<sup>3</sup>
Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires<sup>o</sup>
Vernal delight and joy, able to drive<sup>o</sup>
155 All sadness but despair: now gentle gales
Fanning their odoriferous<sup>o</sup> wings dispense
Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
Those balmy spoils. As when to them who sail
Beyond the Cape of Hope,<sup>o</sup> and now are past
160 Mozambic, off at sea northeast winds blow
Sabeian odors from the spicy shore
Of Araby the Blest,<sup>4</sup> with such delay
Well pleased they slack their course, and many a league
165 Cheered with the grateful<sup>o</sup> smell old Ocean smiles.
So entertained those odorous sweets the Fiend
Who came their bane,<sup>o</sup> though with them better pleased
Than Asmodeus with the fishy fume,
That drove him, though enamored, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent 170 From Media post to Egypt, there fast bound.<sup>5</sup>

Now to th'ascent of that steep savage<sup>o</sup> hill
Satan had journeyed on, pensive and slow;
But further way found none, so thick entwined,
As one continued brake,<sup>o</sup> the undergrowth
175 Of shrubs and tangling bushes had perplexed
All path of man or beast that passed that way:
One gate there only was, and that looked east
On th' other side: which when th' arch-felon saw
Due entrance he disdained, and in contempt,
180 At one slight bound high overleaped all bound
Of hill or highest wall, and sheer within Lights on his feet. As when a prowling wolf,
Whom hunger drives to seek new haunt for prey,
Watching where shepherds pen their flocks at eve
185 In hurdled cotes<sup>o</sup> amid the field secure,
Leaps o'er the fence with ease into the fold:
Or as a thief bent to unhoard the cash
Of some rich burgher, whose substantial doors,
Cross-barred and bolted fast, fear no assault,
190 In at the window climbs, or o'er the tiles;
So clomb<sup>o</sup> this first grand thief into God's fold:
So since into his church lewd hirelings<sup>6</sup> climb.
Thence up he flew, and on the Tree of Life,
The middle tree and highest there that grew,
195 Sat like a cormorant;<sup>7</sup> yet not true life
Thereby regained, but sat devising death
To them who lived; nor on the virtue<sup>o</sup> thought
Of that life-giving plant, but only used
For prospect,<sup>o</sup> what well used had been the pledge
200 Of immortality. So little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right
The good before him, but perverts best things
To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.
Beneath him with new wonder now he views
205 To all delight of human sense exposed

In narrow room nature's whole wealth, yea more,
A heav'n on earth: for blissful Paradise
Of God the garden was, by him in the east
Of Eden planted; Eden stretched her line
210 From Auran eastward to the royal tow'rs
Of great Seleucia, built by Grecian kings,
Or where the sons of Eden long before
Dwelt in Telassar:<sup>8</sup> in this pleasant soil
His far more pleasant garden God ordained;
215 Out of the fertile ground he caused to grow
All trees of noblest kind for sight, smell, taste;
And all amid them stood the Tree of Life,
High eminent, blooming ambrosial<sup>o</sup> fruit
Of vegetable gold; and next to life
220 Our death the Tree of Knowledge grew fast by,
Knowledge of good bought dear by knowing ill.
Southward through Eden went a river large,<sup>9</sup>
Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill
Passed underneath engulfed, for God had thrown 225 That mountain as his garden mold<sup>o</sup> high raised
Upon the rapid current, which through veins
Of porous earth with kindly<sup>o</sup> thirst up drawn,
Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill
Watered the garden; thence united fell
230 Down the steep glade, and met the nether flood,
Which from his darksome passage now appears,
And now divided into four main streams,
Runs diverse, wand'ring many a famous realm
And country whereof here needs no account,
235 But rather to tell how, if art could tell,
How from that sapphire fount the crispèd<sup>o</sup> brooks,
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
With mazy error<sup>1</sup> under pendent shades
Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
240 Flow'rs worthy of Paradise which not nice<sup>o</sup> art

In beds and curious knots, but nature boon<sup>o</sup>
Poured forth profuse on hill and dale and plain,
Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, and where the unpierced shade 245 Embrowned<sup>o</sup> the noontide bow'rs. Thus was this place,
A happy rural seat of various view,<sup>2</sup>
Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm,
Others whose fruit burnished with golden rind
Hung amiable,<sup>o</sup> Hesperian fables true,<sup>3</sup>
250 If true, here only, and of delicious taste:
Betwixt them lawns, or level downs,<sup>o</sup> and flocks
Grazing the tender herb, were interposed,
Or palmy hillock, or the flow'ry lap
Of some irriguous<sup>o</sup> valley spread her store,
255 Flow'rs of all hue, and without thorn the rose:
Another side, umbrageous<sup>o</sup> grots and caves
Of cool recess, o'er which the mantling<sup>o</sup> vine
Lays forth her purple grape, and gently creeps
Luxuriant; meanwhile murmuring waters fall
260 Down the slope hills, dispersed, or in a lake,
That to the fringed bank with myrtle crowned,
Her crystal mirror holds, unite their streams.
The birds their choir apply; airs,<sup>4</sup> vernal airs,
Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
265 The trembling leaves, while universal Pan<sup>5</sup>
Knit<sup>o</sup> with the Graces and the Hours in dance
Led on th' eternal spring. Not that fair field
Of Enna, where Proserpine gathering flow'rs
Herself a fairer flow'r by gloomy Dis
270 Was gathered, which cost Ceres all that pain
To seek her through the world; nor that sweet grove
Of Daphne by Orontes, and th' inspired
Castalian spring, might with this Paradise

275 Of Eden strive;<sup>6</sup> nor that Nyseian isle
 Girt with the river Triton, where old Cham,
 Whom Gentiles Ammon call and Libyan Jove,
 Hid Amalthea and her florid<sup>o</sup> son
 Young Bacchus from his stepdame Rhea's eye;<sup>7</sup>
 Nor where Abassin kings their issue guard,
 280 Mount Amara,<sup>8</sup> though this by some supposed
 True Paradise under the Ethiop line<sup>o</sup>
 By Nilus'<sup>o</sup> head, enclosed with shining rock,
 A whole day's journey high, but wide remote
 From this Assyrian garden,<sup>o</sup> where the Fiend
 285 Saw undelighted all delight, all kind
 Of living creatures new to sight and strange:
 Two of far nobler shape erect and tall,
 Godlike erect, with native honor clad
 In naked majesty seemed lords of all,
 290 And worthy seemed, for in their looks divine
 The image of their glorious Maker shone,
 Truth, wisdom, sanctitude severe and pure,
 Severe but in true filial freedom placed;
 Whence true authority in men;<sup>9</sup> though both 295 Not equal, as their sex not equal seemed;
 For contemplation he and valor formed,
 For softness she and sweet attractive grace,
 He for God only, she for God in him:<sup>1</sup>
 His fair large front<sup>o</sup> and eye sublime declared
 300 Absolute rule; and hyacinthine<sup>2</sup> locks
 Round from his parted forelock manly hung
 Clust'ring, but not beneath his shoulders broad:
 She as a veil down to the slender waist
 Her unadorned golden tresses wore
 305 Disheveled, but in wanton<sup>o</sup> ringlets waved
 As the vine curls her tendrils,<sup>3</sup> which implied
 Subjection, but required<sup>o</sup> with gentle sway,<sup>o</sup>
 And by her yielded, by him best received,

310 Yielded with coy<sup>o</sup> submission, modest pride,
And sweet reluctant amorous delay.
Nor those mysterious parts were then concealed,
Then was not guilty shame, dishonest<sup>o</sup> shame
Of nature's works, honor dishonorable,
315 Sin-bred, how have ye troubled all mankind
With shows instead, mere shows of seeming pure,
And banished from man's life his happiest life,
Simplicity and spotless innocence.
So passed they naked on, nor shunned the sight
Of God or angel, for they thought no ill:
320 So hand in hand they passed, the loveliest pair
That ever since in love's embraces met,
Adam the goodliest man of men since born
His sons, the fairest of her daughters Eve.
Under a tuft of shade that on a green
325 Stood whispering soft, by a fresh fountain side
They sat them down, and after no more toil
Of their sweet gard'ning labor than sufficed
To recommend cool Zephyr,<sup>4</sup> and made ease
More easy, wholesome thirst and appetite
330 More grateful, to their supper fruits they fell,
Nectarine<sup>o</sup> fruits which the compliant boughs
Yielded them, sidelong as they sat recline
On the soft downy bank damasked with flow'rs:
The savory pulp they chew, and in the rind
335 Still as they thirsted scoop the brimming stream;
Nor gentle purpose,<sup>o</sup> nor endearing smiles
Wanted,<sup>o</sup> nor youthful dalliance as beseems
Fair couple, linked in happy nuptial league,
Alone as they. About them frisking played
340 All beasts of th' earth, since wild, and of all chase<sup>o</sup>
In wood or wilderness, forest or den;
Sporting the lion ramped,<sup>o</sup> and in his paw
Dandled the kid; bears, tigers, ounces,<sup>o</sup> pards<sup>o</sup>

345 Gamboled before them; th' unwieldy elephant
 To make them mirth used all his might, and wreathed
 His lithe proboscis; <sup>o</sup> close the serpent sly
 Insinuating, <sup>o</sup> wove with Gordian twine
 His braided train, <sup>5</sup> and of his fatal guile
 Gave proof unheeded; others on the grass
 350 Couched, and now filled with pasture gazing sat,
 Or bedward ruminating: <sup>o</sup> for the sun
 Declined was hasting now with prone <sup>o</sup> career
 To th' Ocean Isles, <sup>o</sup> and in th' ascending scale
 Of Heav'n the stars that usher evening rose:
 355 When Satan still in gaze, as first he stood,
 Scarce thus at length failed speech recovered sad.
 "O Hell! what do mine eyes with grief behold,
 Into our room of bliss thus high advanced
 Creatures of other mold, earth-born perhaps,
 360 Not Spirits, yet to heav'nly Spirits bright
 Little inferior; whom my thoughts pursue
 With wonder, and could love, so lively shines
 In them divine resemblance, and such grace
 The hand that formed them on their shape hath 365 poured.
 Ah gentle pair, ye little think how nigh
 Your change approaches, when all these delights
 Will vanish and deliver ye to woe,
 More woe, the more your taste is now of joy;
 Happy, but for so happy <sup>o</sup> ill secured
 370 Long to continue, and this high seat your heav'n
 Ill fenced for Heav'n to keep out such a foe
 As now is entered; yet no purposed foe
 To you whom I could pity thus forlorn
 Though I unpitied: league with you I seek,
 375 And mutual amity so strait, <sup>o</sup> so close,
 That I with you must dwell, or you with me

Henceforth; my dwelling haply<sup>o</sup> may not please
Like this fair Paradise, your sense, yet such Accept your Maker's work; he gave it me,
380 Which I as freely give; Hell shall unfold,
To entertain you two, her widest gates,
And send forth all her kings; there will be room,
Not like these narrow limits, to receive
Your numerous offspring; if no better place,
385 Thank him who puts me loath to this revenge
On you who wrong me not for<sup>o</sup> him who wronged.
And should I at your harmless innocence
Melt, as I do, yet public reason just,
Honor and empire with revenge enlarged
390 By conquering this new world, compels me now
To do what else though damned I should abhor."<sup>6</sup>

So spake the Fiend, and with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.
Then from his lofty stand on that high tree
395 Down he alights among the sportful herd
Of those four-footed kinds, himself now one,
Now other, as their shape served best his end
Nearer to view his prey, and unespied
To mark what of their state he more might learn
400 By word or action marked: about them round
A lion now he stalks with fiery glare,
Then as a tiger, who by chance hath spied
In some purlieu<sup>o</sup> two gentle fawns at play,
Straight<sup>o</sup> couches close, then rising changes oft
405 His couchant watch, as one who chose his ground
Whence rushing he might surest seize them both
Gripped in each paw: when Adam first of men
To first of women Eve thus moving speech
Turned him all ear to hear new utterance flow:
410 "Sole partner and sole<sup>o</sup> part of all these joys,
Dearer thyself than all; needs must the Power

That made us, and for us this ample world
Be infinitely good, and of his good
As liberal and free as infinite,
415 That raised us from the dust and placed us here
In all this happiness, who at his hand
Have nothing merited, nor can perform
Aught whereof he hath need, he who requires 420 From us no other service than to keep
This one, this easy charge, of all the trees
In Paradise that bear delicious fruit
So various, not to taste that only Tree
Of Knowledge, planted by the Tree of Life,
So near grows death to life, whate'er death is,
425 Some dreadful thing no doubt; for well thou know'st
God hath pronounced it death to taste that Tree,
The only sign of our obedience left
Among so many signs of power and rule
Conferred upon us, and dominion giv'n
430 Over all other creatures that possess
Earth, air, and sea. Then let us not think hard
One easy prohibition, who enjoy
Free leave so large to all things else, and choice
Unlimited of manifold delights:
435 But let us ever praise him, and extol
His bounty, following our delightful task
To prune these growing plants, and tend these flow'rs,
Which were it toilsome, yet with thee were sweet."
440 To whom thus Eve replied. "O thou for whom
And from whom I was formed flesh of thy flesh,
And without whom am to no end, my guide
And head, what thou hast said is just and right.
For we to him indeed all praises owe,
And daily thanks, I chiefly who enjoy
445 So far the happier lot, enjoying thee
Preeminent by so much odds,<sup>o</sup> while thou

Like consort to thyself canst nowhere find.
That day I oft remember, when from sleep
I first awaked, and found myself reposed<sup>o</sup>
450 Under a shade on flowers, much wond'ring where
And what I was, whence thither brought, and how.
Not distant far from thence a murmuring sound
Of waters issued from a cave and spread
Into a liquid plain, then stood unmoved
455 Pure as th' expanse of Heav'n; I thither went
With unexperienced thought, and laid me down
On the green bank, to look into the clear
Smooth lake, that to me seemed another sky.
As I bent down to look, just opposite,
460 A shape within the wat'ry gleam appeared
Bending to look on me, I started back,
It started back, but pleased I soon returned,
Pleased it returned as soon with answering looks
Of sympathy and love; there I had fixed
465 Mine eyes till now, and pined with vain<sup>o</sup> desire,<sup>7</sup>
Had not a voice thus warned me, 'What thou seest,
What there thou seest fair creature is thyself,
With thee it came and goes: but follow me,
And I will bring thee where no shadow stays<sup>o</sup>
470 Thy coming, and thy soft embraces, he Whose image thou art, him thou shall enjoy
Inseparably thine, to him shalt bear
Multitudes like thyself, and thence be called
Mother of human race': what could I do,
475 But follow straight<sup>o</sup> invisibly thus led?
Till I espied thee, fair indeed and tall,
Under a platan,<sup>o</sup> yet methought less fair,
Less winning soft, less amiably mild,
Than that smooth wat'ry image; back I turned,
480 Thou following cried'st aloud, 'Return fair Eve,
Whom fli'st thou? Whom thou fli'st, of him thou art,

His flesh, his bone; to give thee being I lent
 Out of my side to thee, nearest my heart
 Substantial life, to have thee by my side
 485 Henceforth an individual<sup>o</sup> solace dear;
 Part of my soul I seek thee, and thee claim
 My other half': with that thy gentle hand
 Seized mine, I yielded, and from that time see 490 How beauty is excelled by manly grace
 And wisdom, which alone is truly fair."
 So spake our general mother, and with eyes
 Of conjugal attraction unreprieved,
 And meek surrender, half embracing leaned
 On our first father, half her swelling breast
 495 Naked met his under the flowing gold
 Of her loose tresses hid: he in delight
 Both of her beauty and submissive charms
 Smiled with superior love, as Jupiter
 On Juno smiles, when he impregns<sup>o</sup> the clouds
 500 That shed May flowers; and pressed her matron lip
 With kisses pure: aside the Devil turned
 For envy, yet with jealous leer malign
 Eyed them askance, and to himself thus plained.<sup>o</sup>
 505 "Sight hateful, sight tormenting! thus these two Imparadised in one another's arms
 The happier Eden, shall enjoy their fill
 Of bliss on bliss, while I to Hell am thrust,
 Where neither joy nor love, but fierce desire,
 Among our other torments not the least,
 510 Still<sup>o</sup> unfulfilled with pain of longing pines;
 Yet let me not forget what I have gained
 From their own mouths; all is not theirs it seems:
 One fatal tree there stands of Knowledge called,
 Forbidden them to taste: knowledge forbidden?
 515 Suspicious, reasonless. Why should their Lord
 Envy<sup>o</sup> them that? Can it be sin to know,
 Can it be death? And do they only stand

By ignorance, is that their happy state,
 The proof of their obedience and their faith?
 520 O fair foundation laid whereon to build
 Their ruin! Hence I will excite their minds
 With more desire to know, and to reject
 Envious commands, invented with design
 To keep them low whom knowledge might exalt
 525 Equal with gods; aspiring to be such,
 They taste and die: what likelier can ensue?
 But first with narrow search I must walk round
 This garden, and no corner leave unspied;
 A chance, but chance<sup>8</sup> may lead where I may meet
 530 Some wand'ring Spirit of Heav'n, by fountain side,
 Or in thick shade retired, from him to draw
 What further would be learnt. Live while ye may,
 Yet happy pair; enjoy, till I return,
 Short pleasures, for long woes are to succeed."
 535 So saying, his proud step he scornful turned,
 But with sly circumspection, and began Through wood, through waste, o'er hill, o'er dale his roam.<sup>o</sup>
 Meanwhile in utmost longitude, where heav'n<sup>o</sup>
 With earth and ocean meets, the setting sun
 540 Slowly descended, and with right aspect
 Against the eastern gate of Paradise
 Leveled his evening rays.<sup>9</sup> It was a rock
 Of alabaster,<sup>1</sup> piled up to the clouds,
 Conspicuous far, winding with one ascent
 545 Accessible from earth, one entrance high;
 The rest was craggy cliff, that overhung
 Still as it rose, impossible to climb.
 Betwixt these rocky pillars Gabriel<sup>2</sup> sat
 Chief of th' angelic guards, awaiting night;
 550 About him exercised heroic games
 Th' unarmèd youth of Heav'n, but nigh at hand

Celestial armory, shields, helms, and spears
Hung high with diamond flaming, and with gold.
Thither came Uriel, gliding through the even 555 On a sunbeam, swift as a shooting star
In autumn thwarts<sup>o</sup> the night, when vapors fired
Impress the air, and shows the mariner
From what point of his compass to beware
Impetuous winds:<sup>3</sup> he thus began in haste.
560 "Gabriel, to thee thy course by lot hath giv'n
Charge and strict watch that to this happy place
No evil thing approach or enter in;
This day at height of noon came to my sphere
A Spirit, zealous, as he seemed, to know
565 More of th' Almighty's works, and chiefly man
God's latest image: I described<sup>o</sup> his way
Bent all on speed, and marked his airy gait;<sup>o</sup>
But in the mount that lies from Eden north,
Where he first lighted, soon discerned his looks 570 Alien from Heav'n, with passions foul obscured:
Mine eye pursued him still, but under shade<sup>o</sup>
Lost sight of him; one of the banished crew
I fear, hath ventured from the deep, to raise
New troubles; him thy care must be to find."
575 To whom the winged warrior thus returned:
"Uriel, no wonder if thy perfect sight,
Amid the sun's bright circle where thou sitt'st,
See far and wide. In at this gate none pass
The vigilance here placed, but such as come
580 Well known from Heav'n; and since meridian hour<sup>o</sup>
No creature thence: if Spirit of other sort,
So minded, have o'erleaped these earthy bounds
On purpose, hard thou know'st it to exclude
Spiritual substance with corporeal bar.
585 But if within the circuit of these walks,
In whatsoever shape he lurk, of whom

Thou tell'st, by morrow dawning I shall know."
 So promised he, and Uriel to his charge
 Returned on that bright beam, whose point now
 590 raised
 Bore him slope downward to the sun now fall'n
 Beneath th' Azorès; whether the prime orb,
 Incredible how swift, had thither rolled
 Diurnal, <sup>o</sup> or this less volúble <sup>o</sup> earth
 By shorter flight to th' east, <sup>4</sup> had left him there
 595 Arraying with reflected purple and gold
 The clouds that on his western throne attend.
 Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
 Had in her sober livery all things clad;
 Silence accompanied, for beast and bird,
 600 They to their grassy couch, these to their nests
 Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale;
 She all night long her amorous descant <sup>o</sup> sung;
 Silence was pleased: now glowed the firmament
 With living sapphires: Hesperus <sup>5</sup> that led 605 The starry host, rode brightest, till the moon
 Rising in clouded majesty, at length
 Apparent <sup>o</sup> queen unveiled her peerless light,
 And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw.
 When Adam thus to Eve: "Fair consort, th' hour
 610 Of night, and all things now retired to rest
 Mind us of like repose, since God hath set
 Labor and rest, as day and night to men
 Successive, and the timely dew of sleep
 Now falling with soft slumbrous weight inclines
 615 Our eyelids; other creatures all day long
 Rove idle unemployed, and less need rest;
 Man hath his daily work of body or mind
 Appointed, which declares his dignity,
 And the regard of Heav'n on all his ways;
 620 While other animals unactive range,

And of their doings God takes no account.
 Tomorrow ere fresh morning streak the east
 With first approach of light, we must be ris'n,
 And at our pleasant labor, to reform
 625 Yon flow'ry arbors, yonder alleys green,
 Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown,
 That mock our scant manuring,<sup>o</sup> and require
 More hands than ours to lop their wanton<sup>o</sup> growth:
 Those blossoms also, and those dropping gums,
 630 That lie bestrown unsightly and unsmooth,
 Ask riddance,<sup>o</sup> if we mean to tread with ease;
 Meanwhile, as nature wills, night bids us rest."
 To whom thus Eve with perfect beauty adorned.
 "My author and disposer, what thou bidd'st
 635 Unargued I obey; so God ordains,
 God is thy law, thou mine: to know no more
 Is woman's happiest knowledge and her praise.
 With thee conversing I forget all time.
 All seasons<sup>o</sup> and their change, all please alike.
 640 Sweet<sup>6</sup> is the breath of morn, her rising sweet,
 With charm<sup>7</sup> of earliest birds; pleasant the sun
 When first on this delightful land he spreads
 His orient<sup>o</sup> beams, on herb, tree, fruit, and flow'r,
 Glist'ring with dew; fragrant the fertile earth
 645 After soft showers; and sweet the coming on
 Of grateful evening mild, then silent night
 With this her solemn bird<sup>o</sup> and this fair moon,
 And these the gems of heav'n, her starry train:
 But neither breath of morn when she ascends
 650 With charm of earliest birds, nor rising sun
 On this delightful land, nor herb, fruit, flow'r,
 Glist'ring with dew, nor fragrance after showers,
 Nor grateful evening mild, nor silent night
 With this her solemn bird, nor walk by moon,
 655 Or glittering starlight without thee is sweet.

But wherefore all night long shine these, for whom
This glorious sight, when sleep hath shut all eyes?"

To whom our general ancestor replied.

660 "Daughter of God and man, accomplished<sup>8</sup> Eve,
Those have their course to finish, round the earth,
By morrow evening, and from land to land
In order, though to nations yet unborn,
Minist'ring light prepared, they set and rise;
Lest total darkness should by night regain
665 Her old possession, and extinguish life
In nature and all things, which these soft<sup>o</sup> fires
Not only enlighten, but with kindly<sup>o</sup> heat
Of various influence foment<sup>o</sup> and warm,
Temper or nourish, or in part shed down
670 Their stellar virtue on all kinds that grow
On earth, made hereby apter to receive
Perfection from the sun's more potent ray.<sup>9</sup>
These then, though unbeheld in deep of night,
Shine not in vain, nor think, though men were none,
675 That heav'n would want<sup>o</sup> spectators, God want praise;
Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth
Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep:
All these with ceaseless praise his works behold
Both day and night: how often from the steep
680 Of echoing hill or thicket have we heard
Celestial voices to the midnight air,
Sole, or responsive each to other's note
Singing their great Creator: oft in bands
While they keep watch, or nightly rounding walk,
685 With heav'nly touch of instrumental sounds
In full harmonic number joined, their songs
Divide<sup>1</sup> the night, and lift our thoughts to Heaven."

Thus talking hand in hand alone they passed
690 On to their blissful bower; it was a place

Chos'n by the sov'reign Planter, when he framed<sup>o</sup>
 All things to man's delightful use; the roof
 Of thickest covert was inwoven shade
 Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
 695 Of firm and fragrant leaf; on either side
 Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub
 Fenced up the verdant wall; each beauteous flow'r,
 Iris all hues, roses, and jessamine<sup>o</sup>
 Reared high their flourished<sup>o</sup> heads between, and wrought
 Mosaic; underfoot the violet,
 700 Crocus, and hyacinth with rich inlay
 Broidered the ground, more colored than with stone
 Of costliest emblem:<sup>o</sup> other creature here
 Beast, bird, insect, or worm durst enter none,
 Such was their awe of man. In shadier bower
 705 More sacred and sequestered,<sup>o</sup> though but feigned,
 Pan or Silvanus never slept, nor nymph,
 Nor Faunus<sup>2</sup> haunted. Here in close recess
 With flowers, garlands, and sweet-smelling herbs
 Espoused Eve decked first her nuptial bed,
 710 And heav'nly choirs the hymenean<sup>o</sup> sung,
 What day the genial<sup>3</sup> angel to our sire
 Brought her in naked beauty more adorned,
 More lovely than Pandora, whom the gods
 Endowed with all their gifts, and O too like 715 In sad event,<sup>o</sup> when to the unwiser son
 Of Japhet brought by Hermes, she ensnared
 Mankind with her fair looks, to be avenged
 On him who had stole Jove's authentic fire.<sup>4</sup>
 Thus at their shady lodge arrived, both stood,
 720 Both turned, and under open sky adored
 The God that made both sky, air, earth, and heav'n
 Which they beheld, the moon's resplendent globe
 And starry pole:<sup>o</sup> "Thou also mad'st the night,

725     Maker Omnipotent, and thou the day,
Which we in our appointed work employed
Have finished happy in our mutual help
And mutual love, the crown of all our bliss
Ordained by thee, and this delicious place
730     For us too large, where thy abundance wants
Partakers, and uncropped falls to the ground.
But thou hast promised from us two a race
To fill the earth, who shall with us extol
Thy goodness infinite, both when we wake,
And when we seek, as now, thy gift of sleep.”
735     This said unanimous, and other rites
Observing none, but adoration pure
Which God likes best,<sup>5</sup> into their inmost bow’r
Handed<sup>o</sup> they went; and eased<sup>o</sup> the putting off
740     These troublesome disguises which we wear,
Straight side by side were laid, nor turned I ween<sup>o</sup>
Adam from his fair spouse, nor Eve the rites
Mysterious<sup>6</sup> of connubial love refused:
Whatever hypocrites austere talk
Of purity and place and innocence,
745     Defaming as impure what God declares
Pure, and commands to some, leaves free to all.
Our Maker bids increase,<sup>7</sup> who bids abstain
But our destroyer, foe to God and man?
Hail wedded Love, mysterious law, true source
750     Of human offspring, sole propriety<sup>o</sup>
In Paradise of all things common else.
By thee adulterous lust was driv’n from men
Among the bestial herds to range, by thee
Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure,
755     Relations dear, and all the charities<sup>o</sup>
Of father, son, and brother first were known.
Far be it, that I should write thee sin or blame,
Or think thee unbefitting holiest place,

760 Perpetual fountain of domestic sweets,
 Whose bed is undefiled and chaste pronounced,
 Present, or past, as saints and patriarchs used.<sup>8</sup>
 Here Love his golden shafts employs,<sup>9</sup> here lights
 His constant lamp, and waves his purple wings,
 765 Reigns here and revels; not in the bought smile
 Of harlots, loveless, joyless, unendeared,
 Casual fruition, nor in court amours,
 Mixed dance, or wanton masque, or midnight ball,
 Or serenade, which the starved<sup>o</sup> lover sings
 To his proud fair, best quitted with disdain.
 770 These lulled by nightingales embracing slept,
 And on their naked limbs the flow'ry roof
 Show'ed roses, which the morn repaired.<sup>o</sup> Sleep on,
 Blest pair; and O yet happiest if ye seek
 No happier state, and know to know no more.<sup>1</sup>
 775 Now had night measured with her shadowy cone
 Halfway up hill this vast sublunar vault,<sup>2</sup>
 And from their ivory port the Cherubim
 Forth issuing at th' accustomed hour stood armed
 To their night watches in warlike parade,
 780 When Gabriel to his next in power thus spake:
 "Uzziel,<sup>3</sup> half these draw off, and coast<sup>o</sup> the south
 With strictest watch; these other wheel<sup>4</sup> the north,
 Our circuit meets full west." As flame they part
 Half wheeling to the shield, half to the spear.
 785 From these, two strong and subtle Spirits he called
 That near him stood, and gave them thus in charge:
 "Ithuriel and Zephon,<sup>5</sup> with winged speed
 Search through this garden, leave unsearched no nook,
 790 But chiefly where those two fair creatures lodge,
 Now laid perhaps asleep secure of<sup>o</sup> harm.
 This evening from the sun's decline arrived
 Who<sup>o</sup> tells of some infernal Spirit seen

Hitherward bent; who could have thought? escaped
 The bars of Hell, on errand bad no doubt:
 795 Such where ye find, seize fast, and hither bring."
 So saying, on he led his radiant files,
 Dazzling the moon; these to the bower direct
 In search of whom they sought: him there they found
 Squat like a toad, close at the ear of Eve;
 800 Assaying<sup>o</sup> by his devilish art to reach
 The organs of her fancy,<sup>6</sup> and with them forge
 Illusions as he list,<sup>o</sup> phantasms and dreams;
 Or if, inspiring<sup>o</sup> venom, he might taint
 Th' animal spirits that from pure blood arise
 805 Like gentle breaths from rivers pure, thence raise
 At least distempered,<sup>o</sup> discontented thoughts,
 Vain hopes, vain aims, inordinate desires
 Blown up with high conceits<sup>o</sup> engend'ring pride.
 Him thus intent Ithuriel with his spear
 810 Touched lightly; for no falsehood can endure
 Touch of celestial temper,<sup>7</sup> but returns
 Of force to its own likeness: up he starts
 Discovered and surprised. As when a spark Lights on a heap of nitrous powder,<sup>8</sup> laid
 815 Fit for the tun some magazine to store
 Against a rumored war, the smutty<sup>o</sup> grain
 With sudden blaze diffused, inflames the air:
 So started up in his own shape the Fiend.
 Back stepped those two fair angels half amazed
 820 So sudden to behold the grisly king;
 Yet thus, unmoved with fear, accost him soon:
 "Which of those rebel Spirits adjudged to Hell
 Com'st thou, escaped thy prison; and transformed,
 Why sat'st thou like an enemy in wait
 825 Here watching at the head of these that sleep?"
 "Know ye not then," said Satan, filled with scorn,

830 "Know ye not me? Ye knew me once no mate
For you, there sitting where ye durst not soar;
Not to know me argues<sup>o</sup> yourselves unknown,
The lowest of your throng; or if ye know,
Why ask ye, and superfluous begin
Your message, like to end as much in vain?" To whom thus Zephon, answering scorn with scorn:
835 "Think not, revolted Spirit, thy shape the same,
Or undiminished brightness, to be known
As when thou stood'st in Heav'n upright and pure;
That glory then, when thou no more wast good,
Departed from thee, and thou resembl'st now
840 Thy sin and place of doom obscure<sup>o</sup> and foul.
But come, for thou, be sure, shalt give account
To him who sent us, whose charge is to keep
This place inviolable, and these from harm."
So spake the Cherub, and his grave rebuke
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace
845 Invincible: abashed the Devil stood,
And felt how awful<sup>o</sup> goodness is, and saw
Virtue in her shape how lovely, saw, and pined<sup>o</sup>
His loss; but chiefly to find here observed
His luster visibly impaired; yet seemed 850 Undaunted. "If I must contend," said he,
"Best with the best, the sender not the sent,
Or all at once; more glory will be won,
Or less be lost." "Thy fear," said Zephon bold,
"Will save us trial what the least can do 855 Single<sup>o</sup> against thee wicked, and thence weak."
The Fiend replied not, overcome with rage;
But like a proud steed reined, went haughty on,
Champing his iron curb: to strive or fly
He held it vain; awe from above had quelled
860 His heart, not else dismayed. Now drew they nigh
The western point, where those half-rounding guards

Just met, and closing stood in squadron joined Awaiting next command. To whom their chief
 Gabriel from the front thus called aloud:
 865     "O friends, I hear the tread of nimble feet
 Hasting this way, and now by glimpse discern
 Ithuriel and Zephon through the shade,o
 And with them comes a third of regal port,o
 But faded splendor wan;o who by his gait
 870     And fierce demeanor seems the Prince of Hell,
 Not likely to part hence without contést;
 Stand firm, for in his look defiance lours."o
 He scarce had ended, when those two approached
 And brief related whom they brought, where found,
 875     How busied, in what form and posture couched.
 To whom with stern regard thus Gabriel spake:
 "Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescribed
 To thy transgressions, and disturbed the chargeo
 Of others, who approve not to transgress
 880     By thy example, but have power and right
 To question thy bold entrance on this place;
 Employed it seems to violate sleep, and those Whose dwelling God hath planted here in bliss?"
 To whom thus Satan, with contemptuous brow:
 885     "Gabriel, thou hadst in Heav'n th' esteemo of wise,
 And such I held thee; but this question asked
 Puts me in doubt. Lives there who loves his pain?
 Who would not, finding way, break loose from Hell,
 Though thither doomed? Thou wouldst thyself, no
 890     doubt,
 And boldly venture to whatever place
 Farthest from pain, where thou mightst hope to changeo
 Torment with ease, and soonest recompense
 Doleo with delight, which in this place I sought;
 To thee no reason, who know'st only good,
 895

But evil hast not tried: and wilt object<sup>9</sup>
His will who bound us? Let him surer bar
His iron gates, if he intends our stay
In that dark durance:<sup>o</sup> thus much what was asked.<sup>1</sup>
The rest is true, they found me where they say;
900 But that implies not violence or harm."

Thus he in scorn. The warlike angel moved,
Disdainfully half smiling thus replied:
"O loss of one in Heav'n to judge of wise,
905 Since Satan fell, whom folly overthrew,<sup>2</sup>
And now returns him from his prison scaped,
Gravely in doubt whether to hold them wise
Or not, who ask what boldness brought him hither
Unlicensed from his bounds in Hell prescribed;
910 So wise he judges it to fly from pain
However,<sup>o</sup> and to scape his punishment.
So judge thou still, presumptuous, till the wrath,
Which thou incurr'st by flying, meet thy flight
Sevenfold, and scourge that wisdom back to Hell,
915 Which taught thee yet no better, that no pain
Can equal anger infinite provoked.
But wherefore thou alone? Wherefore with thee
Came not all Hell broke loose? Is pain to them
Less pain, less to be fled, or thou than they 920 Less hardy to endure? Courageous chief,
The first in flight from pain, hadst thou alleged
To thy deserted host this cause of flight,
Thou surely hadst not come sole fugitive."

To which the Fiend thus answered frowning stern:
"Not that I less endure, or shrink from pain,
925 Insulting angel, well thou know'st I stood<sup>o</sup>
Thy fiercest, when in battle to thy aid
The blasting volleyed thunder made all speed
And seconded thy else not dreaded spear.
930 But still thy words at random, as before,

Argue thy inexperience what behoves
From<sup>o</sup> hard assays<sup>o</sup> and ill successes past
A faithful leader, not to hazard all
Through ways of danger by himself untried.
I therefore, I alone first undertook
935 To wing the desolate abyss, and spy
This new-created world, whereof in Hell
Fame<sup>o</sup> is not silent, here in hope to find Better abode, and my afflicted powers<sup>o</sup>
To settle here on earth, or in midair;<sup>3</sup>
940 Though for possession put<sup>o</sup> to try once more
What thou and thy gay<sup>o</sup> legions dare against;
Whose easier business were to serve their Lord
High up in Heav'n, with songs to hymn his throne,
And practiced distances to cringe, not fight."<sup>4</sup>
945 To whom the warrior angel soon replied:
"To say and straight unsay, pretending first
Wise to fly pain, professing next the spy,
Argues no leader, but a liar traced,<sup>o</sup>
Satan, and couldst thou faithful add? O name,
950 O sacred name of faithfulness profaned!
Faithful to whom? To thy rebellious crew?
Army of fiends, fit body to fit head;
Was this your discipline and faith engaged,
Your military obedience, to dissolve
955 Allegiance to th' acknowledged Power Supreme?
And thou sly hypocrite, who now wouldst seem
Patron of liberty, who more than thou
Once fawned, and cringed, and servilely adored
Heav'n's awful Monarch?<sup>5</sup> Wherefore but in hope
960 To dispossess him, and thyself to reign?
But mark what I areed<sup>o</sup> thee now, avaunt;<sup>o</sup>
Fly thither whence thou fledd'st: if from this hour
Within these hallowed limits thou appear,
965 Back to th' infernal pit I drag thee chained,

And seal thee so, as henceforth not to scorn
 The facile<sup>o</sup> gates of Hell too slightly barred."
 So threatened he, but Satan to no threats
 Gave heed, but waxing<sup>o</sup> more in rage replied:
 970 "Then when I am thy captive talk of chains,
 Proud liminary<sup>6</sup> Cherub, but ere then Far heavier load thyself expect to feel
 From my prevailing arm, though Heaven's King
 Ride on thy wings, and thou with thy compeers,
 Used to the yoke, draw'st his triumphant wheels
 975 In progress through the road of heav'n star-paved."
 While thus he spake, th' angelic squadron bright
 Turned fiery red, sharp'ning in moonèd horns<sup>7</sup>
 Their phalanx, and began to hem him round
 With ported<sup>8</sup> spears, as thick as when a field
 980 Of Ceres<sup>9</sup> ripe for harvest waving bends
 Her bearded grove of ears, which way the wind
 Sways them; the careful plowman doubting stands
 Lest on the threshing floor his hopeful sheaves
 Prove chaff. On th' other side Satan alarmed<sup>o</sup>
 985 Collecting all his might dilated stood,
 Like Tenerife or Atlas<sup>1</sup> unremoved:<sup>o</sup>
 His stature reached the sky, and on his crest
 Sat Horror plumed; nor wanted in his grasp
 What seemed both spear and shield: now dreadful
 990 deeds
 Might have ensued, nor only Paradise
 In this commotion, but the starry cope<sup>o</sup>
 Of Heav'n perhaps, or all the elements
 At least had gone to wrack, disturbed and torn
 With violence of this conflict, had not soon
 995 Th' Eternal to prevent such horrid fray
 Hung forth in Heav'n his golden scales, yet seen
 Betwixt Astraea and the Scorpion sign,<sup>2</sup>
 Wherein all things created first he weighed,

1000 The pendulous round earth with balanced air
 In counterpoise, now ponders all events,
 Battles and realms: in these he put two weights
 The sequel each of parting and of fight;<sup>3</sup>
 The latter quick up flew, and kicked the beam;
 Which Gabriel spying, thus bespake the Fiend:
 1005 "Satan, I know thy strength, and thou know'st mine,
 Neither our own but giv'n; what folly then
 To boast what arms can do, since thine no more
 Than Heav'n permits, nor mine, though doubled now
 To trample thee as mire: for proof look up,
 1010 And read thy lot in yon celestial sign
 Where thou art weighed, and shown how light, how weak,<sup>4</sup>
 If thou resist." The Fiend looked up and knew
 His mounted scale aloft: nor more; but fled
 Murmuring, and with him fled the shades of night.

Endnotes

- Note 1: John of Patmos, in Revelation 12:3–12, hears such a cry during a second war in Heaven, between the Dragon and the angels.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: At midday, the height of noon.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Milton's nephew, Edward Phillips, said that this soliloquy was written "several years before the poem was begun," and was intended to begin a drama on the topic, Adam Unparadised.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Reproached (James 1:5).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Compare Satan's address to himself here with Adam's soliloquy in parallel circumstances (10.758ff.).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A Latinism, me miserum!Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Compare Satan's earlier claim that "the mind is its own place" (1.254).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The technical term for a formal pardon.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Paradise is a delightful ("delicious") garden on top of a steep hill situated in the east of the land of Eden.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Characterized by interwoven, tangled vines and branches.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: As if in a Greek amphitheater, the trees are set row on row.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The air becomes still purer.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Arabia Felix (modern Yemen). "Sabea": the biblical Sheba.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Apocryphal book of Tobit tells of Tobias, Tobit's son, who married Sara and avoided the fate of her previous seven husbands (killed on their wedding night by the demon Asmodeus) by following the instructions of the angel Raphael and making a fishy smell to drive him off; Asmodeus then fled to Egypt, where Raphael bound him.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Base men interested only in money; Milton would have clergymen not paid by required tithes or by the state, to ensure their purity of motive.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A sea bird, noted for gluttony.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Auran is the province of Hauran on the eastern border of Israel. Selucia, a powerful city on the Tigris, near modern Baghdad, was founded by one of Alexander's generals ("built by Grecian kings"). Telassar is another Near Eastern kingdom.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The Tigris (identified at 9.71) flowed under the hill.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: From Latin errare, to wander.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Like a country estate, with a variety of prospects.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: These were real golden apples, by contrast to those feigned golden apples of the Hesperides, fabled paradisa islands in the Western Ocean.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Both breezes and melodies. "Their choir apply": practice their songs.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The god of all nature—pan in Greek means "all."Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Milton compares Paradise with famous beauty spots of antiquity. Enna in Sicily was a lovely meadow from which Proserpine was kidnapped by "gloomy Dis" (Pluto); her mother Ceres sought her throughout the world. The grove of Daphne, near Antioch and the Orontes River in the Near East, had a spring called "Castalia" after the Muses' fountain near Parnassus.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The isle of Nysa in the river Triton in Tunisia was where Ammon (an Egyptian god, identified with Cham, or Ham, the son of Noah) hid Bacchus, his child by Amalthea (who later became the god of wine), away from the eyes of his wife Rhea.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Atop Mount Amara, the "Abassin" (Abyssinian) king had a splendid palace in a paradisaal garden.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: This phrase underscores Milton's idea that true freedom involves obedience to natural superiors (that is, God).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The phrase has as its context 1 Corinthians 11:3: "The head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man."Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A classical metaphor for hair curled in the form of hyacinth petals, and perhaps also implying dark or flowing.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Eve's hair is curly, abundant, not subjected to rigid control, like the vegetation in Paradise.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, to make a cool breeze welcome.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Checkered body. "Gordian twine": cords as convoluted as the Gordian knot that Alexander the Great had to cut with his sword.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Satan's excuse—reason of state, public interest, empire, etc.—is called "the tyrant's plea" in line 394.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Eve's experience reprises (but with significant differences) the story of Narcissus, who fell in love with his own reflection and was transformed into a flower.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: An opportunity, even if only by luck.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Setting in the west, the sun struck the eastern gate from the inside, at a ninety-degree angle.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: White, translucent marble veined with colors.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In Hebrew, "strength of God." A tradition (see 1 Enoch 20:7) gave Gabriel charge of Paradise.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Shooting stars were thought to indicate by the direction of their fall the source of oncoming storms. "Vapors fired": heat lightning.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Here and elsewhere Milton leaves open the question of whether the sun moves around the earth, or vice versa.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Called Venus when it appears in the evening sky.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: With this embedded lyric, beginning here, Eve displays her literary talents in an elegant love song, sonnetlike and replete with striking rhetorical figures of circularity and repetition.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Blended singing of many birds.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Having many talents and achievements; perfect, complete.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The stars were thought to have their own occult influence, and also to moderate that of the sun.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Mark the watches of the night; also, perform musical "divisions," elaborate melodic passages.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Forest and field divinities of classical mythology.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Presiding over marriage and generation.Return to reference 3
- Note 4:
Pandora (the name means “all gifts”) was an artificial woman, molded of clay, bestowed by the gods on Epimetheus, brother of Prometheus (who angered Jove by stealing fire from heaven). She brought a box that foolish Epimetheus opened, releasing all the ills of the human race, leaving only hope inside. The brothers were sons of Iapetos, whom Milton identifies with Japhet, Noah’s third son. The Eve-Pandora parallel was often noted.
Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Like many Puritans, Milton objected to set forms of prayer, so Adam and Eve pray spontaneously (therefore sincerely), but also, paradoxically, together. Their prayer develops variations on Psalm 104:20–24.Return to reference 5

Book 5

The Argument

Morning approached, Eve relates to Adam her troublesome dream; he likes it not, yet comforts her: they come forth to their day labors: their morning hymn at the door of their bower. God to render man inexcusable sends Raphael to admonish him of his obedience, of his free estate, of his enemy near at hand; who he is, and why his enemy, and whatever else may avail Adam to know. Raphael comes down to Paradise, his appearance described, his coming discerned by Adam afar off sitting at the door of his bower; he goes out to meet him, brings him to his lodge, entertains him with the choicest fruits of Paradise got together by Eve; their discourse at table: Raphael performs his message, minds Adam of his state and of his enemy; relates at Adam's request who that enemy is, and how he came to be so, beginning from his first revolt in heaven, and the occasion thereof; how he drew his legions after him to the parts of the north, and there incited them to rebel with him, persuading all but only Abdiel a Seraph, who in argument dissuades and opposes him, then forsakes him.

Now Morn her rosy steps in th' eastern clime
Advancing, sowed the earth with orient pearl,<sup>o</sup>
When Adam waked, so custom'd, for his sleep
Was aery light, from pure digestion bred,
And temperate vapors bland,<sup>o</sup> which th' only sound
5 Of leaves and fuming rills, Aurora's fan,<sup>1</sup>
Lightly dispersed, and the shrill matin<sup>o</sup> song
Of birds on every bough; so much the more
His wonder was to find unwaken'd Eve
With tresses discomposed, and glowing cheek,
10 As through unquiet rest: he on his side

Leaning half-raised, with looks of cordial<sup>o</sup> love
Hung over her enamored, and beheld
Beauty, which whether waking or asleep,
Shot forth peculiar<sup>o</sup> graces; then with voice
15 Mild, as when Zephyrus on Flora<sup>2</sup> breathes,
Her hand soft touching, whispered thus: "Awake
My fairest, my espoused, my latest found,
Heav'n's last best gift, my ever new delight,
Awake, the morning shines, and the fresh field
20 Calls us, we lose the prime, to mark how spring
Our tended plants, how blows<sup>o</sup> the citron grove,
What drops the myrrh, and what the balmy reed,<sup>o</sup>
How nature paints her colors, how the bee
Sits on the bloom extracting liquid sweet."<sup>3</sup>
25 Such whispering waked her, but with startled eye
On Adam, whom embracing, thus she spake:
"O sole in whom my thoughts find all repose,
My glory, my perfection, glad I see
Thy face, and morn returned, for I this night,
30 Such night till this I never passed, have dreamed,
If dreamed, not as I oft am wont,<sup>o</sup> of thee,
Works of day past, or morrow's next design,
But of offense and trouble, which my mind
Knew never till this irksome night. Methought
35 Close at mine ear one called me forth to walk
With gentle voice, I thought it thine; it said,
'Why sleep'st thou Eve? Now is the pleasant time,
The cool, the silent, save where silence yields
To the night-warbling bird, that now awake
40 Tunes sweetest his love-labored song; now reigns
Full-orbed the moon, and with more pleasing light
Shadowy sets off the face of things, in vain,
If none regard; heav'n wakes with all his eyes,<sup>o</sup>
Whom to behold but thee, nature's desire,
45 In whose sight all things joy, with ravishment

Attracted by thy beauty still<sup>o</sup> to gaze.
I rose as at thy call, but found thee not;
To find thee I directed then my walk;
And on, me thought, alone I passed through ways
50 That brought me on a sudden to the tree
Of interdicted knowledge: fair it seemed,
Much fairer to my fancy than by day:
And as I wond'ring looked, beside it stood
One shaped and winged like one of those from 55 Heav'n
By us oft seen; his dewy locks distilled
Ambrosia;<sup>o</sup> on that tree he also gazed;
And 'O fair plant,' said he, 'with fruit surcharged,<sup>o</sup>
Deigns none to ease thy load and taste thy sweet,
Nor god,<sup>o</sup> nor man? Is knowledge so despised?
60 Or envy, or what reserve forbids to taste?<sup>4</sup>
Forbid who will, none shall from me withhold
Longer thy offered good, why else set here?'
This said he paused not, but with vent'rous arm
He plucked, he tasted; me damp horror chilled
65 At such bold words vouched with<sup>o</sup> a deed so bold:
But he thus overjoyed, 'O fruit divine,
Sweet of thyself, but much more sweet thus cropped,
Forbidden here, it seems, as only fit
For gods, yet able to make gods of men:
70 And why not gods of men, since good, the more
Communicated, more abundant grows,
The author not impaired,<sup>o</sup> but honored more?
Here, happy creature, fair angelic Eve,
Partake thou also; happy though thou art,
75 Happier thou may'st be, worthier canst not be:
Taste this, and be henceforth among the gods
Thyself a goddess, not to earth confined,
But sometimes in the air, as we, sometimes

80 Ascend to Heav'n, by merit thine, and see
What life the gods live there, and such live thou.'
So saying, he drew nigh, and to me held,
Even to my mouth of that same fruit held part
Which he had plucked; the pleasant savory smell
85 So quickened appetite, that I, methought,
Could not but taste. Forthwith up to the clouds
With him I flew, and underneath beheld
The earth outstretched immense, a prospect wide
And various: wond'ring at my flight and change
90 To this high exaltation: suddenly
My guide was gone, and I, methought, sunk down,
And fell asleep; but O how glad I waked
To find this but a dream!" Thus Eve her night
Related, and thus Adam answered sad. <sup>o</sup>
95 "Best image of myself and dearer half,
The trouble of thy thoughts this night in sleep
Affects me equally; nor can I like
This uncouth <sup>o</sup> dream, of evil sprung I fear;
Yet evil whence? In thee can harbor none,
Created pure. But know that in the soul
100 Are many lesser faculties <sup>5</sup> that serve
Reason as chief; among these fancy next
Her office holds; of all external things,
Which the five watchful senses represent,
She forms imaginations, <sup>o</sup> aery shapes,
105 Which reason joining or disjoining, frames
All what we affirm or what deny, and call
Our knowledge or opinion; then retires
Into her private cell when nature rests.
Oft in her absence mimic fancy wakes
110 To imitate her; but misjoining shapes,
Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams,
Ill matching words and deeds long past or late.
Some such resemblances methinks I find

115 Of our last evening's talk in this thy dream,<sup>6</sup>
But with addition strange; yet be not sad.
Evil into the mind of god<sup>7</sup> or man
May come and go, so unapproved,<sup>8</sup> and leave
No spot or blame behind: which gives me hope
That what in sleep thou didst abhor to dream,
120 Waking thou never wilt consent to do.
Be not disheartened then, nor cloud those looks
That wont to be<sup>9</sup> more cheerful and serene
Than when fair morning first smiles on the world,
And let us to our fresh employments rise
125 Among the groves, the fountains, and the flow'rs
That open now their choicest bosomed smells
Reserved from night, and kept for thee in store."
So cheered he his fair spouse, and she was cheered,
But silently a gentle tear let fall
130 From either eye, and wiped them with her hair;
Two other precious drops that ready stood,
Each in their crystal sluice, he ere they fell
Kissed as the gracious signs of sweet remorse
And pious awe, that feared to have offended.
135 So all was cleared, and to the field they haste.
But first from under shady arborous<sup>10</sup> roof,
Soon as they forth were come to open sight
Of day-spring,<sup>11</sup> and the sun, who scarce up risen
With wheels yet hov'ring o'er the ocean brim,
140 Shot parallel to the earth his dewy ray,
Discovering in wide landscape all the east
Of Paradise and Eden's happy plains,
Lowly they bowed adoring, and began
Their orisons,<sup>12</sup> each morning duly paid
145 In various style, for neither various style
Nor holy rapture<sup>13</sup> wanted they to praise
Their Maker, in fit strains pronounced or sung

Unmeditated,<sup>9</sup> such prompt eloquence
Flowed from their lips, in prose or numerous<sup>o</sup> verse,
150 More tuneable<sup>o</sup> than needed lute or harp
To add more sweetness, and they thus began:
    “These are thy glorious works, Parent of good,<sup>1</sup>
Almighty, thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair; thyself how wondrous then!
155 Unspeakable, who sitt’st above these heavens,
To us invisible or dimly seen
In these thy lowest works, yet these declare
Thy goodness beyond thought, and power divine:
Speak ye who best can tell, ye sons of light,
160 Angels, for ye behold him, and with songs
And choral symphonies,<sup>o</sup> day without night,
Circle his throne rejoicing, ye in Heav’n,
On earth join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, him last, him midst, and without end.
165 Fairest of stars,<sup>2</sup> last in the train<sup>o</sup> of night,
If better thou belong not to the dawn,
Sure pledge of day, that crown’st the smiling morn
With thy bright circlet, praise him in thy sphere
While day arises, that sweet hour of prime.
170 Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul,
Acknowledge him thy greater, sound his praise
In thy eternal course, both when thou climb’st,
And when high noon hast gained, and when thou fall’st.
Moon, that now meet’st the orient sun, now fli’st
175 With the fixed stars, fixed in their orb that flies,
And ye five other wand’ring fires that move
In mystic dance not without song,<sup>3</sup> resound
His praise, who out of darkness called up light.
Air, and ye elements the eldest birth
180 Of nature’s womb, that in quaternions<sup>4</sup> run
Perpetual circle, multiform, and mix

And nourish all things, let your ceaseless change
Vary to our great Maker still<sup>o</sup> new praise.
Ye mists and exhalations that now rise
185 From hill or steaming lake, dusky or gray,
Till the sun paint your fleecy skirts with gold,
In honor to the world's great Author rise,
Whether to deck with clouds the uncolored sky,
Or wet the thirsty earth with falling showers,
190 Rising or falling still advance his praise.
His praise ye winds, that from four quarters blow,
Breathe soft or loud; and wave your tops, ye pines,
With every plant, in sign of worship wave.
Fountains and ye, that warble, as ye flow,
195 Melodious murmurs, warbling tune his praise.
Join voices all ye living souls: ye birds,
That singing up to heaven gate ascend,
Bear on your wings and in your notes his praise.
Ye that in waters glide, and ye that walk
200 The earth, and stately tread, or lowly creep;
Witness if I be silent, morn or even,
To hill, or valley, fountain, or fresh shade
Made vocal by my song, and taught his praise.
Hail universal Lord, be bounteous still<sup>o</sup>
205 To give us only good; and if the night
Have gathered aught of evil or concealed,
Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark."
So prayed they innocent, and to their thoughts
Firm peace recovered soon and wonted calm.
210 On to their morning's rural work they haste
Among sweet dews and flow'rs; where any row
Of fruit trees over-woody<sup>o</sup> reached too far
Their pampered boughs, and needed hands to check
Fruitless embraces: or they led the vine
215 To wed her elm;<sup>5</sup> she spoused about him twines
Her marriageable arms, and with her brings

Her dow'r th' adopted clusters, to adorn
His barren leaves. Them thus employed beheld
220 With pity Heav'n's high King, and to him called Raphael, the sociable Spirit, that deigned
To travel with Tobias, and secured
His marriage with the seven-times-wedded maid.<sup>6</sup>
"Raphael," said he, "thou hear'st what stir on earth
Satan from Hell scaped through the darksome gulf
225 Hath raised in Paradise, and how disturbed
This night the human pair, how he designs
In them at once to ruin all mankind.
Go therefore, half this day as friend with friend
Converse with Adam, in what bow'r or shade
230 Thou find'st him from the heat of noon retired,
To respite his day labor with repast,
Or with repose; and such discourse bring on,
As may advise him of his happy state,
Happiness in his power left free to will,
235 Left to his own free will, his will though free,
Yet mutable; whence warn him to beware
He swerve not too secure:<sup>o</sup> tell him withal
His danger, and from whom, what enemy
Late fall'n himself from Heav'n, is plotting now
240 The fall of others from like state of bliss;
By violence, no, for that shall be withstood,
But by deceit and lies; this let him know,
Lest wilfully transgressing he pretend<sup>o</sup>
Surprisal, unadmonished, unforewarned."
245 So spake th' Eternal Father, and fulfilled
All justice: nor delayed the wingèd saint<sup>o</sup>
After his charge received; but from among Thousand celestial ardors,<sup>7</sup> where he stood
Veiled with his gorgeous wings, up springing light
250 Flew through the midst of Heav'n; th' angelic choirs
On each hand parting, to his speed gave way

Through all th' empyreal road; till at the gate
Of Heav'n arrived, the gate self-opened wide
On golden hinges turning, as by work<sup>o</sup>
255 Divine the sov'reign Architect had framed.
From hence, no cloud, or, to obstruct his sight,
Star interposed, however small he sees,
Not unconform to other shining globes,
Earth and the gard'n of God, with cedars crowned 260 Above all hills. As when by night the glass<sup>o</sup>
Of Galileo, less assured, observes
Imagined lands and regions in the moon:
Or pilot from amidst the Cyclades
Delos or Samos first appearing kens<sup>o</sup>
265 A cloudy spot.<sup>8</sup> Down thither prone<sup>o</sup> in flight
He speeds, and through the vast ethereal sky
Sails between worlds and worlds, with steady wing
Now on the polar wings, then with quick fan
Winnows the buxom air; till within soar
270 Of tow'ring eagles,<sup>9</sup> to all the fowls he seems
A phoenix, gazed by all, as that sole bird
When to enshrine his relics in the sun's
Bright temple, to Egyptian Thebes he flies.<sup>1</sup>
At once on th' eastern cliff of Paradise
275 He lights, and to his proper shape returns
A Seraph winged; six wings he wore, to shade
His lineaments<sup>o</sup> divine; the pair that clad
Each shoulder broad, came mantling<sup>o</sup> o'er his breast
With regal ornament; the middle pair
280 Girt like a starry zone<sup>o</sup> his waist, and round
Skirted his loins and thighs with downy gold
And colors dipped in Heav'n; the third his feet
Shadowed from either heel with feathered mail<sup>2</sup>
Sky-tinctured grain.<sup>o</sup> Like Maia's son<sup>3</sup> he stood,
285 And shook his plumes, that heav'nly fragrance filled
The circuit wide. Straight<sup>o</sup> knew him all the bands

Of angels under watch; and to his state,<sup>o</sup>
And to his message<sup>o</sup> high in honor rise;
For on some message high they guessed him bound.
290 Their glittering tents he passed, and now is come
Into the blissful field; through groves of myrrh,
And flow'ring odors, cassia, nard, and balm;<sup>4</sup>
A wilderness of sweets; for nature here
Wantoned<sup>o</sup> as in her prime, and played<sup>o</sup> at will 295 Her virgin fancies, pouring forth more sweet,
Wild above rule or art; enormous<sup>o</sup> bliss.
Him through the spicy forest onward come
Adam discerned, as in the door he sat<sup>5</sup>
300 Of his cool bow'r, while now the mounted sun
Shot down direct his fervid rays, to warm
Earth's inmost womb, more warmth than Adam needs;
And Eve within, due<sup>o</sup> at her hour prepared
For dinner savory fruits, of taste to please
True appetite and not disrelish thirst,
305 Of nectarous drafts between, from milky stream,
Berry or grape: to whom thus Adam called:
"Haste hither Eve, and worth thy sight behold
Eastward among those trees, what glorious shape
Comes this way moving; seems another morn
310 Ris'n on mid-noon; some great behest from Heav'n
To us perhaps he brings, and will vouchsafe
This day to be our guest. But go with speed,
And what thy stores contain, bring forth and pour
Abundance, fit to honor and receive
315 Our heav'nly stranger; well we may afford
Our givers their own gifts, and large bestow
From large bestowed, where nature multiplies
Her fertile growth, and by disburd'ning grows
More fruitful, which instructs us not to spare."
320

To whom thus Eve: "Adam, earth's hallowed mold,<sup>6</sup>
 Of God inspired, small store will serve, where store,<sup>7</sup>
 All seasons, ripe for use hangs on the stalk;
 Save what by frugal storing firmness gains
 To nourish, and superfluous moist consumes:
 325 But I will haste and from each bough and brake
 Each plant and juiciest gourd will pluck such choice
 To entertain our angel guest, as he Beholding shall confess that here on earth
 God hath dispensed his bounties as in Heav'n."
 330 So saying, with dispatchful looks in haste
 She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent
 What choice to choose for delicacy best,
 What order, so contrived as not to mix
 Tastes, not well joined, inelegant, but bring 335 Taste after taste upheld<sup>o</sup> with kindest<sup>o</sup> change,
 Bestirs her then, and from each tender stalk
 Whatever earth all-bearing mother yields
 In India east or west, or middle shore
 In Pontus or the Punic coast,<sup>8</sup> or where 340 Alcinous reigned, fruit of all kinds, in coat,
 Rough, or smooth-rined, or bearded husk, or shell
 She gathers, tribute large, and on the board
 Heaps with unsparing hand; for drink the grape
 She crushes, inoffensive must, and meaths<sup>9</sup>
 345 From many a berry, and from sweet kernels pressed
 She tempers<sup>o</sup> dulcet creams, nor these to hold
 Wants<sup>o</sup> her fit vessels pure, then strews the ground
 With rose and odors from the shrub unfumed.<sup>1</sup>
 Meanwhile our primitive<sup>o</sup> great sire, to meet
 350 His godlike guest, walks forth, without more train<sup>o</sup>
 Accompanied than with his own complete
 Perfections, in himself was all his state,<sup>o</sup>
 More solemn<sup>o</sup> than the tedious pomp that waits

355 On princes, when their rich retinue long
Of horses led, and grooms besmeared with gold
Dazzles the crowd, and sets them all agape.
Nearer his presence Adam though not awed,
Yet with submissive approach and reverence meek,
As to a superior nature, bowing low,
360 Thus said: "Native of Heav'n, for other place:
None can than Heav'n such glorious shape contain;
Since by descending from the thrones above,
Those happy places thou hast deigned<sup>o</sup> a while
To want,<sup>o</sup> and honor these, vouchsafe with us
365 Two only, who yet by sov'reign gift possess
This spacious ground, in yonder shady bow'r
To rest, and what the garden choicest bears
To sit and taste, till this meridian<sup>o</sup> heat
Be over, and the sun more cool decline."
370 Whom thus the angelic Virtue<sup>2</sup> answered mild:
"Adam, I therefore came, nor art thou such Created, or such place hast here to dwell,
As may not oft invite, though Spirits of Heav'n
To visit thee; lead on then where thy bow'r
375 O'ershades; for these mid-hours, till evening rise
I have at will." So to the sylvan lodge
They came, that like Pomona's<sup>3</sup> arbor smiled
With flow'rets decked<sup>o</sup> and fragrant smells; but Eve
Undecked, save with herself more lovely fair
380 Than wood nymph, or the fairest goddess feigned
Of three that in Mount Ida naked strove,<sup>4</sup>
Stood to entertain her guest from Heav'n; no veil
She needed, virtue-proof,<sup>o</sup> no thought infirm
Altered her cheek. On whom the Angel "Hail"
385 Bestowed, the holy salutation used
Long after to blest Mary, second Eve.<sup>5</sup>
"Hail mother of mankind, whose fruitful womb
Shall fill the world more numerous with thy sons

390 Than with these various fruits the trees of God
Have heaped this table." Raised of grassy turf
Their table was, and mossy seats had round,
And on her ample square from side to side
All autumn piled, though spring and autumn here
Danced hand in hand. A while discourse they hold;
395 No fear lest dinner cool; when thus began
Our author: <sup>o</sup> "Heav'nly stranger, please to taste
These bounties which our Nourisher, from whom
All perfect good unmeasured out, descends,
To us for food and for delight hath caused 400 The earth to yield; unsavory food perhaps
To spiritual natures; only this I know,
That one Celestial Father gives to all."

To whom the angel: "Therefore what he gives (Whose praise be ever sung) to man in part
405 Spiritual, may of <sup>o</sup> purest Spirits be found
No ingrateful food: and food alike those pure
Intelligential substances require <sup>6</sup>
As doth your rational; and both contain
Within them every lower faculty
410 Of sense, whereby they hear, see, smell, touch, taste,
Tasting concoct, digest, assimilate, <sup>7</sup>
And corporeal to incorporeal turn.
For know, whatever was created, needs
To be sustained and fed; of elements
415 The grosser feeds the purer, earth the sea,
Earth and the sea feed air, the air those fires
Ethereal, and as lowest first the moon;
Whence in her visage round those spots, unpurged
Vapors not yet into her substance turned. <sup>8</sup>
420 Nor doth the moon no nourishment exhale
From her moist continent to higher orbs. <sup>9</sup>
The sun that light imparts to all, receives

From all his alimantal<sup>o</sup> recompense
In humid exhalations, and at even 425 Sups with the ocean:<sup>1</sup> though in Heav'n the trees
Of life ambrosial<sup>o</sup> fruitage bear, and vines
Yield nectar,<sup>2</sup> though from off the boughs each morn
We brush mellifluous<sup>o</sup> dewes, and find the ground
Covered with pearly grain; yet God hath here
430 Varied his bounty so with new delights,
As may compare with Heaven; and to taste
Think not I shall be nice."<sup>o</sup> So down they sat,
And to their viands fell, nor seemingly<sup>o</sup>
The angel, nor in mist, the common gloss<sup>o</sup>
435 Of theologians, but with keen dispatch
Of real hunger, and concoctive<sup>o</sup> heat
To transubstantiate;<sup>3</sup> what redounds, transpires
Through Spirits with ease; nor wonder, if by fire
Of sooty coal the empiric<sup>o</sup> alchemist
440 Can turn, or holds it possible to turn
Metals of drossiest ore to perfect gold
As from the mine. Meanwhile at table Eve
Ministered naked, and their flowing cups
With pleasant liquors crowned.<sup>o</sup> O innocence
445 Deserving Paradise! if ever, then,
Then had the Sons of God excuse t' have been
Enamored at that sight,<sup>4</sup> but in those hearts
Love unlibidinous<sup>o</sup> reigned, nor jealousy
Was understood, the injured lover's hell.
450 Thus when with meats and drinks they had sufficed,
Not burdened nature, sudden mind arose
In Adam, not to let th' occasion pass
Given him by this great conference to know
Of things above his world, and of their being 455 Who dwell in Heav'n, whose excellence he saw Transcend his own so far, whose radiant forms

Divine effulgence,<sup>o</sup> whose high power so far
Exceeded human, and his wary speech
Thus to th' empyreal minister he framed:
460 "Inhabitant with God, now know I well
Thy favor, in this honor done to man,
Under whose lowly roof thou hast vouchsafed
To enter and these earthly fruits to taste,
Food not of angels, yet accepted so,
465 As that more willingly thou couldst not seem
At Heav'n's high feasts t' have fed: yet what compare?"
To whom the wingèd hierarch<sup>o</sup> replied:
"O Adam, one Almighty is, from whom
All things proceed, and up to him return,
470 If not depraved from good, created all
Such to perfection, one first matter all,<sup>5</sup>
Endued with various forms, various degrees
Of substance, and in things that live, of life;
But more refined, more spiritous, and pure,
475 As nearer to him placed or nearer tending
Each in their several active spheres assigned,
Till body up to spirit work, in bounds
Proportioned to each kind.<sup>6</sup> So from the root Springs lighter the green stalk, from thence the 480 leaves
More airy, last the bright consummate flow'r
Spirits odorous breathes:<sup>7</sup> flow'rs and their fruit
Man's nourishment, by gradual scale sublimed<sup>o</sup>
To vital spirits aspire, to animal,
To intellectual, give both life and sense,
485 Fancy<sup>o</sup> and understanding, whence the soul
Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discursive, or intuitive;<sup>8</sup> discourse
Is ofttest yours, the latter most is ours,
Differing but in degree, of kind the same.

Wonder not then, what God for you saw good
490 If I refuse not, but convert, as you,
To proper<sup>o</sup> substance; time may come when men
With angels may participate, and find
No inconvenient diet, nor too light fare:
495 And from these corporal nutriments perhaps
Your bodies may at last turn all to spirit,
Improved by tract<sup>o</sup> of time, and winged ascend
Ethereal as we, or may at choice
Here or in heav'nly paradises dwell;
500 If ye be found obedient, and retain Unalterably firm his love entire Whose progeny you are. Meanwhile enjoy
Your fill what happiness this happy state
Can comprehend, incapable<sup>o</sup> of more."
505 To whom the patriarch of mankind replied:
"O favorable Spirit, propitious guest,
Well hast thou taught the way that might direct
Our knowledge, and the scale of nature set
From center to circumference, whereon
510 In contemplation of created things
By steps we may ascend to God. But say,
What meant that caution joined, 'If ye be found
Obedient'? Can we want<sup>o</sup> obedience then
To him, or possibly his love desert
515 Who formed us from the dust, and placed us here
Full to the utmost measure of what bliss
Human desires can seek or apprehend?"
To whom the angel: "Son of Heav'n and earth,
Attend: that thou art happy, owe<sup>o</sup> to God;
520 That thou continu'st such, owe to thyself,
That is, to thy obedience; therein stand.
This was that caution giv'n thee; be advised.
God made thee perfect, not immutable;<sup>o</sup>
And good he made thee, but to persevere
525 He left it in thy power, ordained thy will

By nature free, not overruled by fate
Inextricable, or strict necessity,
Our voluntary service he requires,
Not our necessitated, such with him
530 Finds no acceptance, nor can find, for how Can hearts, not free, be tried whether they serve
Willing or no, who will but what they must
By destiny, and can no other choose?
Myself and all th' angelic host that stand
535 In sight of God enthroned, our happy state
Hold, as you yours, while our obedience holds;
On other surety<sup>o</sup> none; freely we serve,
Because we freely love, as in our will
To love or not; in this we stand or fall:
540 And some are fall'n, to disobedience fall'n,
And so from Heav'n to deepest Hell; O fall
From what high state of bliss into what woe!"
To whom our great progenitor: "Thy words
Attentive, and with more delighted ear,
545 Divine instructor, I have heard, than when Cherubic songs<sup>o</sup> by night from neighboring hills
Aerial music send: nor knew I not<sup>o</sup>
To be both will and deed created free;
Yet that we never shall forget to love
550 Our Maker, and obey him whose command
Single, is yet<sup>o</sup> so just, my constant thoughts
Assured me, and still assure: though what thou tell'st
Hath passed in Heav'n, some doubt within me move,
But more desire to hear, if thou consent,
555 The full relation, which must needs be strange,
Worthy of sacred silence to be heard;
And we have yet large<sup>o</sup> day, for scarce the sun
Hath finished half his journey, and scarce begins
His other half in the great zone of Heav'n."
560 Thus Adam made request, and Raphael

After short pause assenting, thus began:

565     "High matter<sup>1</sup> thou enjoin'st me, O prime of men,
Sad task and hard, for how shall I relate
To human sense th' invisible exploits
Of warring Spirits; how without remorse
The ruin of so many glorious once
And perfect while they stood; how last unfold
The secrets of another world, perhaps
Not lawful to reveal? Yet for thy good
570     This is dispensed, and what surmounts the reach
Of human sense, I shall delineate so,
By lik'ning spiritual to corporal forms,
As may express them best, though what if earth
Be but the shadow of Heav'n, and things therein
575     Each to other like, more than on earth is thought?
      "As yet this world was not, and Chaos wild Reigned where these heav'ns now roll, where earth
      now rests
Upon her center poised, when on a day
(For time, though in eternity, applied
580     To motion, measures all things durable
By present, past, and future)<sup>2</sup> on such day
As Heav'n's great year<sup>3</sup> brings forth, th' empyreal host
Of angels by imperial summons called,
Innumerable before th' Almighty's throne
585     Forthwith from all the ends of Heav'n appeared
Under their hierarchs<sup>o</sup> in orders bright.
Ten thousand thousand ensigns high advanced,
Standards, and gonfalons<sup>o</sup> twixt van and rear
Stream in the air, and for distinction serve 590     Of hierarchies, of orders, and degrees;
Or in their glittering tissues<sup>o</sup> bear emblazed
Holy memorials, acts of zeal and love
Recorded eminent. Thus when in orbs

595 Of circuit<sup>o</sup> inexpressible they stood,
 Orb within orb, the Father Infinite,
 By whom in bliss embosomed sat the Son,
 Amidst as from a flaming mount, whose top
 Brightness had made invisible, thus spake:
 " 'Hear all ye angels, progeny of Light,
 600 Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Powers,
 Hear my decree, which unrevoked shall stand.
 This day I have begot whom I declare
 My only Son, and on this holy hill
 Him have anointed,<sup>4</sup> whom ye now behold
 605 At my right hand; your head I him appoint;
 And by myself have sworn to him shall bow
 All knees in Heav'n, and shall confess him Lord:
 Under his great vicegerent<sup>5</sup> reign abide United as one individual<sup>o</sup> soul
 610 Forever happy: him who<sup>o</sup> disobeys
 Me disobeys, breaks union, and that day
 Cast out from God and blessèd vision, falls
 Into utter<sup>o</sup> darkness, deep engulfed, his place
 Ordained without redemption, without end.'
 615 "So spake th' Omnipotent, and with his words
 All seemed well pleased, all seemed, but were not all.
 That day, as other solemn<sup>o</sup> days, they spent
 In song and dance about the sacred hill,
 Mystical dance, which yonder starry sphere
 620 Of planets and of fixed<sup>o</sup> in all her wheels
 Resembles nearest, mazes intricate,
 Eccentric,<sup>o</sup> intervolved,<sup>o</sup> yet regular
 Then most, when most irregular they seem:
 And in their motions harmony divine
 625 So smooths her charming tones,<sup>6</sup> that God's own ear
 Listens delighted. Evening now approached
 (For we have also our evening and our morn,

We ours for change delectable, not need)
Forthwith from dance to sweet repast they turn
630 Desirous; all in circles as they stood,
Tables are set, and on a sudden piled
With angels' food, and rubied nectar flows
In pearl, in diamond, and massy gold,
Fruit of delicious vines, the growth of Heav'n.
635 On flow'rs reposed, and with fresh flow'rets crowned,
They eat, they drink, and in communion sweet
Quaff immortality and joy, secure
Of surfeit where full measure only bounds
Excess, before th' all-bounteous King, who show'ed
640 With copious hand, rejoicing in their joy.
Now when ambrosial<sup>o</sup> night with clouds exhaled
From that high mount of God, whence light and shade
Spring both, the face of brightest Heav'n had changed
To grateful<sup>o</sup> twilight (for night comes not there 645 In darker veil) and roseate<sup>o</sup> dewes disposed
All but the unsleeping eyes of God to rest,
Wide over all the plain, and wider far
Than all this globous earth in plain outspread,
(Such are the courts of God) th' angelic throng
650 Dispersed in bands and files their camp extend
By living streams among the trees of life,
Pavilions numberless, and sudden reared,
Celestial tabernacles, where they slept
Fanned with cool winds, save those who in their 655 course
Melodious hymns about the sov'reign throne
Alternate all night long: but not so waked
Satan, so call him now, his former name
Is heard no more in Heav'n; he of the first,
If not the first Archangel, great in power,

660 In favor and preeminence, yet fraught
With envy against the Son of God, that day
Honored by his great Father, and proclaimed
Messiah<sup>7</sup> King anointed, could not bear 665 Through pride that sight, and thought himself impaired.
Deep malice thence conceiving and disdain,
Soon as midnight brought on the dusky hour
Friendliest to sleep and silence, he resolved
With all his legions to dislodge,<sup>o</sup> and leave
Unworshipped, unbayed the throne supreme 670 Contemptuous, and his next subordinate<sup>8</sup>
Awak'ning, thus to him in secret spake:
" 'Sleep'st thou companion dear, what sleep can close
Thy eyelids? and remember'st what decree
Of yesterday, so late hath passed the lips
675 Of Heav'n's Almighty. Thou to me thy thoughts
Wast wont,<sup>o</sup> I mine to thee was wont to impart;
Both waking we were one; how then can now
Thy sleep dissent? New laws thou seest imposed;
New laws from him who reigns, new minds<sup>o</sup> may 680 raise
In us who serve, new counsels, to debate
What doubtful may ensue, more in this place
To utter is not safe. Assemble thou
Of all those myriads which we lead the chief;
Tell them that by command, ere yet dim night
685 Her shadowy cloud withdraws, I am to haste,
And all who under me their banners wave,
Homeward with flying march where we possess
The quarters of the north, there to prepare
Fit entertainment to receive our King
690 The great Messiah, and his new commands,
Who speedily through all the hierarchies

Intends to pass triumphant, and give laws.’
“So spake the false Archangel, and infused
695 Bad influence into th’ unwary breast
Of his associate; he together calls,
Or several one by one, the regent powers,
Under him regent, tells, as he was taught,
That the Most High commanding, now ere night,
Now ere dim night had disencumbered Heav’n,
700 The great hierarchal standard was to move;
Tells the suggested<sup>o</sup> cause, and casts between Ambitious words and jealousies, to sound<sup>o</sup>
Or taint integrity; but all obeyed
The wonted signal, and superior voice
705 Of their great potentate<sup>o</sup> for great indeed
His name, and high was his degree in Heav’n;
His count’nance as the morning star that guides
The starry flock, allured them, and with lies
Drew after him the third part of Heav’n’s host:
710 Meanwhile, th’ Eternal Eye, whose sight discerns
Abstrusest<sup>o</sup> thoughts, from forth his holy mount
And from within the golden lamps that burn
Nightly before him, saw without their light
Rebellion rising, saw in whom, how spread
715 Among the sons of morn, what multitudes
Were banded to oppose his high decree;
And smiling to his only Son thus said:
“ ‘Son, thou in whom my glory I behold
In full resplendence, heir of all my might,
720 Nearly it now concerns us to be sure
Of our omnipotence, and with what arms
We mean to hold what anciently we claim
Of deity or empire, such a foe
Is rising, who intends to erect his throne
725 Equal to ours, throughout the spacious north;
Nor so content, hath in his thought to try
In battle, what our power is, or our right.

Let us advise, and to this hazard draw
With speed what force is left, and all employ
730 In our defense, lest unawares we lose
This our high place, our sanctuary, our hill.
"To whom the Son with calm aspect and clear
Lightning divine, ineffable, serene,
Made answer: 'Mighty Father, thou thy foes
735 Justly hast in derision, and secure
Laugh'st at their vain designs and tumults vain,<sup>9</sup>
Matter to me of glory, whom their hate
Illustrates,<sup>o</sup> when they see all regal power
Giv'n me to quell their pride, and in event<sup>o</sup>
740 Know whether I be dextrous to subdue
Thy rebels, or be found the worst in Heav'n.'
"So spake the Son, but Satan with his powers<sup>o</sup>
Far was advanced on wingèd speed, an host
Innumerable as the stars of night,
745 Or stars of morning, dewdrops, which the sun
Impearls on every leaf and every flower.
Regions they passed, the mighty regencies<sup>o</sup>
Of Seraphim and Potentates and Thrones
In their triple degrees, regions to<sup>o</sup> which 750 All thy dominion, Adam, is no more
Than what this garden is to all the earth,
And all the sea, from one entire globose<sup>o</sup>
Stretched into longitude<sup>o</sup> which having passed
At length into the limits<sup>o</sup> of the north
755 They came, and Satan to his royal seat
High on a hill, far blazing, as a mount
Raised on a mount, with pyramids and tow'rs
From diamond quarries hewn, and rocks of gold,
The palace of great Lucifer (so call
760 That structure in the dialect of men Interpreted) which not long after, he Affecting<sup>o</sup> all equality with God,

In imitation of that mount whereon
Messiah was declared in sight of Heav'n,
765 The Mountain of the Congregation called;
For thither he assembled all his train,
Pretending so commanded to consult
About the great reception of their King,
Thither to come, and with calumnious art
770 Of counterfeited truth thus held their ears:
    " 'Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues,
    Powers,
If these magnific titles yet remain
Not merely titular, since by decree
Another now hath to himself engrossed<sup>o</sup>
775 All power, and us eclipsed under the name
Of King anointed, for whom all this haste
Of midnight march, and hurried meeting here,
This only to consult how we may best
With what may be devised of honors new 780 Receive him coming to receive from us
Knee-tribute yet unpaid, prostration vile,
Too much to one, but double how endured,
To one and to his image now proclaimed?
But what if better counsels might erect
785 Our minds and teach us to cast off this yoke?
Will ye submit your necks, and choose to bend
The supple knee? Ye will not, if I trust
To know ye right, or if ye know yourselves
Natives and sons of Heav'n possessed before
790 By none, and if not equal all, yet free,
Equally free; for orders and degrees
Jar not with liberty, but well consist.
Who can in reason then or right assume Monarchy over such as live by right
795 His equals,<sup>1</sup> if in power and splendor less,
In freedom equal? or can introduce

Law and edict on us, who without law
Err not, much less for this to be our Lord,
And look for adoration to th' abuse
800 Of those imperial titles which assert
Our being ordained to govern, not to serve?
"Thus far his bold discourse without control<sup>o</sup>
Had audience, when among the Seraphim
Abdiel,<sup>2</sup> than whom none with more zeal adored
805 The Deity, and divine commands obeyed,
Stood up, and in a flame of zeal severe
The current of his fury thus opposed:
" 'O argument blasphemous, false and proud!
Words which no ear ever to hear in Heav'n
810 Expected, least of all from thee, ingrate,
In place thyself so high above thy peers.
Canst thou with impious obloquy condemn
The just decree of God, pronounced and sworn,
That to his only Son by right endued
815 With regal scepter, every soul in Heav'n
Shall bend the knee, and in that honor due
Confess him rightful King? Unjust thou says't,
Flatly unjust, to bind with laws the free,
And equal over equals to let reign,
820 One over all with unsucceeded<sup>o</sup> power.
Shalt thou give law to God, shalt thou dispute
With him the points of liberty, who made
Thee what thou art, and formed the pow'rs of Heav'n
Such as he pleased, and circumscribed their being?
825 Yet by experience taught we know how good,
And of our good, and of our dignity
How provident he is, how far from thought
To make us less, bent rather to exalt
Our happy state under one head more near 830 United. But to grant it thee unjust,

That equal over equals monarch reign:
Thyself though great and glorious dost thou count,
Or all angelic nature joined in one,
Equal to him begotten Son, by whom 835 As by his Word the mighty Father made
All things, ev'n thee, and all the Spirits of Heav'n
By him created in their bright<sup>o</sup> degrees,
Crowned them with glory, and to their glory named
840 Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Powers,
Essential Powers, nor by his reign obscured,
But more illustrious made, since he the head
One of our number thus reduced becomes,<sup>3</sup>
His laws our laws, all honor to him done
Returns our own. Cease then this impious rage,
845 And tempt not these; but hasten to appease
Th' incensèd Father and th' incensèd Son,
While pardon may be found in time besought.'
"So spake the fervent angel, but his zeal
None seconded, as out of season judged,
850 Or singular and rash, whereat rejoiced
Th' Apostate,<sup>o</sup> and more haughty thus replied.
'That we were formed then say'st thou? and the work
Of secondary hands, by task transferred
From Father to his Son? Strange point and new!
855 Doctrine which we would know whence learnt: who saw
When this creation was? Remember'st thou
Thy making, while the Maker gave thee being?
We know no time when we were not as now;
Know none before us, self-begot, self-raised,
860 By our own quick'ning power, when fatal course<sup>o</sup>
Had circled his full orb, the birth mature
Of this our native Heav'n, ethereal sons.<sup>4</sup>
Our puissance<sup>o</sup> is our own, our own right hand

865 Shall teach us highest deeds, by proof to try
Who is our equal: then thou shalt behold
Whether by supplication we intend
Address, and to begirt th' Almighty throne
Beseeching or besieging. This report,
870 These tidings carry to th' anointed King;
And fly, ere evil intercept thy flight.'
"He said, and as the sound of waters deep
Hoarse murmur echoed to his words applause
Through the infinite host, nor less for that
The flaming Seraph fearless, though alone
875 Encompassed round with foes, thus answered bold:
" 'O alienate from God, O Spirit accurst,
Forsaken of all good; I see thy fall
Determined, and thy hapless crew involved
In this perfidious fraud, contagion spread
880 Both of thy crime and punishment: henceforth
No more be troubled how to quit the yoke
Of God's Messiah; those indulgent laws
Will not be now vouchsafed, other decrees
Against thee are gone forth without recall;
885 That golden scepter which thou didst reject
Is now an iron rod to bruise and break
Thy disobedience. Well thou didst advise,
Yet not for thy advice or threats I fly
These wicked tents devoted, lest the wrath
890 Impendent, raging into sudden flame
Distinguish not: for soon expect to feel
His thunder on thy head, devouring fire.
Then who created thee lamenting learn,
When who can uncreate thee thou shalt know.'
895 "So spake the Seraph Abdiel faithful found,
Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;

900 Nor number, nor example with him wrought
 To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind
 Though single. From amidst them forth he passed,
 Long way through hostile scorn, which he sustained
 Superior, nor of violence feared aught;<sup>o</sup>
 905 And with retorted scorn his back he turned
 On those proud tow'rs to swift destruction doomed."

Endnotes

- Note 1: Rustling leaves and streams ("rills") stirred by Aurora, goddess of the dawn.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Zephyrus is god of the gentle west wind, Flora goddess of flowers.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Adam sings a morning love song (aubade) to Eve, which works variations on Song of Solomon 2:10–12: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. . . . The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come." Compare Satan's serenade (5.38–47), a parody of Adam's aubade and the Song of Solomon. "Prime" (line 21): first hour of the day.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, does envy or some other barrier ("reserve") forbid your being tasted?Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Adam's explanation of the dream (lines 100–116) summarizes the orthodox faculty psychology and dream theory of Milton's time—one among many kinds of knowledge with which unfallen man was endowed.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Adam recalls his own words in 4.411–39.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Probably "angel" as elsewhere, but perhaps God, whose omniscience must encompass knowledge of evil as well as good.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: If not willed (approved of) or not acted on (put to the proof).Return to reference 8

- Note 9: In a variety of styles or forms of speech and song, which harmonize together but are at the same time impromptu, spontaneous, and ecstatic.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Their morning hymn works variations on Psalms 148, 104, and 19, as well as the canticle “Benedicite.”Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Venus, the morning star and (as Hesperus) the evening star.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The planets, unlike the fixed stars, change their relative positions; their motion produces the music of the spheres, audible to unfallen humans.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The fourfold changing relationship of the four elements.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A familiar emblem of matrimony, the elm symbolizing masculine strength, and the vine, feminine fruitfulness, softness, and sweetness; note, however, the matriarchal implications of “adopted clusters” (line 218).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Raphael (in Hebrew, “health of God”) was the adviser of Tobias in winning his wife (see 4.168–71 and note).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Bright spirits burning in love; the Hebrew seraph means “to burn.”Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Cyclades are a circular group of islands in the south Aegean Sea; the two islands seen as “spots” from within the archipelago are Delos (the traditional center but famous for having floated adrift) and Samos (outside the group).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Raphael sails with steady wing, turns at the pole, beats (“fans”) with his wings the yielding (“buxom”) air, and then comes within range of the eagle’s soaring flight.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The phoenix was a mythical, unique (“sole”) bird that lived five hundred years, was consumed by fire, and was reborn from the ashes, which it then carried to the temple of the sun at Heliopolis in Egypt.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Plumage suggesting scale armor.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Mercury, messenger of the gods.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: "Odors": aromatic substances; "cassia": cinnamon; "nard": spikenard; "balm": balsam—all were used to make perfumed ointments.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Raphael's visit to Adam is modeled on Abraham's entertainment of three angels (Genesis 18:1–16).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Revered shape of earth's substance. The name "Adam" signifies red earth.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A great quantity. "Small store": few stored foods.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The "middle shore" includes Pontus, the south coast of the Black Sea, famous for nuts and fruits, and the "Punic" (Carthaginian) coast of North Africa on the Mediterranean, famous for figs; the gardens of Alcinous (next line) are described in the Odyssey 7.113–21 as perpetually fruitful.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Meads, drinks sweetened with honey. "Must": unfermented fruit juice.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Naturally scented, not burned for incense.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Milton uses these angelic titles freely, in the Protestant manner, not as designations of the nine traditional orders (Raphael was called "Seraph" at line 277).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Roman goddess of fruit trees.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: On Mount Ida, Venus, Juno, and Minerva "strove" naked for the title of the most beautiful; Paris awarded the prize (the apple of discord) to Venus, which led to the rape of Helen and the Trojan War.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: See the angel's words to Mary announcing that she would bear a son, Jesus (Luke 1:28): "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women."Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Milton's angels ("intelligential substances") require real food, even as "rational" men do (see below, lines 430–38). As a monist (believer that all creation is of one matter), Milton denied the more common (dualistic) idea that angels are pure spirit, holding instead that they are of a very highly refined material substance.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Three stages in digestion.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Here Raphael describes lunar spots as still-undigested vapors (in keeping with his exposition of the universal need of nourishment); in 1.287–91 he referred to moon spots in Galileo's terms, as landscape features.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A double negative: the moon does exhale such nourishment to other planets.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Milton explains evaporation as the sun dining off moisture exhaled from the oceans.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Ambrosia is the food and nectar the drink of the classical gods; Milton adds "pearly grain" (line 430), like the manna showered on the Israelites in the desert (Exodus 16:14–15).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In common theological use, transubstantiation is the Roman Catholic doctrine that the bread and wine of the Eucharist become the body and blood of Christ. Milton vigorously denied that doctrine, but he describes the angels' transforming of earthly food into their more highly refined spiritual substance as a true transubstantiation. The excess ("what redounds") is exhaled ("transpires") through angelic pores.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Genesis 6:2 tells of the marriage of "the daughters of men" with "the sons of God," usually identified as sons of Seth, but a patristic tradition (alluded to here) identifies them as angels.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Milton held that the universe was created out of Chaos, not out of nothing: the primal matter of Chaos had its origin in God, who subsequently created all things from that matter (see 7.168–73, 210–42). This materialist "monism" denies sharp distinctions between angels and men, spirit and matter: all beings are of one substance, of varying degrees of refinement and life.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Milton's version of the chain of being qualifies natural hierarchy by allowing for movement up or down; beings may become increasingly spiritual ("more spiritous") or increasingly gross (as the rebel angels do), depending on their moral choices—"nearer tending."Return to reference 6
- Note 7:
The plant figure—root, stalk, leaves, flowers, and fruit—provides an illustration of the dynamism of being in the universe and further explains why Raphael can eat the fruit. Such food is then transformed (next lines) into various orders of "spirits"—"vital," "animal," and "intellectual" (fluids in the blood that sustain life, sensation, motion, and finally intellect and its functions, "fancy," "understanding," and "reason"), indicating that the soul is also material.
Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Traditionally, on the dualist assumption that angels are pure spirit and humans a combination of matter and spirit, angelic intuition (immediate apprehension of truth) was absolutely distinguished from human "discourse" of reason (arguing from premises to conclusions). Milton, denying that assumption, makes the distinction only relative, a matter of "degree" (line 490).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A double negative; that is, "I did know."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Raphael's account of the war in Heaven is an epic device, a narrative of past action; it is also a mini-epic itself, with traditional battles, challenges, and single combats. As an "epic" poet treating sacred matter, Raphael confronts a narrative challenge similar to Milton's own.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Countering a long philosophical tradition, Milton asserts the existence of time in Heaven, before the creation of the universe.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Plato and others defined the "great year" as the cycle completed when all the heavenly bodies simultaneously return to the positions they held at the cycle's beginning.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: See Psalm 2:7: "I will declare the decree: . . . Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee." The episode refers to the exaltation of the Son as King, not his actual begetting, since he is elsewhere described as "of all creation first" (3.383) and as God's agent in creating the angels and everything else.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Vice-regent, one appointed by the supreme ruler (here, God) to wield his authority.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The movements of the angels in their dance produce harmony, like those of the planets in the Pythagorean theory of the music of the spheres.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Hebrew, "anointed."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: His original name in Heaven is lost (1.356–63), but he will come to be known as Beelzebub.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: See Psalm 2:4: "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Satan here paraphrases the republican theory against earthly monarchy like that urged by Milton in his Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649); see p. 1328. Abdiel, however, insists (lines 809–41) that the argument from equality cannot pertain to God and the angels.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Hebrew, "servant of God."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Abdiel suggests that the Son's appointment as the angels' king is something like an "incarnation" for them.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Satan's (illogical) argument is that since the angels cannot remember their creation, they created themselves. See Adam's comment on his recollection of origins (8.250–51, 270–79).Return to reference 4

Book 6

The Argument

Raphael continues to relate how Michael and Gabriel were sent forth to battle against Satan and his angels. The first fight described: Satan and his powers retire under night: he calls a council, invents devilish engines, which in the second day's fight put Michael and his angels to some disorder; but they at length pulling up mountains overwhelmed both the force and machines of Satan: yet the tumult not so ending, God on the third day sends Messiah his Son, for whom he had reserved the glory of that victory: he in the power of his Father coming to the place, and causing all his legions to stand still on either side, with his chariot and thunder driving into the midst of his enemies, pursues them unable to resist towards the wall of heaven; which opening, they leap down with horror and confusion into the place of punishment prepared for them in the deep: Messiah returns with triumph to this Father.

All night the dreadless angel<sup>1</sup> unpursued
Through Heav'n's wide champaign<sup>o</sup> held his way, till Morn,
Waked by the circling Hours,<sup>2</sup> with rosy hand
Unbarred the gates of light. There is a cave
Within the mount of God, fast<sup>o</sup> by his throne,
5 Where light and darkness in perpetual round
Lodge and dislodge by turns, which makes through Heav'n
Grateful vicissitude,<sup>o</sup> like day and night;
Light issues forth, and at the other door
Obsequious<sup>o</sup> darkness enters, till her hour
10 To veil the Heav'n, though darkness there might well

Seem twilight here; and now went forth the Morn
Such as in highest Heav'n, arrayed in gold
Empyreal;° from before her vanished night,
Shot through with orient beams: when all the plain
15 Covered with thick embattled° squadrons bright,
Chariots and flaming arms, and fiery steeds
Reflecting blaze on blaze, first met his view:
War he perceived, war in procinct,° and found
Already known what he for news had thought
20 To have reported: gladly then he mixed
Among those friendly Powers who him received
With joy and acclamations loud, that one
That of so many myriads fall'n, yet one
Returned not lost: on to the sacred hill
25 They led him high applauded, and present
Before the seat supreme; from whence a voice:
From midst a golden cloud thus mild was heard.
" 'Servant of God,³ well done, well hast thou fought
The better fight, who single hast maintained
30 Against revolted multitudes the cause
Of truth, in word mightier than they in arms;
And for the testimony of truth hast borne
Universal reproach, far worse to bear
Than violence: for this was all thy care
35 To stand approved in sight of God, though worlds
Judged thee perverse: the easier conquest now
Remains thee, aided by this host of friends,
Back on thy foes more glorious to return
Than scorned thou didst depart, and to subdue
40 By force, who reason for their law refuse,
Right reason° for their law, and for their King
Messiah, who by right of merit reigns.
Go Michael of celestial armies prince,
And thou in military prowess next
45 Gabriel, lead forth to battle these my sons°

Invincible, lead forth my armèd saints
By thousands and by millions ranged for fight;
Equal in number to that godless crew
Rebellious,<sup>4</sup> them with fire and hostile arms
50 Fearless assault, and to the brow of Heav'n
Pursuing drive them out from God and bliss,
Into their place of punishment, the gulf
Of Tartarus,<sup>o</sup> which ready opens wide
His fiery chaos to receive their fall.'
55 "So spake the Sovereign Voice, and clouds began
To darken all the hill, and smoke to roll
In dusky wreaths reluctant<sup>o</sup> flames, the sign
Of wrath awaked: nor with less dread the loud
Ethereal trumpet from on high gan<sup>o</sup> blow:
60 At which command the powers militant,
That stood for Heav'n, in mighty quadrate<sup>5</sup> joined
Of union irresistible, moved on
In silence their bright legions, to the sound
Of instrumental harmony that breathed
65 Heroic ardor to advent'rous deeds
Under their godlike leaders, in the cause
Of God and his Messiah. On they move
Indissolubly firm; nor obvious<sup>o</sup> hill,
Nor strait'ning vale,<sup>6</sup> nor wood, nor stream divides
70 Their perfect ranks; for high above the ground
Their march was, and the passive air upbore
Their nimble tread; as when the total kind
Of birds in orderly array on wing
Came summoned over Eden to receive
75 Their names of thee; so over many a tract
Of Heav'n they marched, and many a province wide
Tenfold the length of this terrene:<sup>o</sup> at last
Far in th' horizon to the north appeared
From skirt to skirt a fiery region, stretched 80 In battailous<sup>o</sup> aspèct, and nearer view

Bristled with upright beams<sup>o</sup> innumerable
 Of rigid spears, and helmets thronged, and shields
 Various, with boastful argument<sup>o</sup> portrayed,
 The banded powers of Satan hasting on 85 With furious expedition;<sup>o</sup> for they weened<sup>o</sup>
 That selfsame day by fight, or by surprise
 To win the mount of God, and on his throne
 To set the envier of his state, the proud
 Aspirer, but their thoughts proved fond<sup>o</sup> and vain
 90 In the mid-way: though strange to us it seemed
 At first, that angel should with angel war,
 And in fierce hosting<sup>z</sup> meet, who wont<sup>o</sup> to meet
 So oft in festivals of joy and love
 Unanimous, as sons of one great Sire
 95 Hymning th' Eternal Father: but the shout
 Of battle now began, and rushing sound
 Of onset ended soon each milder thought.
 High in the midst exalted as a god
 Th' Apostate in his sun-bright chariot sat
 100 Idol of majesty divine, enclosed
 With flaming Cherubim, and golden shields;
 Then lighted from his gorgeous throne, for now
 'Twixt host<sup>o</sup> and host but narrow space was left,
 A dreadful interval, and front to front<sup>o</sup>
 105 Presented stood in terrible array
 Of hideous length: before the cloudy van,<sup>o</sup>
 On the rough edge of battle<sup>o</sup> ere it joined,
 Satan with vast and haughty strides advanced,
 Came tow'ring, armed in adamant and gold;
 110 Abdiel that sight endured not, where he stood
 Among the mightiest, bent on highest deeds,
 And thus his own undaunted heart explores:
 " 'O Heav'n! that such resemblance of the Highest Should yet remain, where faith and realty<sup>o</sup>

Remain not; wherefore should not strength and might
 There fail where virtue fails, or weakest prove
 Where boldest; though to sight<sup>o</sup> unconquerable?
 His puissance,<sup>o</sup> trusting in th' Almighty's aid,
 I mean to try, whose reason I have tried<sup>o</sup>
 120 Unsound and false; nor is it aught but just,
 That he who in debate of truth hath won,
 Should win in arms, in both disputes alike
 Victor; though brutish that contést and foul,
 When reason hath to deal with force, yet so
 125 Most reason is that reason overcome.'
 "So pondering, and from his armèd peers
 Forth stepping opposite, halfway he met
 His daring foe, at this prevention<sup>o</sup> more
 Incensed, and thus securely<sup>o</sup> him defied: 130 " 'Proud, art thou met? Thy hope was to have reached
 The height of thy aspiring unopposed,
 The throne of God unguarded, and his side
 Abandoned at the terror of thy power
 Or potent tongue; fool, not to think how vain
 135 Against the Omnipotent to rise in arms;
 Who out of smallest things could without end
 Have raised incessant armies to defeat
 Thy folly; or with solitary hand
 Reaching beyond all limit at one blow
 140 Unaided could have finished thee, and whelmed
 Thy legions under darkness; but thou seest
 All are not of thy train; there be<sup>o</sup> who faith
 Prefer, and piety<sup>o</sup> to God, though then
 To thee not visible, when I alone
 145 Seemed in thy world erroneous to dissent
 From all: my sect<sup>8</sup> thou seest, now learn too late
 How few sometimes may know, when thousand err.'

"Whom the grand Foe with scornful eye askance
 Thus answered. 'Ill for thee, but in wished hour
 150 Of my revenge, first sought for thou return'st
 From flight, seditious angel, to receive
 Thy merited reward, the first assay
 Of this right hand provoked, since first that tongue
 Inspired with contradiction durst oppose
 155 A third part of the gods, in synod met
 Their deities to assert, who while they feel Vigor divine within them, can allow Omnipotence to none. But well thou com'st
 Before thy fellows, ambitious to win
 160 From me some plume, that thy success<sup>9</sup> may show
 Destruction to the rest: this pause between (Unanswered lest thou boast)<sup>1</sup> to let thee know;
 At first I thought that liberty and Heav'n
 To heav'nly souls had been all one;<sup>o</sup> but now
 165 I see that most through sloth had rather serve,
 Minist'ring Spirits, trained up in feast and song;
 Such hast thou armed, the minstrelsy<sup>2</sup> of Heav'n,
 Servility<sup>o</sup> with freedom to contend,
 As both their deeds compared this day shall prove.'
 170 "To whom in brief thus Abdiel stern replied:
 'Apostate, still thou err'st, nor end wilt find
 Of erring, from the path of truth remote:
 Unjustly thou deprav'st<sup>o</sup> it with the name
 Of servitude to serve whom God ordains,
 175 Or nature; God and nature bid the same,
 When he who rules is worthiest, and excels
 Them whom he governs. This is servitude,
 To serve th' unwise, or him who hath rebelled
 Against his worthier, as thine now serve thee,
 180 Thyself not free, but to thyself enthralled;<sup>3</sup>
 Yet lewdly<sup>o</sup> dar'st our minist'ring upbraid.
 Reign thou in Hell thy kingdom, let me serve

In Heav'n God ever blest, and his divine
Behests obey, worthiest to be obeyed;
185 Yet chains in Hell, not realms expect: meanwhile
From me returned, as erst<sup>o</sup> thou saidst, from flight,
This greeting on thy impious crest receive.'
"So saying, a noble stroke he lifted high,
Which hung not, but so swift with tempest fell
190 On the proud crest of Satan, that no sight,
Nor motion of swift thought, less could his shield
Such ruin intercept: ten paces huge
He back recoiled; the tenth on bended knee
His massy spear upstayed; as if on earth
195 Winds under ground or waters forcing way
Sidelong, had pushed a mountain from his seat
Half sunk with all his pines. Amazement seized
The rebel Thrones,<sup>4</sup> but greater rage to see
Thus foiled their mightiest: ours joy filled, and shout,
200 Presage of victory and fierce desire
Of battle: whereat Michaël bid sound
Th' Archangel trumpet; through the vast of Heav'n
It sounded, and the faithful armies rung
Hosanna to the Highest: nor stood at gaze
205 The adverse legions, nor less hideous joined
The horrid shock: now storming fury rose,
And clamor such as heard in Heav'n till now
Was never, arms on armor clashing brayed<sup>5</sup>
Horrible discord, and the madding<sup>o</sup> wheels
210 Of brazen chariots raged; dire was the noise
Of conflict; overhead the dismal<sup>o</sup> hiss
Of fiery darts in flaming volleys flew,
And flying vaulted either host with fire.
So under fiery cope<sup>o</sup> together rushed
215 Both battles main,<sup>6</sup> with ruinous assault
And inextinguishable rage; all Heav'n
Resounded, and had earth been then, all earth

Had to her center shook. What wonder? when Millions of fierce encount'ring angels fought
220 On either side, the least of whom could wield
These elements,<sup>7</sup> and arm him with the force
Of all their regions: how much more of power
Army against army numberless to raise
Dreadful combustion<sup>o</sup> warring, and disturb,
225 Though not destroy, their happy native seat;
Had not th' Eternal King Omnipotent
From his stronghold of Heav'n high overruled
And limited their might; though numbered such
As each divided legion might have seemed 230 A numerous host, in strength each armèd hand
A legion; led in fight, yet leader seemed
Each warrior single as in chief,<sup>8</sup> expert
When to advance, or stand, or turn the sway<sup>o</sup>
Of battle, open when, and when to close
235 The ridges<sup>o</sup> of grim war; no thought of flight,
None of retreat, no unbecoming deed
That argued fear; each on himself relied,
As<sup>o</sup> only in his arm the moment<sup>9</sup> lay
Of victory; deeds of eternal fame
240 Were done, but infinite: for wide was spread
That war and various; sometimes on firm ground
A standing fight, then soaring on main<sup>o</sup> wing
Tormented<sup>o</sup> all the air; all air seemed then
Conflicting fire: long time in even scale
245 The battle hung; till Satan, who that day
Prodigious power had shown, and met in arms
No equal, ranging through the dire attack
Of fighting Seraphim confused, at length
Saw where the sword of Michael smote, and felled 250 Squadrons at once; with huge two-handed sway
Brandished aloft the horrid edge came down
Wide-wasting; such destruction to withstand

He hasted, and opposed the rocky orb
Of tenfold adamant, his ample shield<sup>1</sup>
255 A vast circumference: at his approach
The great Archangel from his warlike toil
Surceased, and glad as hoping here to end
Intestine war<sup>o</sup> in Heav'n, the Arch-Foe subdued
Or captive dragged in chains, with hostile frown
260 And visage all inflamed first thus began:
    " 'Author of evil, unknown till thy revolt,
    Unnamed in Heav'n, now plenteous, as thou seest
    These acts of hateful strife, hateful to all,
    Though heaviest by just measure on thyself
265 And thy adherents: how hast thou disturbed
    Heav'n's blessèd peace, and into nature brought Misery, uncreated till the crime
    Of thy rebellion! how hast thou instilled
    Thy malice into thousands, once upright
270 And faithful, now proved false! But think not here
    To trouble holy rest; Heav'n casts thee out
    From all her confines. Heav'n the seat of bliss
    Brooks<sup>o</sup> not the works of violence and war.
    Hence then, and evil go with thee along
275 Thy offspring, to the place of evil, Hell,
    Thou and thy wicked crew; there mingle<sup>o</sup> broils,
    Ere this avenging sword begin thy doom,
    Or some more sudden vengeance winged from God
    Precipitate thee with augmented pain.'
280     " So spake the Prince of Angels; to whom thus
    The Adversary: 'Nor think thou with wind
    Of airy threats to awe whom yet with deeds
    Thou canst not. Hast thou turned the least of these
    To flight, or if to fall, but that they rise
285 Unvanquished, easier to transact with me
    That thou shouldst hope, imperious, and with threats
    To chase me hence?<sup>2</sup> Err not that so shall end

The strife which thou call'st evil, but we style
The strife of glory: which we mean to win,
290 Or turn this Heav'n itself into the Hell
Thou fablest, here however to dwell free,
If not to reign: meanwhile thy utmost force,
And join him named Almighty to thy aid,
I fly not, but have sought thee far and nigh.'
295 "They ended parle,<sup>o</sup> and both addressed<sup>o</sup> for fight
Unspeakable; for who, though with the tongue
Of angels, can relate, or to what things
Likened on earth conspicuous, that may lift
Human imagination to such height
300 Of godlike power: for likest gods they seemed,
Stood they or moved, in stature, motion, arms
Fit to decide the empire of great Heav'n.
Now waved their fiery swords, and in the air
Made horrid circles; two broad suns their shields
305 Blazed opposite, while Expectation stood<sup>3</sup>
In horror; from each hand with speed retired
Where erst<sup>o</sup> was thickest fight, th' angelic throng,
And left large field, unsafe within the wind
Of such commotion, such as to set forth
310 Great things by small, if nature's concord broke,
Among the constellations war were sprung,
Two planets rushing from aspect malign
Of fiercest opposition in midsky,
Should combat, and their jarring spheres confound.<sup>4</sup>
315 Together both with next to almighty arm,
Uplifted imminent one stroke they aimed
That might determine,<sup>o</sup> and not need repeat,<sup>o</sup>
As not of power,<sup>5</sup> at once; nor odds<sup>o</sup> appeared
In might or swift prevention;<sup>o</sup> but the sword
320 Of Michael from the armory of God
Was giv'n him tempered so, that neither keen
Nor solid might resist that edge: it met

The sword of Satan with steep force to smite
Descending, and in half cut sheer, nor stayed,
325 But with swift wheel reverse, deep ent'ring shared<sup>o</sup>
All his right side; then Satan first knew pain,
And writhed him to and fro convolved;<sup>o</sup> so sore
The griding<sup>o</sup> sword with discontinuous<sup>o</sup> wound
Passed through him, but th' ethereal substance
330 closed
Not long divisible, and from the gash
A stream of nectarous humor issuing flowed
Sanguine,<sup>o</sup> such as celestial Spirits may bleed,
And all his armor stained erewhile so bright.
Forthwith on all sides to his aid was run
335 By angels many and strong, who interposed
Defense, while others bore him on their shields
Back to his chariot, where it stood retired
From off the files of war; there they him laid
Gnashing for anguish and despite and shame
340 To find himself not matchless, and his pride
Humbled by such rebuke, so far beneath
His confidence to equal God in power.
Yet soon he healed; for Spirits that live throughout
Vital in every part, not as frail man
345 In entrails, heart or head, liver or reins,<sup>o</sup>
Cannot but by annihilating die;
Nor in their liquid texture mortal wound
Receive, no more than can the fluid air:
All heart they live, all head, all eye, all ear,
350 All intellect, all sense, and as they please,
They limb themselves,<sup>6</sup> and color, shape, or size
Assume, as likes<sup>o</sup> them best, condense or rare.
"Meanwhile in other parts like deeds deserved
Memorial, where the might of Gabriel fought,
355 And with fierce ensigns pierced the deep array
Of Moloch furious king,<sup>7</sup> who him defied,

And at his chariot wheels to drag him bound
Threatened, nor from the Holy One of Heav'n
Refrained his tongue blasphemous; but anon
360 Down clov'n to the waist, with shattered arms
And uncouth<sup>o</sup> pain fled bellowing. On each wing
Uriel and Raphael his vaunting foe,
Though huge, and in a rock of diamond armed,
Vanquished Adramelech, and Asmadai,<sup>8</sup>
365 Two potent Thrones, that to be less than gods Disdained, but meaner thoughts learned in their flight,
Mangled with ghastly wounds through plate and mail.
Nor stood unmindful Abdiel to annoy<sup>o</sup>
The atheist<sup>o</sup> crew, but with redoubled blow
370 Ariel and Arioch, and the violence
Of Ramiel<sup>9</sup> scorched and blasted overthrew.
I might relate of thousands, and their names
Eternize here on earth; but those elect
Angels contented with their fame in Heav'n
375 Seek not the praise of men: the other sort
In might though wondrous and in acts of war,
Nor of renown less eager, yet by doom
Canceled from Heav'n and sacred memory,
Nameless in dark oblivion let them dwell.
380 For strength from truth divided and from just,
Illaudable,<sup>o</sup> naught merits but dispraise
And ignominy, yet to glory aspires
Vainglorious, and through infamy seeks fame:
Therefore eternal silence be their doom.
385 "And now their mightiest quelled, the battle swerved,<sup>1</sup>
With many an inroad gored; deformèd rout
Entered, and foul disorder; all the ground
With shivered armor strown, and on a heap

390 Chariot and charioteer lay overturned
And fiery foaming steeds; what<sup>o</sup> stood, recoiled
O'erwearied, through the faint Satanic host
Defensive scarce,<sup>2</sup> or with pale fear surprised,<sup>o</sup>
Then first with fear surprised and sense of pain
Fled ignominious, to such evil brought 395 By sin of disobedience, till that hour
Not liable to fear or flight or pain.
Far otherwise th' inviolable saints
In cubic phalanx<sup>o</sup> firm advanced entire,
Invulnerable, impenetrably armed:
400 Such high advantages their innocence
Gave them above their foes, not to have sinned,
Not to have disobeyed; in fight they stood
Unwearied, unobnoxious<sup>o</sup> to be pained
By wound, though from their place by violence 405 moved.
"Now night her course began, and over Heav'n
Inducing darkness, grateful truce imposed,
And silence on the odious din of war:
Under her cloudy covert both retired,
Victor and vanquished: on the foughten field
410 Michaël and his angels prevalent<sup>o</sup>
Encamping, placed in guard their watches round,
Cherubic waving fires: on th' other part
Satan with his rebellious disappeared,
Far in the dark dislodged,<sup>o</sup> and void of rest,
415 His potentates to council called by night;
And in the midst thus undismayed began:
" 'O now in danger tried, now known in arms
Not to be overpowered, companions dear,
Found worthy not of liberty alone,
420 Too mean pretense,<sup>o</sup> but what we more affect,<sup>3</sup>
Honor, dominion, glory, and renown,
Who have sustained one day in doubtful<sup>o</sup> fight,

(And if one day, why not eternal days?)
 What Heaven's Lord had powerfulest to send 425 Against us from about his throne, and judged
 Sufficient to subdue us to his will,
 But proves not so: then fallible, it seems,
 Of future<sup>o</sup> we may deem him, though till now
 Omniscient thought. True is, less firmly armed,
 430 Some disadvantage we endured and pain,
 Till now not known, but known as soon contemned,<sup>4</sup>
 Since now we find this our empyreal form
 Incapable of mortal injury
 Imperishable, and though pierced with wound,
 435 Soon closing, and by native vigor healed.
 Of evil then so small as easy think
 The remedy; perhaps more valid<sup>o</sup> arms,
 Weapons more violent, when next we meet,
 May serve to better us, and worse<sup>o</sup> our foes,
 440 Or equal what between us made the odds,
 In nature none: if other hidden cause
 Left them superior, while we can preserve
 Unhurt our minds, and understanding sound,
 Due search and consultation will disclose.'
 445 "He sat; and in th' assembly next upstood
 Nisroch,<sup>5</sup> of Principalities the prime;
 As one he stood escaped from cruel fight,
 Sore toiled, his riven arms to havoc hewn,<sup>o</sup>
 And cloudy in aspect thus answering spake:
 450 'Deliverer from new lords, leader to free
 Enjoyment of our right as gods; yet hard
 For gods, and too unequal work we find
 Against unequal arms to fight in pain,
 Against unpained, impassive;<sup>6</sup> from which evil
 455 Ruin must needs ensue; for what avails
 Valor or strength, though matchless, quelled with pain

Which all subdues, and makes remiss<sup>o</sup> the hands
Of mightiest. Sense of pleasure we may well
Spare out of life perhaps, and not repine,
460 But live content, which is the calmest life:
But pain is perfect misery, the worst
Of evils, and excessive, overturns
All patience. He who therefore can invent
With what more forcible we may offend<sup>o</sup>
465 Our yet unwounded enemies, or arm
Ourselves with like defense, to me<sup>o</sup> deserves
No less than for deliverance what we owe.<sup>7</sup>
    "Whereto with look composed Satan replied.
'Not uninvented that, which thou aright
470 Believ'st so main<sup>o</sup> to our success, I bring;
Which of us who beholds the bright surface
Of this ethereous mold<sup>o</sup> whereon we stand,
This continent of spacious Heav'n, adorned
With plant, fruit, flow'r ambrosial, gems and gold,
475 Whose eye so superficially surveys
These things, as not to mind<sup>o</sup> from whence they grow
Deep underground, materials dark and crude,
Of spiritous and fiery spume,<sup>o</sup> till touched
With Heav'n's ray, and tempered they shoot forth
480 So beauteous, op'ning to the ambient<sup>o</sup> light.
These in their dark nativity the deep
Shall yield us, pregnant with infernal<sup>o</sup> flame,
Which into hollow engines<sup>o</sup> long and round
Thick-rammed, at th' other bore<sup>8</sup> with touch of fire
485 Dilated and infuriate<sup>o</sup> shall send forth
From far with thund'ring noise among our foes
Such implements of mischief as shall dash
To pieces, and o'erwhelm whatever stands
Adverse, that they shall fear we have disarmed
490 The Thunderer of his only<sup>o</sup> dreaded bolt.

Nor long shall be our labor, yet ere dawn,
Effect shall end our wish. Meanwhile revive;
Abandon fear; to strength and counsel joined
Think nothing hard, much less to be despaired.'
495 He ended, and his words their drooping cheer<sup>o</sup>
Enlightened, and their languished hope revived.
Th' invention all admired,<sup>o</sup> and each, how he
To be th' inventor missed, so easy it seemed Once found, which yet unfound most would have 500 thought
Impossible: yet haply<sup>o</sup> of thy race
In future days, if malice should abound,
Someone intent on mischief, or inspired
With dev'lish machination might devise
Like instrument to plague the sons of men
505 For sin, on war and mutual slaughter bent.
Forthwith from council to the work they flew,
None arguing stood, innumerable hands
Were ready, in a moment up they turned Wide the celestial soil, and saw beneath
510 Th' originals<sup>o</sup> of nature in their crude
Conception; sulphurous and nitrous foam<sup>9</sup>
They found, they mingled, and with subtle art,
Concocted<sup>o</sup> and adjusted<sup>o</sup> they reduced
To blackest grain, and into store conveyed:
515 Part hidden veins dug up (nor hath this earth Entrails unlike) of mineral and stone,
Whereof to found<sup>o</sup> their engines and their balls
Of missive<sup>o</sup> ruin; part incentive<sup>o</sup> reed
Provide, pernicious<sup>o</sup> with one touch to fire.
520 So all ere day-spring,<sup>o</sup> under conscious<sup>1</sup> night
Secret they finished, and in order set,
With silent circumspection unespied.
Now when fair morn orient in Heav'n appeared
Up rose the victor angels, and to arms
525

The matin<sup>o</sup> trumpet sung: in arms they stood
 Of golden panoply, refulgent<sup>o</sup> host,
 Soon banded; others from the dawning hills
 Looked round, and scouts each coast light-armèd scour,
 Each quarter, to descry the distant foe,
 530 Where lodged, or whither fled, or if for fight,
 In motion or in alt:<sup>o</sup> him soon they met
 Under spread ensigns moving nigh, in slow
 But firm battalion; back with speediest sail
 Zophiel,<sup>2</sup> of Cherubim the swiftest wing, 535 Came flying, and in mid-air aloud thus cried:
 " 'Arm, warriors, arm for fight, the foe at hand,
 Whom fled we thought, will save us long pursuit
 This day, fear not his flight; so thick a cloud
 He comes, and settled in his face I see
 540 Sad<sup>o</sup> resolution and secure:<sup>o</sup> let each
 His adamant<sup>o</sup>ine coat gird well, and each
 Fit well his helm, gripe fast his orbèd shield,
 Borne ev'n<sup>o</sup> or high, for this day will pour down,
 If I conjecture<sup>o</sup> aught, no drizzling shower,
 545 But rattling storm of arrows barbed with fire.'
 So warned he them aware themselves, and soon
 In order, quit of all impediment;<sup>o</sup>
 Instant without disturb<sup>o</sup> they took alarm,
 And onward move embattled;<sup>o</sup> when behold
 550 Not distant far the heavy pace the foe
 Approaching gross<sup>o</sup> and huge; in hollow cube
 Training<sup>o</sup> his devilish enginry, impaled<sup>o</sup>
 On every side with shadowing squadrons deep,
 To hide the fraud. At interview<sup>o</sup> both stood 555 A while, but suddenly at head appeared
 Satan: and thus was heard commanding loud:
 " 'Vanguard, to right and left the front unfold;
 That all may see who hate us, how we seek

560 Peace and composure,<sup>o</sup> and with open breast
Stand ready to receive them, if they like
Our overture,<sup>3</sup> and turn not back perverse;
But that I doubt, however witness Heaven,
Heav'n witness thou anon, while we discharge
565 Freely our part: ye who appointed stand
Do as you have in charge, and briefly touch
What we propound, and loud that all may hear.
"So scoffing in ambiguous words, he scarce
Had ended; when to right and left the front
570 Divided, and to either flank retired.
Which to our eyes discovered new and strange,
A triple-mounted<sup>o</sup> row of pillars laid
On wheels (for like to pillars most they seemed
Or hollowed bodies made of oak or fir
575 With branches lopped, in wood or mountain felled)
Brass, iron, stony mold,<sup>o</sup> had not their mouths
With hideous orifice gaped on us wide,
Portending hollow truce; at each behind
A Seraph stood, and in his hand a reed
580 Stood waving tipped with fire; while we suspense,<sup>o</sup>
Collected stood within our thoughts amused,<sup>o</sup>
Not long, for sudden all at once their reeds
Put forth, and to a narrow vent applied
With nicest<sup>o</sup> touch. Immediate in a flame,
But soon obscured with smoke, all Heav'n appeared, 585 From those deep-throated engines belched,<sup>4</sup> whose roar
Emboweled<sup>o</sup> with outrageous noise the air,
And all her entrails tore, disgorging foul
Their devilish glut, chained<sup>5</sup> thunderbolts and hail
Of iron globes, which on the victor host
590 Leveled, with such impetuous fury smote,
That whom they hit, none on their feet might stand,
Though standing else as rocks, but down they fell

By thousands, Angel on Archangel rolled,
 The sooner for their arms; unarmed they might 595 Have easily as Spirits evaded swift
 By quick contraction or remove; but now
 Foul dissipation<sup>o</sup> followed and forced rout;
 Nor served it to relax their serried files.<sup>6</sup>
 What should they do? If on they rushed, repulse 600 Repeated, and indecent<sup>o</sup> overthrow
 Doubled, would render them yet more despised,
 And to their foes a laughter; for in view
 Stood ranked of Seraphim another row
 In posture to displode<sup>o</sup> their second dire<sup>o</sup>
 605 Of thunder: back defeated to return
 They worse abhorred. Satan beheld their plight,
 And to his mates thus in derision called:
 " 'O friends, why come not on these victors proud?
 Erewhile they fierce were coming, and when we,
 610 To entertain them fair with open front<sup>o</sup>
 And breast,<sup>o</sup> (what could we more?) propounded<sup>Z</sup> terms
 Of composition, straight they changed their minds,
 Flew off, and into strange vagaries<sup>o</sup> fell,
 As they would dance, yet for a dance they seemed 615 Somewhat extravagant and wild, perhaps
 For joy of offering peace: but I suppose
 If our proposals once again were heard
 We should compel them to a quick result.'
 "To whom thus Belial in like gamesome mood:
 620 'Leader, the terms we sent were terms of weight,
 Of hard contents, and full of force urged home,
 Such as we might perceive amused them<sup>8</sup> all,
 And stumbled many: who receives them right,
 Had need from head to foot well understand;
 625 Not understood, this gift they have besides,
 They show us when our foes walk not upright."

“So they among themselves in pleasant<sup>o</sup> vein
Stood scoffing, heightened in their thoughts beyond
All doubt of victory, Eternal Might 630 To match with their inventions they presumed
So easy, and of his thunder made a scorn,
And all his host derided, while they<sup>o</sup> stood
A while in trouble; but they stood not long,
Rage prompted them at length, and found them
635 arms
Against such hellish mischief fit to oppose.
Forthwith (behold the excellence, the power,
Which God hath in his mighty angels placed)
Their arms away they threw, and to the hills
(For earth hath this variety from Heav’n
640 Of pleasure situate in hill and dale)
Light as the lightning glimpse they ran, they flew,
From their foundations loos’ning to and fro
They plucked the seated hills with all their load,<sup>9</sup>
Rocks, waters, woods, and by the shaggy tops
645 Uplifting bore them in their hands: amaze,<sup>o</sup>
Be sure, and terror seized the rebel host,
When coming towards them so dread they saw
The bottom of the mountains upward turned,
Till on those cursèd engines’ triple-row
650 They saw them whelmed, and all their confidence
Under the weight of mountains buried deep,
Themselves invaded<sup>o</sup> next, and on their heads
Main<sup>o</sup> promontories flung, which in the air
Came shadowing, and oppressed<sup>o</sup> whole legions 655 armed.
Their armor helped their harm, crushed in and bruised
Into their substance pent,<sup>o</sup> which wrought them pain
Implacable, and many a dolorous groan,
Long struggling underneath, ere they could wind

660 Out of such prison, though Spirits of purest light,
Purest at first, now gross by sinning grown.
The rest in imitation to like arms
Betook them, and the neighboring hills uptore;
So hills amid the air encountered hills
665 Hurl'd to and fro with jaculation<sup>o</sup> dire,
That underground they fought in dismal shade;
Infernal noise; war seemed a civil<sup>o</sup> game
To<sup>o</sup> this uproar; horrid confusion heaped
Upon confusion rose: and now all Heav'n
670 Had gone to wrack, with ruin overspread,
Had not th' Almighty Father where he sits
Shrined in his sanctuary of Heav'n secure,
Consulting<sup>o</sup> on the sum of things, foreseen
This tumult, and permitted all, advised:<sup>o</sup>
That his great purpose he might so fulfill,
675 To honor his anointed Son avenged
Upon his enemies, and to declare
All power on him transferred: whence to his Son
Th' assessor<sup>1</sup> of his throne he thus began:
    " 'Effulgence<sup>o</sup> of my glory, Son beloved,
680 Son in whose face invisible is beheld
Visibly,<sup>2</sup> what by Deity I am,
And in whose hand what by decree I do,
Second Omnipotence,<sup>3</sup> two days are passed,
Two days, as we compute the days of Heav'n,
685 Since Michael and his powers went forth to tame
These disobedient; sore hath been their fight,
As likeliest was, when two such foes met armed;
For to themselves I left them, and thou know'st,
Equal in their creation they were formed,
690 Save what sin hath impaired, which yet hath wrought
Insensibly,<sup>o</sup> for I suspend their doom;
Whence in perpetual fight they needs must last

Endless, and no solution will be found:
 War wearied hath performed what war can do,
 695 And to disordered rage let loose the reins,
 With mountains as with weapons armed, which makes
 Wild work in Heav'n, and dangerous to the main.<sup>o</sup>
 Two days are therefore passed, the third is thine;
 For thee I have ordained it, and thus far
 700 Have suffered,<sup>o</sup> that the glory may be thine
 Of ending this great war, since none but thou
 Can end it. Into thee such virtue and grace
 Immense I have transfused, that all may know
 In Heav'n and Hell thy power above compare,
 705 And this perverse commotion governed thus,
 To manifest thee worthiest to be heir
 Of all things, to be heir and to be King
 By sacred unction,<sup>o</sup> thy deserved right.
 Go then thou mightiest in thy Father's might,
 710 Ascend my chariot, guide the rapid wheels
 That shake Heav'n's basis, bring forth all my war,<sup>o</sup>
 My bow and thunder, my almighty arms
 Gird on, and sword upon thy puissant thigh;
 Pursue these sons of darkness, drive them out
 715 From all Heav'n's bounds into the utter<sup>o</sup> deep:
 There let them learn, as likes them, to despise
 God and Messiah his anointed<sup>4</sup> King.'
 "He said, and on his Son with rays direct Shone full, he all his Father full expressed 720 Ineffably<sup>o</sup> into his face received,
 And thus the Filial Godhead answering spake:
 " 'O Father, O Supreme of heav'nly Thrones,
 First, highest, holiest, best, thou always seek'st
 To glorify thy Son, I always thee,
 725 As is most just; this I my glory account,
 My exaltation, and my whole delight,

That thou in me well pleased, declar'st thy will Fulfilled, which to fulfill is all my bliss.
Scepter and power, thy giving, I assume,
730 And gladlier shall resign, when in the end
Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee
Forever, and in me all whom thou lov'st:
But whom thou hat'st, I hate, and can put on Thy terrors, as I put thy mildness on,
735 Image of thee in all things; and shall soon,
Armed with thy might, rid Heav'n of these rebelled,
To their prepared ill mansion driven down
To chains of darkness, and th' undying worm,
That from thy just obedience could revolt,
740 Whom to obey is happiness entire.
Then shall thy saints unmixed, and from th' impure
Far separate, circling thy holy mount
Unfeignèd hallelujahs to thee sing,
Hymns of high praise, and I among them chief.'
745 So said, he o'er his scepter bowing, rose
From the right hand of Glory where he sat,
And the third sacred morn began to shine
Dawning through Heav'n: forth rushed with whirlwind sound
The chariot of Paternal Deity,
750 Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,
Itself instinct with <sup>o</sup> spirit, but convoyed
By four Cherubic shapes, four faces each<sup>5</sup>
Had wondrous, as with stars their bodies all
And wings were set with eyes, with eyes the wheels
755 Of beryl, and careering fires between;<sup>6</sup>
Over their heads a crystal firmament,
Whereon a sapphire throne, inlaid with pure
Amber, and colors of the show'ry arch.<sup>o</sup>
He in celestial panoply all armed 760 Of radiant urim,<sup>7</sup> work divinely wrought,

Ascended, at his right hand Victory
Sat eagle-winged, beside him hung his bow
And quiver with three-bolted thunder stored,<sup>8</sup>
And from about him fierce effusion<sup>o</sup> rolled 765 Of smoke and bickering<sup>o</sup> flame, and sparkles dire;
Attended with ten thousand thousand saints,
He onward came, far off his coming shone,
And twenty thousand<sup>9</sup> (I their number heard)
Chariots of God, half on each hand were seen:
770 He on the wings of Cherub rode sublime<sup>o</sup>
On the crystalline sky, in sapphire throned,
Illustrious<sup>o</sup> far and wide, but by his own
First seen: them unexpected joy surprised,
When the great ensign of Messiah blazed
775 Aloft by angels borne, his sign in Heav'n:
Under whose conduct Michael soon reduced<sup>o</sup>
His army, circumfused<sup>o</sup> on either wing,
Under their Head embodied all in one.
Before him Power Divine his way prepared;
780 At his command the uprooted hills retired
Each to his place, they heard his voice and went Obsequious,<sup>o</sup> Heav'n his wonted face renewed,
And with fresh flow'rets hill and valley smiled.
This saw his hapless foes but stood obdured,<sup>o</sup>
785 And to rebellious fight rallied their powers
Insensate, hope conceiving from despair.
In heav'nly Spirits could such perverseness dwell?
But to convince the proud what signs avail,
Or wonders move th' obdurate to relent?
790 They hardened more by what might most reclaim,
Grieving<sup>o</sup> to see his glory, at the sight
Took envy, and aspiring to his height,
Stood re-embattled<sup>1</sup> fierce, by force or fraud
Weening<sup>o</sup> to prosper, and at length prevail
795 Against God and Messiah, or to fall

In universal ruin last, and now
To final battle drew; disdaining flight,
Or faint retreat; when the great Son of God
To all his host on either hand thus spake:
800     " 'Stand still in bright array ye saints, here stand
Ye angels armed, this day from battle rest;<sup>2</sup>
Faithful hath been your warfare, and of God
Accepted, fearless in his righteous cause,
And as ye have received, so have ye done
805     Invincibly; but of this cursed crew
The punishment to other hand belongs,
Vengeance is his,<sup>3</sup> or whose he sole appoints;
Number to this day's work is not ordained
Nor multitude, stand only and behold
810     God's indignation on these godless poured
By me, not you but me they have despised,
Yet envied; against me is all their rage,
Because the Father, t' whom in Heav'n supreme Kingdom and power and glory appertains,
815     Hath honored me according to his will.
Therefore to me their doom he hath assigned;
That they may have their wish, to try with me
In battle which the stronger proves, they all,
Or I alone against them, since by strength
820     They measure all, of other excellence
Not emulous,<sup>o</sup> nor care who them excels;
Nor other strife with them do I vouchsafe.'<sup>o</sup>
      " So spake the Son, and into terror changed
His count'nance too severe to be beheld
825     And full of wrath bent on his enemies.
At once the Four<sup>4</sup> spread out their starry wings
With dreadful shade contiguous, and the orbs
Of his fierce chariot rolled, as with the sound
Of torrent floods, or of a numerous host.
830     He on his impious foes right onward drove,

Gloomy as night; under his burning wheels
The steadfast empyrean shook throughout,
All but the throne itself of God. Full soon
Among them he arrived; in his right hand
835 Grasping ten thousand thunders, which he sent
Before him, such as in their souls infixed
Plagues; they astonished<sup>o</sup> all resistance lost,
All courage; down their idle weapons dropped;
O'er shields and helms, and helmèd heads he rode 840 Of Thrones and mighty Seraphim prostrate,
That wished the mountains now might be again
Thrown on them as a shelter from his ire.
Nor less on either side tempestuous fell
His arrows, from the fourfold-visaged Four,
845 Distinct<sup>o</sup> with eyes, and from the living wheels,
Distinct alike with multitude of eyes;
One spirit in them ruled, and every eye
Glared lightning, and shot forth pernicious<sup>o</sup> fire
Among th' accursed, that withered all their strength,
850 And of their wonted<sup>o</sup> vigor left them drained,
Exhausted, spiritless, afflicted, fall'n.
Yet half his strength he put not forth, but checked
His thunder in mid-volley, for he meant
Not to destroy, but root them out of Heav'n:
855 The overthrown he raised, and as a herd
Of goats or timorous flock together thronged
Drove them before him thunderstruck, pursued
With terrors and with furies to the bounds
And crystal wall of Heav'n, which op'ning wide,
860 Rolled inward, and a spacious gap disclosed
Into the wasteful<sup>o</sup> deep; the monstrous sight
Strook them with horror backward, but far worse
Urged them behind; headlong themselves they threw Down from the verge of Heav'n, eternal wrath
865 Burnt after them to the bottomless pit.
"Hell heard th' unsufferable noise, Hell saw

Heav'n ruining<sup>o</sup> from Heav'n, and would have fled
Affrighted; but strict fate had cast too deep
Her dark foundations, and too fast had bound.
870 Nine days they fell; confounded Chaos roared,
And felt tenfold confusion in their fall
Through his wild anarchy, so huge a rout<sup>o</sup>
Encumbered<sup>o</sup> him with ruin: Hell at last
Yawning received them whole, and on them closed,
875 Hell their fit habitation fraught with fire
Unquenchable, the house of woe and pain.
Disburdened Heav'n rejoiced, and soon repaired
Her mural<sup>o</sup> breach, returning whence it rolled.
Sole victor from th' expulsion of his foes
880 Messiah his triumphal chariot turned:
To meet him all his saints, who silent stood
Eyewitnesses of his almighty acts,
With jubilee<sup>o</sup> advanced; and as they went,
Shaded with branching palm, each order bright
885 Sung triumph, and him sung victorious King,
Son, Heir, and Lord, to him dominion giv'n,
Worthiest to reign: he celebrated rode
Triumphant through mid-Heav'n, into the courts
And temple of his mighty Father throned
890 On high: who into glory him received,
Where now he sits at the right hand of bliss.
    "Thus measuring things in Heav'n by things on earth
At thy request, and that thou may'st beware
By what is past, to thee I have revealed
895 What might have else to human race been hid;
The discord which befell, and war in Heav'n
Among th' angelic powers,<sup>o</sup> and the deep fall
Of those too high aspiring, who rebelled
With Satan, he who envies now thy state,
900 Who now is plotting how he may seduce
Thee also from obedience, that with him

Bereaved of happiness thou may'st partake
 His punishment, eternal misery;
 Which would be all his solace and revenge,
 905 As a despite<sup>o</sup> done against the Most High,
 Thee once to gain companion of his woe.
 But listen not to his temptations, warn
 Thy weaker;<sup>5</sup> let it profit thee to have heard
 By terrible example the reward
 910 Of disobedience; firm they might have stood,
 Yet fell; remember, and fear to transgress."

Endnotes

- Note 1: That is, Abdiel. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Daughters of Jove, who control the seasons and guard the gates of Heaven. "Morn": Aurora, goddess of dawn. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The literal meaning (Hebrew) of the name Abdiel. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: God sends out only an equal force to match the one-third of the angelic host that rebelled, not the two-thirds that remained loyal. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A square military formation. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A narrow valley would force other armies to march in a file. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Hostile encounter. Return to reference 7
- Note 8:
 The term carries political resonance, since the national English church, Anglican or (during the revolution) Presbyterian, sought to suppress and persecute the sects who separated from it (Baptists, Quakers, Socinians, and others), often denouncing them as heretics. Satan claims that a "synod" (line 156, term for a Presbyterian assembly) has proclaimed the truth of the rebel angels' case; Abdiel insists that truth may rather reside (as here) with a single "dissenter" or a sect of a few.

- Note 9: The outcome of your action. "Plume": token of victory.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, lest thou boast that I did not answer your argument.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Satan's contemptuous pun links together the loyal angels' service ("Minist'ring," line 167) with their song, likened to the street songs of minstrels.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Abdiel cites the "natural law" principle that rule rightly belongs to the best or worthiest, and that tyrants are enslaved to their own passions.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Here as elsewhere Milton uses the name of one angelic order to stand for all. But the choice of "Thrones" here carries political resonance, linking monarchs with rebels against God's kingdom.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Made a harsh, jarring sound.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The principal body of an army, as opposed to the van, rear, and wing.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The four elements—fire, air, water, earth—that constitute the several "regions" (next line) of planet earth.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, the angelic legions had leaders, yet each single warrior seemed like such a leader.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Weight that will tip the scales.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Satan's shield is a rocklike ("rocky") circle, made of impenetrable "adamant" (probably diamond), ten layers thick.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, Have you made even the least of my followers flee, or seen them fall and fail to rise, that you would hope "imperiously" to deal ("transact") otherwise with me, driving me off by mere threats? "Err not" (following): don't falsely suppose.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Personifying the angels' apprehension.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: An epic simile comparing the clash of these armies ("great things") with war among the planets, in which two planets clashing together from diametrically opposed positions ("aspect malign"), would cast the planetary system and its music ("jarring spheres") into confusion ("confound").Return to reference 4

- Note 5: That is, because they would not have power to repeat the blow.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, provide themselves with limbs. "Condense or rare" (line 353): dense or airy.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: With his companies ("ensigns") he pierced Moloch's troops in their dense formation ("deep array").Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Asmodeus, a Persian god (see 4.167–71). "Adramelech": "king of fire," a god worshipped at Samaria with human sacrifice.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: "Ariel": "lion of God." "Arioch": "lionlike." "Ramiel": "thunder of God."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, the army gave way.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Scarcely defending themselves.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Aspire to.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: No sooner known than despised.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: An Assyrian god; the Hebrew name was said to mean flight or luxurious temptation.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Not liable to suffering.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, we would owe such a one our deliverance.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The touchhole into which fine powder was poured to serve as fuse for the charge. "Thick": compactly.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Saltpeter ("nitrous foam") and sulphur are the ingredients of gunpowder.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Aware, as an accessory to a crime.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Hebrew, "spy of God."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A pun on "offer to negotiate" and "opening" (aperture), the hole or muzzle of the cannon. The passage is full of puns: for example, "perverse" (line 562, peevish, turned the wrong

- way), “discharge” (line 564), “charge,” “touch,” “propound,” “loud” (lines 566–67), “hollow” (line 578).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See the sustained debased imagery relating to bodily functions, for example, “belched,” “emboweled,” “entrails.”Return to reference 4
  - Note 5: Chainshot, which was linked cannonballs.Return to reference 5
  - Note 6: That is, nor did it do any good (“served it”) to loosen up (“relax”) their rows pressed close together (“serried files”).Return to reference 6
  - Note 7: More puns, on “propounded,” “terms of composition,” “flew off.”Return to reference 7
  - Note 8: A pun on “held their attention” and “bewildered them.” Belial also puns on (among other terms) “stumbled” (“nonplussed” and “tripped up”) and “understand” (“comprehend” and “prop up”).Return to reference 8
  - Note 9: The hurling of hills as missiles is taken from the war between the Olympian gods and the Giants, in Hesiod’s Theogony.Return to reference 9
  - Note 1: One who sits beside, an associate.Return to reference 1
  - Note 2: See Colossians 1:15: “Who is the image of the invisible God.”Return to reference 2
  - Note 3: Two omnipotences are a logical impossibility; the phrase underscores Milton’s view that the Son receives all power from the Father. See John 5:19, “The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do,” which Milton cites in Christian Doctrine 1.5 to argue that the Son derives all power from the Father.Return to reference 3
  - Note 4: The literal meaning of “messiah.”Return to reference 4
  - Note 5: The Son’s living chariot, with its four-faced Cherubim—the faces being man, lion, ox, and eagle—is taken from Ezekiel 1 (especially 1:10) and 10.Return to reference 5
  - Note 6: See Ezekiel 10:12: “And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had.”Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Gems worn by Aaron in his “breastplate of judgment” (Exodus 28:30).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Jove’s bird was the eagle; his weapon was the thunderbolt.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: See Psalm 68:17: “The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them.”Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Drawn up again in battle formation.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Echoes Moses’s words when God destroyed the Egyptians in the Red Sea (Exodus 14:13): “Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will shew to you to day.”Return to reference 2
- Note 3: See Romans 12:19: “Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.”Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The four “Cherubic shapes” of line 753.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Eve, who is, however, present for this story.Return to reference 5

The Argument

Raphael at the request of Adam relates how and wherefore this world was first created; that God, after the expelling of Satan and his angels out of heaven, declared his pleasure to create another world and other creatures to dwell therein; sends his Son with glory and attendance of angels to perform the work of creation in six days: the angels celebrate with hymns the performance thereof, and his reascension into heaven.

Descend from Heav'n Urania,<sup>1</sup> by that name
If rightly thou art called, whose voice divine
Following, above th' Olympian hill I soar,
Above the flight of Pegasean wing.<sup>2</sup>
The meaning, not the name I call: for thou
5 Nor of the muses nine, nor on the top
Of old Olympus dwell'st, but heav'nly born
Before the hills appeared, or fountain flowed,
Thou with eternal Wisdom<sup>3</sup> didst converse,<sup>o</sup>
Wisdom thy sister, and with her didst play
10 In presence of th' Almighty Father, pleased
With thy celestial song. Up led by thee
Into the Heav'n of Heav'ns I have presumed,
An earthly guest, and drawn empyreal air,
Thy temp'ring;<sup>o</sup> with like safety guided down
15 Return me to my native element:
Lest from this flying steed unreined (as once Bellerophon,<sup>4</sup> though from a lower clime)<sup>o</sup>
Dismounted, on th' Aleian field I fall
Erroneous<sup>o</sup> there to wander and forlorn.
20

Half yet remains unsung, but narrower bound
Within the visible diurnal sphere;<sup>5</sup>
Standing on earth, not rapt<sup>o</sup> above the pole,
More safe I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
To hoarse or mute, though fall'n on evil days,
25 On evil days though fall'n, and evil tongues;
In darkness, and with dangers compassed round,<sup>6</sup>
And solitude; yet not alone, while thou
Visit'st my slumbers nightly, or when morn
Purples the east: still govern thou my song,
30 Urania, and fit audience find, though few.
But drive far off the barbarous dissonance
Of Bacchus and his revelers, the race
Of that wild rout that tore the Thracian bard
In Rhodope, where woods and rocks had ears
35 To rapture, till the savage clamor drowned
Both harp and voice;<sup>7</sup> nor could the Muse defend
Her son.<sup>8</sup> So fail not thou, who thee implores:
For thou art heav'nly, she an empty dream.
Say goddess, what ensued when Raphael,
40 The affable Archangel, had forewarned
Adam by dire example to beware
Apostasy, by what befell in Heaven
To those apostates, lest the like befall
In Paradise to Adam or his race,
45 Charged not to touch the interdicted tree,
If they transgress, and slight that sole command,
So easily obeyed amid the choice
Of all tastes else<sup>o</sup> to please their appetite,
Though wand'ring. He with his consorted<sup>o</sup> Eve
50 The story heard attentive, and was filled
With admiration,<sup>o</sup> and deep muse to hear
Of things so high and strange, things to their thought
So unimaginable as hate in Heav'n,

55 And war so near the peace of God in bliss
With such confusion: but the evil soon
Driv'n back redounded<sup>o</sup> as a flood on those
From whom it sprung, impossible to mix
With blessedness. Whence Adam soon repealed<sup>o</sup>
60 The doubts that in his heart arose: and now
Led on, yet sinless, with desire to know
What nearer might concern him, how this world
Of Heav'n and earth conspicuous<sup>o</sup> first began,
When, and whereof created, for what cause,
65 What within Eden or without was done
Before his memory, as one whose drouth<sup>o</sup>
Yet scarce allayed still eyes the current<sup>o</sup> stream,
Whose liquid murmur heard new thirst excites,
Proceeded thus to ask his heav'nly guest:
70 "Great things, and full of wonder in our ears,
Far differing from this world, thou hast revealed
Divine interpreter, by favor sent Down from the empyrean to forewarn
Us timely of what might else<sup>o</sup> have been our loss,
Unknown, which human knowledge could not reach:
75 For which to the Infinitely Good we owe Immortal thanks, and his admonishment
Receive with solemn purpose to observe
Immutably his sov'reign will, the end<sup>o</sup>
Of what we are. But since thou hast vouchsafed
80 Gently for our instruction to impart
Things above earthly thought, which yet concerned
Our knowing, as to Highest Wisdom seemed,
Deign to descend now lower, and relate
What may no less perhaps avail us known,
85 How first began this Heav'n which we behold
Distant so high, with moving fires adorned
Innumerable, and this which yields or fills
All space, the ambient<sup>o</sup> air wide interfused
Embracing round this florid<sup>o</sup> earth, what cause

90 Moved the Creator in his holy rest
Through all eternity so late to build
In Chaos,<sup>9</sup> and the work begun, how soon
Absolved,<sup>o</sup> if unforbid thou may'st unfold
What we, not to explore the secrets ask
95 Of his eternal empire, but the more
To magnify<sup>o</sup> his works, the more we know.
And the great light of day yet wants to run
Much of his race though steep, suspense<sup>o</sup> in Heav'n
Held by thy voice, thy potent voice he hears,
100 And longer will delay to hear thee tell
His generation,<sup>o</sup> and the rising birth
Of nature from the unapparent<sup>1</sup> deep:
Or if the star of evening and the moon
Haste to thy audience, night with her will bring 105 Silence, and sleep list'ning to thee will watch,<sup>o</sup>
Or we can bid his absence, till thy song
End, and dismiss thee ere the morning shine."
Thus Adam his illustrious guest besought:
And thus the godlike angel answered mild:
110 "This also thy request with caution asked
Obtain: though to recount almighty works
What words or tongue of Seraph can suffice,
Or heart of man suffice to comprehend?
Yet what thou canst attain, which best may serve
115 To glorify the Maker, and infer<sup>o</sup>
Thee also happier, shall not be withheld
Thy hearing, such commission from above
I have received, to answer thy desire
Of knowledge within bounds; beyond abstain
120 To ask, nor let thine own inventions<sup>o</sup> hope
Things not revealed, which th' invisible King,
Only omniscient, hath suppressed in night,
To none communicable in earth or Heaven:
Enough is left besides to search and know.
125

But knowledge is as food, and needs no less
Her temperance over appetite, to know
In measure what the mind may well contain,
Oppresses else with surfeit, and soon turns
Wisdom to folly, as nourishment to wind.

130     "Know then, that after Lucifer from Heav'n
(So call him, brighter once amidst the host
Of angels, than that star the stars among)<sup>2</sup>
Fell with his flaming legions through the deep
Into his place, and the great Son returned

135     Victorious with his saints, th' Omnipotent
Eternal Father from his throne beheld
Their multitude, and to his Son thus spake:
    " 'At least our envious foe hath failed, who thought
All like himself rebellious, by whose aid

140     This inaccessible high strength, the seat
Of Deity supreme, us dispossessed,<sup>3</sup>
He trusted to have seized, and into fraud<sup>o</sup>
Drew many, whom their place knows here no more;
Yet far the greater part have kept, I see,

145     Their station, Heav'n yet populous retains Number sufficient to possess her realms
Though wide, and this high temple to frequent
With ministeries due and solemn rites:
But lest his heart exalt him in the harm

150     Already done, to have dispeopled Heav'n,
My damage fondly<sup>o</sup> deemed, I can repair
That detriment, if such it be to lose
Self-lost, and in a moment will create
Another world, out of one man a race

155     Of men innumerable, there to dwell,
Not here, till by degrees of merit raised
They open to themselves at length the way
Up hither, under long obedience tried,

160

And earth be changed to Heav'n and Heav'n to earth,
One kingdom, joy and union without end.
Meanwhile inhabit lax,<sup>o</sup> ye Powers of Heav'n;
And thou my Word, begotten Son, by thee
This I perform, speak thou, and be it done:<sup>4</sup>
My overshadowing Spirit and might with thee
165 I send along, ride forth, and bid the deep
Within appointed bounds be heav'n and earth,
Boundless the deep, because I am who fill
Infinitude, nor vacuous the space.
Though I uncircumscribed myself retire,
170 And put not forth my goodness, which is free
To act or not,<sup>5</sup> necessity and chance
Approach not me, and what I will is fate.'
"So spake th' Almighty and to what he spake
His Word, the Filial Godhead, gave effect.
175 Immediate are the acts of God, more swift
Than time or motion, but to human ears
Cannot without process of speech be told,
So told as earthly notion<sup>o</sup> can receive.<sup>6</sup>
Great triumph and rejoicing was in Heav'n 180 When such was heard declared the Almighty's will;
'Glory' they sung to the Most High, 'good will
To future men, and in their dwellings peace:
Glory to him whose just avenging ire
Had driven out th' ungodly from his sight
185 And th' habitations of the just; to him
Glory and praise, whose wisdom had ordained
Good out of evil to create, instead
Of Spirits malign a better race to bring
Into their vacant room, and thence diffuse
190 His good to worlds and ages infinite.'
So sang the hierarchies: meanwhile the Son
On his great expedition now appeared,

Girt with omnipotence, with radiance crowned
Of majesty divine, sapience<sup>o</sup> and love
195 Immense, and all his Father in him shone.
About his chariot numberless were poured
Cherub and Seraph, Potentates and Thrones,
And Virtues, winged Spirits, and chariots winged,
From the armory of God, where stand of old
200 Myriads between two brazen mountains lodged
Against<sup>o</sup> a solemn day, harnessed at hand,
Celestial equipage; and now came forth
Spontaneous, for within them spirit lived,
Attendant on their Lord: Heav'n opened wide
205 Her ever-during<sup>o</sup> gates, harmonious sound
On golden hinges moving, to let forth
The King of Glory<sup>7</sup> in his powerful Word
And Spirit coming to create new worlds.
On heav'nly ground they stood, and from the shore
210 They viewed the vast immeasurable abyss
Outrageous<sup>o</sup> as a sea, dark, wasteful, wild,
Up from the bottom turned by furious winds
And surging waves, as mountains to assault
Heav'n's height, and with the center mix the pole.
215 " 'Silence, ye troubled waves, and thou deep, peace,'
Said then th' Omnific<sup>o</sup> Word, 'your discord end':
"Nor stayed, but on the wings of Cherubim
Uplifted, in paternal glory rode
Far into Chaos, and the world unborn;
220 For Chaos heard his voice: him all his train
Followed in bright procession to behold
Creation, and the wonders of his might.
Then stayed the fervid<sup>o</sup> wheels, and in his hand
He took the golden compasses, prepared
225 In God's eternal store, to circumscribe
This universe, and all created things:

One foot he centered, and the other turned
 Round through the vast profundity obscure,
 And said, 'Thus far extend, thus far thy bounds,
 230 This be thy just<sup>o</sup> circumference O world.'
 Thus God the heav'n<sup>o</sup> created, thus the earth,
 Matter unformed and void: darkness profound
 Covered th' abyss: but on the wat'ry calm
 His brooding wings the Spirit of God outspread,
 235 And vital virtue<sup>o</sup> infused, and vital warmth
 Throughout the fluid mass, but downward purged
 The black tartareous cold infernal dregs<sup>8</sup>
 Adverse to life: then founded, then conglobed
 Like things to like, the rest to several place
 240 Disparted, and between spun out the air,
 And earth self-balanced on her center hung.
 " 'Let there be light,' said God,<sup>9</sup> and forthwith light
 Ethereal, first of things, quintessence<sup>1</sup> pure
 Sprung from the deep, and from her native east
 245 To journey through the airy gloom began,
 Sphered in a radiant cloud, for yet the sun
 Was not; she in a cloudy tabernacle
 Sojourned the while. God saw the light was good;
 And light from darkness by the hemisphere
 250 Divided: light the day, and darkness night
 He named. Thus was the first day ev'n and morn:<sup>2</sup>
 Nor passed uncelebrated, nor unsung
 By the celestial choirs, when orient light
 Exhaling<sup>o</sup> first from darkness they beheld;
 255 Birthday of heav'n<sup>o</sup> and earth; with joy and shout
 The hollow universal orb they filled,
 And touched their golden harps, and hymning praised
 God and his works, Creator him they sung,
 Both when first evening was, and when first morn.
 260 "Again, God said, 'Let there be firmament

Amid the waters, and let it divide
The waters from the waters': and God made
The firmament, expanse of liquid,o pure,
Transparent, elemental air diffused
265 In circuit to the uttermost convexo
Of this great round:o partition firm and sure,
The waters underneath from those above
Dividing: for as earth, so he the world
Built on circumfluouso waters calm, in wide
270 Crystalline ocean, and the loud misrule
Of Chaos far removed, lest fierce extremes
Contiguous might distemper the whole frame:3
And heav'no he named the firmament: so ev'n
And morning chorus sung the second day.
275 "The earth was formed, but in the womb as yet
Of waters, embryon<sup>4</sup> immature involvedo
Appeared not: over all the face of earth
Maino ocean flowed, not idle, but with warm
Prolific humoro soft'ning all her globe,
280 Fermented the great mother to conceive,
Sate with genialo moisture, when God said,
'Be gathered now ye waters under heav'n
Into one place, and let dry land appear.'
Immediately the mountains huge appear
285 Emergent, and their broad bare backs upheave
Into the clouds, their tops ascend the sky:
So high as heaved the tumido hills, so low
Down sunk a hollow bottom broad and deep,
Capacious bed of waters: thither they
290 Hasted with glad precipitance,o uprolled
As drops on dust conglobing from the dry;
Part rise in crystal wall, or ridge directo
For haste; such flight the great command impressed
On the swift floods: as armies at the call
295 Of trumpet (for of armies thou hast heard)

Troop to their standard, so the wat'ry throng,
Wave rolling after wave, where way they found,
If steep, with torrent rapture, o if through plain,
Soft-ebbing; nor withstood them rock or hill,
300 But they, or o underground, or circuit wide
With serpent error o wand'ring, found their way,
And on the washy ooze deep channels wore;
Easy, ere God had bid the ground be dry,
All but within those banks, where rivers now
305 Stream, and perpetual draw their humid train. o
The dry land, earth, and the great receptacle
Of congregated waters he called seas:
And saw that it was good, and said, 'Let th' earth
Put forth the verdant grass, herb yielding seed,
310 And fruit tree yielding fruit after her kind;
Whose seed is in herself upon the earth.'
He scarce had said, when the bare earth, till then
Desert and bare, unsightly, unadorned,
Brought forth the tender grass, whose verdure clad 315 Her universal face with pleasant green,
Then herbs of every leaf, that sudden flow'red
Op'ning their various colors, and made gay
Her bosom smelling sweet: and these scarce blown, o
Forth flourished thick the clust'ring vine, forth crept
320 The swelling gourd, up stood the corny o reed
Embattled in her field: add the humble o shrub,
And bush with frizzled hair implicit: o last
Rose as in dance the stately trees, and spread
Their branches hung with copious fruit; or gemmed o 325 Their blossoms: with high woods the hills were crowned,
With tufts the valleys and each fountain side,
With borders long the rivers. That earth now Seemed like to Heav'n, a seat where gods might dwell,
Or wander with delight, and love to haunt

330 Her sacred shades: though God had yet not rained
Upon the earth, and man to till the ground
None was, but from the earth a dewy mist
Went up and watered all the ground, and each
335 Plant of the field, which ere it was in the earth
God made, and every herb, before it grew
On the green stem; God saw that it was good:
So ev'n and morn recorded the third day.
"Again th' Almighty spake: 'Let there be lights
340 High in th' expanse of heaven<sup>o</sup> to divide
The day from night; and let them be for signs,
For seasons, and for days, and circling years,
And let them be for lights as I ordain
Their office<sup>o</sup> in the firmament of heav'n
To give light on the earth'; and it was so.
345 And God made two great lights, great for their use
To man, the greater to have rule by day,
The less by night altern:<sup>o</sup> and made the stars,
And set them in the firmament of heav'n
To illuminate the earth, and rule the day
350 In their vicissitude,<sup>o</sup> and rule the night,
And light from darkness to divide. God saw,
Surveying his great work, that it was good:
For of celestial bodies first the sun
A mighty sphere he framed, unlightsome first,
355 Though of ethereal mold:<sup>o</sup> then formed the moon
Globose, and every magnitude of stars,
And sowed with stars the heav'n thick as a field:
Of light by far the greater part he took,
Transplanted from her cloudy shrine,<sup>5</sup> and placed 360 In the sun's orb, made porous to receive
And drink the liquid light, firm to retain
Her gathered beams, great palace now of light.
Hither as to their fountain other stars
365 Repairing,<sup>o</sup> in their golden urns draw light,

And hence the morning planet gilds her horns;<sup>6</sup>
By tincture<sup>o</sup> or reflection they augment
Their small peculiar,<sup>o</sup> though from human sight
So far remote, with dimunition seen.
First in his east the glorious lamp was seen,
370 Regent of day, and all th' horizon round
Invested with bright rays, jocund<sup>o</sup> to run
His longitude<sup>o</sup> through heav'n's high road: the gray
Dawn, and the Pleiades<sup>7</sup> before him danced
Shedding sweet influence: less bright the moon,
375 But opposite in leveled west was set
His mirror, with full face borrowing her light
From him, for other light she needed none
In that aspect,<sup>o</sup> and still that distance keeps Till night, then in the east her turn she shines,
380 Revolved on heav'n's great axle, and her reign
With thousand lesser lights dividual<sup>o</sup> holds,
With thousand thousand stars, that then appeared
Spangling the hemisphere: then first adorned
With their bright luminaries that set and rose, 385 Glad<sup>o</sup> evening and glad morn crowned the fourth day.
And God said, 'Let the waters generate
Reptile<sup>o</sup> with spawn abundant, living soul:
And let fowl fly above the earth, with wings
Displayed<sup>o</sup> on the op'n firmament of heav'n.'
390 And God created the great whales, and each
Soul living, each that crept, which plenteously
The waters generated by their kinds,
And every bird of wing after his kind;
And saw that it was good, and blessed them, saying,
395 'Be fruitful, multiply, and in the seas
And lakes and running streams the waters fill;
And let the fowl be multiplied on the earth.'
Forthwith the sounds and seas, each creek and bay

400 With fry<sup>o</sup> innumerable swarm, and shoals
Of fish that with their fins and shining scales
Glide under the green wave, in sculls that oft
Bank the mid-sea:<sup>8</sup> part single or with mate
Graze the seaweed their pasture, and through groves
Of coral stray, or sporting with quick glance 405 Show to the sun their waved<sup>o</sup> coats dropped<sup>o</sup> with gold,
Or in their pearly shells at ease, attend<sup>o</sup>
Moist nutriment, or under rocks their food
In jointed armor watch: on smooth the seal,
And bended<sup>9</sup> dolphins play: part huge of bulk 410 Wallowing unwieldy, enormous in their gait
Tempest<sup>o</sup> the ocean: there leviathan<sup>1</sup>
Hugest of living creatures, on the deep
Stretched like a promontory sleeps or swims,
And seems a moving land, and at his gills
415 Draws in, and at his trunk spouts out a sea.
Meanwhile the tepid caves, and fens and shores
Their brood as numerous hatch, from th' egg that soon
Bursting with kindly<sup>o</sup> rupture forth disclosed
Their callow<sup>o</sup> young, but feathered soon and fledge 420 They summed their pens,<sup>2</sup> and soaring th' air sublime
With clang<sup>o</sup> despised the ground, under a cloud
In prospect;<sup>3</sup> there the eagle and the stork
On cliffs and cedar tops their eyries build:
Part loosely<sup>o</sup> wing the region,<sup>o</sup> part more wise
425 In common, ranged in figure wedge their way,<sup>4</sup>
Intelligent<sup>o</sup> of seasons, and set forth
Their aery caravan high over seas
Flying, and over lands with mutual wing
Easing their flight;<sup>5</sup> so steers the prudent crane

430 Her annual voyage, borne on winds; the air
Floats, o as they pass, fanned with unnumbered plumes:
From branch to branch the smaller birds with song
Solaced the woods, and spread their painted wings
Till ev'n, nor then the solemn nightingale
435 Ceased warbling, but all night tuned her soft lays: o
Others on silver lakes and rivers bathed
Their downy breast; the swan, with archèd neck
Between her white wings mantling proudly, rows
Her state with oary feet: o yet oft they quit
440 The dank, o and rising on stiff pennons, tow'r o
The mid-aerial sky: others on ground
Walked firm; the crested cock whose clarion sounds
The silent hours, and th' other o whose gay train
Adorns him, colored with the florid hue
445 Of rainbows and starry eyes. The waters thus
With fish replenished, o and the air with fowl,
Evening and morn solemnized the fifth day.
"The sixth, and of creation last arose
With evening harps and matin, o when God said,
450 'Let th' earth bring forth soul living in her kind,
Cattle and creeping things, and beast of the earth,
Each in their kind.' The earth obeyed, and straight
Op'ning her fertile womb teemed o at a birth
Innumerable living creatures, perfect forms,
455 Limbed and full grown: out of the ground up rose
As from his lair the wild beast where he wons o
In forest wild, in thicket, brake, or den;
Among the trees in pairs they rose, they walked:
The cattle in the fields and meadows green:
460 Those rare and solitary, these z in flocks
Pasturing at once, o and in broad herds upsprung.
The grassy clods o now calved, now half appeared
The tawny lion, pawing to get free

465 His hinder parts, then springs as broke from bonds,
And rampant shakes his brinded<sup>o</sup> mane; the ounce,<sup>o</sup>
The libbard,<sup>o</sup> and the tiger, as the mole
Rising, the crumbled earth above them threw
In hillocks; the swift stag from underground
Bore up his branching head: scarce from his mold
470 Behemoth<sup>8</sup> biggest born of earth upheaved
His vastness: fleeced the flocks and bleating rose,
As plants: ambiguous between sea and land
The river-horse<sup>9</sup> and scaly crocodile.
At once came forth whatever creeps the ground,
475 Insect or worm;<sup>1</sup> those waved their limber fans
For wings, and smallest lineaments exact
In all the liveries decked of summer's pride
With spots of gold and purple, azure and green:
These as a line their long dimension drew,
480 Streaking the ground with sinuous trace; not all
Minims<sup>o</sup> of nature; some of serpent kind
Wondrous in length and corpulence involved<sup>o</sup>
Their snaky folds, and added wings. First crept
The parsimonious emmet,<sup>o</sup> provident
485 Of future, in small room large heart<sup>o</sup> enclosed,
Pattern of just equality perhaps
Hereafter, joined in her popular tribes
Of commonalty:<sup>2</sup> swarming next appeared
The female bee that feeds her husband drone
490 Deliciously, and builds her waxen cells
With honey stored: the rest are numberless,
And thou their natures know'st, and gav'st them names,<sup>3</sup>
Needless to thee repeated; nor unknown
The serpent subtlest beast of all the field,
495 Of huge extent sometimes, with brazen eyes
And hairy mane<sup>4</sup> terrific,<sup>o</sup> though to thee
Not noxious, but obedient at thy call.

Now heav'n in all her glory shone, and rolled
Her motions, as the great First Mover's hand
500 First wheeled their course; earth in her rich attire
Consummate<sup>o</sup> lovely smiled; air, water, earth,
By fowl, fish, beast, was flown, was swum, was walked
Frequent;<sup>o</sup> and of the sixth day yet remained;
There wanted yet the master work, the end<sup>o</sup>
505 Of all yet done; a creature who not prone
And brute as other creatures, but endued
With sanctity of reason, might erect
His stature,<sup>5</sup> and upright with front<sup>o</sup> serene Govern the rest, self-knowing, and from thence 510 Magnanimous to correspond<sup>6</sup> with Heav'n,
But grateful to acknowledge whence his good
Descends, thither with heart and voice and eyes
Directed in devotion, to adore
And worship God supreme, who made him chief
515 Of all his works: therefore th' Omnipotent Eternal Father (for where is not he Present) thus to his Son audibly spake:
" 'Let us make now man in our image, man
In our similitude, and let them rule
520 Over the fish and fowl of sea and air,
Beast of the field, and over all the earth,
And every creeping thing that creeps the ground.'
This said, he formed thee, Adam, thee O man
Dust of the ground, and in thy nostrils breathed 525 The breath of life; in his own image he Created thee, in the image of God
Express,<sup>o</sup> and thou becam'st a living soul.
Male he created thee, but thy consort
Female for race; then blessed mankind, and said,
530 'Be fruitful, multiply, and fill the earth,
Subdue it, and throughout dominion hold

Over fish of the sea, and fowl of the air,
And every living thing that moves on the earth.'
Wherever thus created, for no place
535 Is yet distinct by name, thence, o as thou know'st
He brought thee into this delicious o grove,
This garden, planted with the trees of God,
Delectable both to behold and taste;
And freely all their pleasant fruit for food
540 Gave thee, all sorts are here that all th' earth yields,
Variety without end; but of the tree
Which tasted works knowledge of good and evil,
Thou may'st not; in the day thou eat'st, thou di'st;
Death is the penalty imposed, beware,
545 And govern well thy appetite, lest Sin
Surprise thee, and her black attendant Death.
Here finished he, and all that he had made
Viewed, and behold all was entirely good;
So ev'n and morn accomplished the sixth day:
550 Yet not till the Creator from his work
Desisting, though unwearied, up returned
Up to the Heav'n of Heav'ns his high abode,
Thence to behold his new-created world
Th' addition of his empire, how it showed 555 In prospect from his throne, how good, how fair,
Answering his great Idea.<sup>7</sup> Up he rode Followed with acclamation and the sound
Symphonious of ten thousand harps that tuned o
Angelic harmonies: the earth, the air
560 Resounded (thou remember'st, for thou heard'st),
The heav'ns and all the constellations rung,
The planets in their stations list'ning stood,
While the bright pomp o ascended jubilant.
    " 'Open, ye everlasting gates,' they sung,
565 'Open, ye Heav'ns, your living doors; let in
The great Creator from his work returned

Magnificent,<sup>8</sup> his six days' work, a world;
 Open, and henceforth oft; for God will deign
 To visit oft the dwellings of just men
 570 Delighted, and with frequent intercourse
 Thither will send his wingèd messengers
 On errands of supernal<sup>o</sup> grace.' So sung
 The glorious train ascending: he through Heav'n,
 That opened wide her blazing<sup>o</sup> portals, led 575 To God's eternal house direct the way,
 A broad and ample road, whose dust is gold
 And pavement stars, as stars to thee appear,
 Seen in the galaxy, that Milky Way
 Which nightly as a circling zone<sup>o</sup> thou seest 580 Powdered with stars. And now on earth the seventh
 Evening arose in Eden, for the sun
 Was set, and twilight from the east came on,
 Forerunning night; when at the holy mount
 Of Heav'n's high-seated top, th' imperial throne
 585 Of Godhead, fixed forever firm and sure,
 The Filial Power arrived, and sat him down
 With his great Father, for he<sup>9</sup> also went Invisible, yet stayed (such privilege
 Hath Omnipresence) and the work ordained,<sup>o</sup>
 590 Author and end of all things, and from work
 Now resting, blessed and hallowed the sev'nth day,
 As resting on that day from all his work,
 But not in silence holy kept; the harp
 Had work and rested not, the solemn pipe,
 595 And dulcimer, all organs<sup>o</sup> of sweet stop,
 All sounds on fret<sup>1</sup> by string or golden wire
 Tempered<sup>o</sup> soft tunings, intermixed with voice
 Choral<sup>o</sup> or unison: of incense clouds
 Fuming from golden censers hid the mount.
 600 "Creation and the six days' acts they sung:
 'Great are thy works, Jehovah, infinite

Thy power; what thought can measure thee or tongue
Relate thee; greater now in thy return
Than from the giant<sup>2</sup> angels; thee that day
605 Thy thunders magnified; but to create
Is greater than created to destroy.
Who can impair thee, Mighty King, or bound
Thy empire? Easily the proud attempt
Of Spirits apostate and their counsels vain
610 Thou hast repelled, while impiously they thought
Thee to diminish, and from thee withdraw
The number of thy worshippers. Who seeks
To lessen thee, against his purpose serves
To manifest the more thy might: his evil
615 Thou usest, and from thence creat'st more good.
Witness this new-made world, another heav'n
From Heaven gate not far, founded in view
On the clear hyaline,<sup>3</sup> the glassy sea;
Of amplitude almost immense,<sup>o</sup> with stars
620 Numerous, and every star perhaps a world
Of destined habitation; but thou know'st
Their seasons: among these the seat of men,
Earth with her nether ocean circumfused,<sup>o</sup>
Their pleasant dwellingplace. Thrice happy men, 625 And sons of men, whom God hath thus advanced,
Created in his image, there to dwell
And worship him, and in reward to rule
Over his works, on earth, in sea, or air,
And multiply a race of worshippers
630 Holy and just: thrice happy if they know
Their happiness, and persevere upright.'
"So sung they, and the empyrean rung,
With hallelujahs:<sup>4</sup> thus was Sabbath kept.
And thy request think now fulfilled, that asked
635 How first this world and face of things began,

And what before thy memory was done
From the beginning, that posterity
Informed by thee might know; if else thou seek'st
Aught, not surpassing human measure, say."

Endnotes

- Note 1: Urania, the Greek Muse of astronomy, had been made into the Muse of Christian poetry by du Bartas and other religious poets. Milton, however, constructs another derivation for her (line 5ff.). Milton begins Book 7 with a third proem (lines 1–39).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Pegasus, the flying horse of inspired poetry, suggests (in connection with Bellerophon, line 18) Milton's sense of perilous audacity in writing this poem.Return to reference 2
- Note 3:
In Proverbs 8:24–31 Wisdom tells of her activities before the Creation: "Then I was by him [God], as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him." Milton describes "eternal Wisdom" as a daughter of God (personification of his wisdom) and devises a myth in which the Muse of divine poetry ("celestial song," line 12) is Wisdom's "sister"—also, thereby, originating from God.
Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Bellerophon incurred the gods' anger when he tried to fly to heaven upon Pegasus; Zeus sent an insect to sting the horse, and Bellerophon fell down to the "Aleian field" (plain of error), where he wandered alone and blind until his death.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The universe, which appears to rotate daily.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: After the Restoration of Charles II (May 1660) and until the passage of the Act of Oblivion (August 1660), Milton was in danger of death and dismemberment (like Orpheus, lines 34–35); several of his republican colleagues were hanged, disembowelled, and quartered for their part in the revolution and regicide.Return to reference 6

- Note 7:

The music of the “Thracian bard” Orpheus, type of the poet, charmed even “woods and rocks,” but his song was drowned out by the Bacchantes, a “wild rout” of screaming women who murdered and dismembered him and threw his body parts into the Hebrus River, which rises in the “Rhodope” mountains. Milton fears that a similar “barbarous dissonance” unleashed by the Restoration will drown out his voice and threaten his life.

Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Orpheus’s mother is Calliope, Muse of epic poetry.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Adam’s question about God’s actions before the Creation was often cited as an example of presumptuous and dangerous speculation, especially when, as here, it implies mutability in God. But in Milton’s Eden, error that is not deliberate is not sinful.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Invisible, because dark and without form.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, Lucifer (Satan) was once brighter among the angels than the star bearing his name is among the stars.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, once he had dispossessed us.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: God identifies himself as Creator, the Son as his agent to speak his creating Word.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Milton’s God creates out of Chaos, not out of nothing; the matter of Chaos emanated from God, and Chaos is therefore “infinite” because God fills it even while he withholds his “goodness” (creating power) from it. Neither necessity nor chance affect in any way God’s freely willed creative act.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Raphael explains the principle of accommodation, whereby God’s acts are said to be translated into terms humans can understand: here, a six-day creation. This principle allows for an escape from biblical literalism.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: See Psalm 24:9: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Crusty, gritty stuff left over from the elements infused with life that make up the universe; it is associated with Hell ("infernal," "tartarous") and presumably used in its composition.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: God's creating words, here and later, are quoted from Genesis 1–2, but Milton freely elaborates the creatures' responses to those words.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Ether was thought to be a fifth element or "quintessence," the substance of the celestial bodies above the moon.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: One twenty-four-hour period measured in the Hebrew manner from sundown to sundown.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Disturb the order and mixture of the elements and the created "frame" of the universe.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The earth is at first the "embryo" enveloped in a "womb of waters" and is then herself the "great mother" (line 281), made ready ("fermented") to conceive and bear every other being.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The "cloudy tabernacle" of line 248.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Venus, which Galileo's telescope found to be crescent-shaped in her first quarter.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A cluster of seven stars in the constellation Taurus. They appear at dawn ahead of the sun. See Job 38:31.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The fishes' darting motions resemble boats oared now on one side, now on the other ("sculls"), as they turn they seem to form banks within the sea.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Curved in leaping. "Smooth": a stretch of calm water.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The great whale (see 1.200–208).Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Brought their feathers to full growth.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The ground seems covered by a cloud of birds.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Fly in a wedge formation.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Birds were thought to support each other with their wings when they flew in formation.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The swan's outstretched ("mantling") wings form a mantle, and it seems like a monarch on a royal barge rowed by its own "oary" feet.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: "These" are the domestic cattle who come forth in "flocks" and "herds" in pastures; "those" are the wild beasts who come forth "in pairs" (line 459), and spread out ("rare") at wide intervals.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A huge biblical beast (Job 40:15), often identified with the elephant.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Translates the Greek name "hippopotamus."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Any creeping creature, including serpents.Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
The ant will become the symbol of a frugal and self-governing republic ("pattern of just equality") with the "popular" (populous, plebian) tribes of common people ("commonalty") joined in rule (lines 486–89); Milton made it such a symbol in his prose tract The Ready and Easy Way. Bees here (lines 489–93) suggest delightful ease but are not yet (as in 1.768–75) a symbol of monarchy and associated with Hell.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: See 8.342–54, and Genesis 2:19–20.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Sea serpents were so described in Aeneid 2.203–7.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Both "stand erect" and "elevate his condition": his erect stance was understood to signify that he was created for Heaven.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Both “be in harmony” and “communicate.”Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Eternal archetype or pattern, as in Plato: concept in the mind of God.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: See Psalm 24:7: “Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.”Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The Father.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Bar on the fingerboard of a stringed instrument. “Dulcimer”: the Hebrew bagpipe (Daniel 3:5).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The allusion implies that the myth of the Giants’ revolt against Jove is a classical type or version of the angels’ rebellion.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: From the Greek word for glass (Revelation 4:6), the waters above the firmament as contrasted with the “nether ocean” (line 624), the earth’s seas.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Hebrew, “praise the Lord.”Return to reference 4

The Argument

Adam inquires concerning celestial motions, is doubtfully answered, and exhorted to search rather things more worthy of knowledge: Adam assents, and still desirous to detain Raphael, relates to him what he remembered since his own creation, his placing in Paradise, his talk with God concerning solitude and fit society, his first meeting and nuptials with Eve, his discourse with the angel thereupon; who after admonitions repeated departs.

The angel ended, and in Adam's ear
So charming<sup>o</sup> left his voice, that he a while Thought him still speaking, still stood fixed to hear;
Then as new-waked thus gratefully replied:<sup>1</sup>
5 "What thanks sufficient, or what recompense
Equal have I to render thee, divine
Historian, who thus largely hast allayed
The thirst I had of knowledge, and vouchsafed
This friendly condescension to relate
10 Things else by me unsearchable, now heard
With wonder, but delight, and, as is due,
With glory attributed to the high
Creator; something yet of doubt remains,
Which only thy solution<sup>o</sup> can resolve.
15 When I behold this goodly frame,<sup>o</sup> this world
Of heav'n and earth consisting, and compute
Their magnitudes, this earth a spot, a grain,
An atom, with the firmament compared
And all her numbered<sup>o</sup> stars, that seem to roll 20 Spaces incomprehensible (for such
Their distance argues and their swift return

Diurnal)° merely to officiate° light
Round this opacous° earth, this punctual° spot,
One day and night; in all their vast survey
Useless besides; reasoning I oft admire,°
25 How Nature wise and frugal could commit
Such disproportions, with superfluous hand
So many nobler bodies to create,
Greater so manifold,° to this one use,
For aught appears,° and on their orbs impose
30 Such restless revolution day by day
Repeated, while the sedentary° earth,
That better might with far less compass° move,
Served by more noble than herself, attains
Her end without least motion, and receives,
35 As tribute such a sumless° journey brought
Of incorporeal° speed, her warmth and light;
Speed, to describe whose swiftness number fails.”
So spake our sire, and by his count’nance seemed Ent’ring on studious thoughts abstruse, which Eve
40 Perceiving where she sat retired in sight,
With lowliness majestic from her seat,
And grace that won who saw to wish her stay,
Rose, and went forth among her fruits and flow’rs,
To visit° how they prospered, bud and bloom,
45 Her nursery;° they at her coming sprung
And touched by her fair tendance gladlier grew.
Yet went she not as not with such discourse
Delighted, or not capable her ear
Of what was high: such pleasure she reserved,
50 Adam relating, she sole auditress;
Her husband the relater she preferred
Before the angel, and of him to ask
Chose rather;° he, she knew, would intermix
Grateful° digressions, and solve high dispute
55 With conjugal caresses, from his lip

Not words alone pleased her. O when meet now
Such pairs, in love and mutual honor joined?
With goddess-like demeanor forth she went;
Not unattended, for on her as queen
60 A pomp<sup>o</sup> of winning Graces<sup>4</sup> waited still,
And from about her shot darts of desire
Into all eyes to wish her still in sight.
And Raphael now to Adam's doubt proposed
Benevolent and facile<sup>o</sup> thus replied.
65 "To ask or search I blame thee not, for heav'n
Is as the book of God before thee set,
Wherein to read his wondrous works, and learn
His seasons, hours, or days, or months, or years:
This to attain, whether heav'n move or earth,
70 Imports not, if thou reckon right; the rest<sup>5</sup>
From man or angel the great Architect
Did wisely to conceal, and not divulge
His secrets to be scanned<sup>o</sup> by them who ought Rather admire;<sup>o</sup> or if they list to try
75 Conjecture, he his fabric<sup>o</sup> of the heav'ns
Hath left to their disputes, perhaps to move
His laughter at their quaint opinions wide<sup>o</sup>
Hereafter, when they come to model heav'n
And calculate the stars, how they will wield
80 The mighty frame, how build, unbuild, contrive
To save appearances,<sup>6</sup> how gird the sphere
With centric and eccentric scribbled o'er,
Cycle and epicycle,<sup>7</sup> orb in orb:
Already by thy reasoning this I guess,
85 Who art to lead thy offspring, and supposest
That bodies bright and greater should not serve
The less not bright, nor heav'n such journeys run,
Earth sitting still, when she alone receives
The benefit: consider first, that great
90 Or bright infers<sup>o</sup> not excellence: the earth

Though, in comparison of heav'n, so small,
Nor glistening, may of solid good contain
More plenty than the sun that barren shines,
Whose virtue on itself works no effect,
95 But in the fruitful earth; there first received
His beams, unactive<sup>o</sup> else, their vigor find.
Yet not to earth are those bright luminaries
Officious,<sup>o</sup> but to thee earth's habitant.
And for the heav'n's wide circuit, let it speak
100 The Maker's high magnificence, who built
So spacious, and his line stretched out so far;
That man may know he dwells not in his own;
An edifice too large for him to fill,
Lodged in a small partition, and the rest
105 Ordained for uses to his Lord best known.
The swiftness of those circles<sup>o</sup> átribute,
Though numberless,<sup>o</sup> to his omnipotence,
That to corporeal substances could add
Speed almost spiritual;<sup>o</sup> me thou think'st not slow,
110 Who since the morning hour set out from Heav'n
Where God resides, and ere midday arrived
In Eden, distance inexpressible
By numbers that have name. But this I urge,
Admitting motion in the heav'ns, to show
115 Invalid that which thee to doubt it moved;
Not that I so affirm, though so it seem
To thee who hast thy dwelling here on earth.<sup>8</sup>
God to remove his ways from human sense,
Placed heav'n from earth so far, that earthly sight,
120 If it presume, might err in things too high,
And no advantage gain. What if the sun
Be center to the world, and other stars
By his attractive virtue<sup>o</sup> and their own
Incited, dance about him various rounds?<sup>o</sup>
125 Their wand'ring course now high, now low, then hid,

Progressive, retrograde,<sup>o</sup> or standing still,
In six thou seest,<sup>9</sup> and what if sev'nth to these
The planet earth, so steadfast though she seem,
130 Insensibly three different motions move?<sup>1</sup>
Which else to several spheres thou must ascribe,
Moved contrary with thwart obliquities,<sup>2</sup>
Or save the sun his labor, and that swift
Nocturnal and diurnal rhomb<sup>3</sup> supposed,
135 Invisible else above all stars, the wheel
Of day and night; which needs not thy belief,
If earth industrious of herself fetch day
Traveling east, and with her part averse
From the sun's beam meet night, her other part
Still luminous by his ray. What if that light
140 Sent from her through the wide transpicious<sup>o</sup> air,
To the terrestrial moon be as a star
Enlight'ning her by day, as she by night
This earth? Reciprocal, if land be there,
Fields and inhabitants: her spots thou seest
145 As clouds, and clouds may rain, and rain produce
Fruits in her softened soil, for some to eat
Allotted there; and other suns perhaps
With their attendant moons thou wilt descry
Communicating male<sup>o</sup> and female<sup>o</sup> light, 150 Which two great sexes animate<sup>o</sup> the world,
Stored in each orb perhaps with some that live.
For such vast room in nature unpossessed
By living soul, desert and desolate,
Only to shine, yet scarce to contribute
155 Each orb a glimpse of light, conveyed so far
Down to this habitable,<sup>o</sup> which returns
Light back to them, is obvious to dispute.<sup>o</sup>
But whether thus these things, or whether not,
Whether the sun predominant in heav'n
160 Rise on the earth, or earth rise on the sun,

He from the east his flaming road begin,
Or she from west her silent course advance
With inoffensive<sup>o</sup> pace that spinning sleeps
On her soft axle, while she paces ev'n,
165 And bears thee soft with the smooth air along,
Solicit<sup>o</sup> not thy thoughts with matters hid,
Leave them to God above, him serve and fear;
Of other creatures, as him pleases best,
Wherever placed, let him dispose: joy thou
170 In what he gives to thee, this Paradise
And thy fair Eve; heav'n is for thee too high
To know what passes there; be lowly wise:
Think only what concerns thee and thy being;
Dream not of other worlds, what creatures there
175 Live, in what state, condition, or degree,
Contented that thus far hath been revealed
Not of earth only but of highest Heav'n."

To whom thus Adam cleared of doubt, replied:
"How fully hast thou satisfied me, pure
180 Intelligence<sup>o</sup> of Heav'n, angel serene,
And freed from intricacies, taught to live
The easiest way, nor with perplexing thoughts
To interrupt the sweet of life, from which God hath bid dwell far off all anxious cares,
185 And not molest us, unless we ourselves
Seek them with wand'ring thoughts, and notions vain.

But apt the mind or fancy is to rove
Unchecked, and of her roving is no end;
Till warned, or by experience taught, she learn,
190 That not to know at large of things remote
From use, obscure and subtle, but to know
That which before us lies in daily life,
Is the prime wisdom; what is more, is fume,<sup>o</sup>
Or emptiness, or fond impertinence,<sup>o</sup>
195 And renders us in things that most concern

Unpracticed, unprepared, and still to seek.°
 Therefore from this high pitch let us descend
 A lower flight, and speak of things at hand
 Useful, whence haply° mention may arise
 200 Of something not unseasonable to ask
 By sufferance,° and thy wonted° favor deigned.
 Thee I have heard relating what was done
 Ere my remembrance: now hear me relate
 My story, which perhaps thou hast not heard;
 205 And day is yet not spent; till then thou seest
 How subtly to detain thee I devise,
 Inviting thee to hear while I relate,
 Fond,° were it not in hope of thy reply:
 For while I sit with thee, I seem in Heav'n,
 210 And sweeter thy discourse is to my ear
 Than fruits of palm tree pleasantest to thirst
 And hunger both, from labor, at the hour
 Of sweet repast; they satiate, and soon fill,
 Though pleasant, but thy words with grace divine
 215 Imbued, bring to their sweetness no satiety."
 To whom thus Raphael answered heav'nly meek:
 "Nor are thy lips ungraceful, sire of men,
 Nor tongue ineloquent; for God on thee
 Abundantly his gifts hath also poured
 220 Inward and outward both, his image fair:
 Speaking or mute all comeliness and grace
 Attends thee, and each word, each motion forms.
 Nor less think we in Heav'n of thee on earth
 Than of our fellow-servant, and inquire
 225 Gladly into the ways of God with man:
 For God we see hath honored thee, and set
 On man his equal love: say therefore on;
 For I that day was absent, as befell,
 Bound on a voyage uncouth° and obscure,
 230 Far on excursion toward the gates of Hell;
 Squared in full legion (such command we had)

To see that none thence issued forth a spy,
Or enemy, while God was in his work,
Lest he incensed at such eruption bold,
235 Destruction with creation might have mixed.
Not that they durst without his leave attempt,
But us he sends upon his high behests
For state, o as sov'reign King, and to inure o
Our prompt obedience. Fast we found, fast shut
240 The dismal gates, and barricadoed strong;
But long ere our approaching heard within
Noise, other than the sound of dance or song,
Torment, and loud lament, and furious rage.
Glad we returned up to the coasts of light
245 Ere Sabbath evening: so we had in charge.
But thy relation now; for I attend,
Pleased with thy words no less than thou with mine."
So spake the godlike Power, and thus our sire:
"For man to tell how human life began
250 Is hard; for who himself beginning knew?<sup>4</sup>
Desire with thee still longer to converse Induced me. As new-waked from soundest sleep
Soft on the flow'ry herb I found me laid
In balmy sweat, which with his beams the sun
255 Soon dried, and on the reeking o moisture fed.
Straight toward heav'n my wond'ring eyes I turned,
And gazed a while the ample sky, till raised
By quick instinctive motion up I sprung
As thitherward endeavoring, and upright
260 Stood on my feet; about me round I saw
Hill, dale, and shady woods, and sunny plains,
And liquid lapse o of murmuring streams; by these,
Creatures that lived, and moved, and walked, or flew,
Birds on the branches warbling; all things smiled,
265 With fragrance and with joy my heart o'erflowed.

Myself I then perused, and limb by limb
Surveyed, and sometimes went, <sup>o</sup> and sometimes ran
With supple joints, as lively vigor led:
But who I was, or where, or from what cause,
270 Knew not; to speak I tried, and forthwith spake,
My tongue obeyed and readily could name
Whate'er I saw. <sup>5</sup> 'Thou sun,' said I, 'fair light,
And thou enlightened earth, so fresh and gay,
Ye hills and dales, ye rivers, woods, and plains,
275 And ye that live and move, fair creatures, tell,
Tell, if ye saw, how came I thus, how here?
Not of myself; by some great Maker then,
In goodness and in power preeminent;
Tell me, how may I know him, how adore,
280 From whom I have that thus I move and live,
And feel that I am happier than I know.'
While thus I called, and strayed I knew not whither,
From where I first drew air, and first beheld
This happy light, when answer none returned,
285 On a green shady bank profuse of flow'rs
Pensive I sat me down; there gentle sleep
First found me, and with soft oppression seized
My drowsèd sense, untroubled, though I thought
I then was passing to my former state
290 Insensible, and forthwith to dissolve:
When suddenly stood at my head a dream,
Whose inward apparition gently moved
My fancy to believe I yet had being,
And lived: one came, methought, of shape divine,
295 And said, 'Thy mansion <sup>o</sup> wants <sup>o</sup> thee, Adam, rise,
First man, of men innumerable ordained
First father, called by thee I come thy guide
To the garden of bliss, thy seat <sup>o</sup> prepared.'
So saying, by the hand he took me raised,
300 And over fields and waters, as in air

Smooth sliding without step, last led me up
A woody mountain whose high top was plain,
A circuit wide, enclosed, with goodliest trees
Planted, with walks, and bowers, that what I saw 305 Of earth before scarce pleasant seemed. Each tree
Load'n with fairest fruit, that hung to the eye
Tempting, stirred in me sudden appetite
To pluck and eat; whereat I waked, and found
Before mine eyes all real, as the dream
310 Had lively<sup>o</sup> shadowed: here had new begun
My wand'ring, had not he who was my guide
Up hither, from among the trees appeared,
Presence Divine. Rejoicing, but with awe
In adoration at his feet I fell
315 Submiss:<sup>o</sup> he reared me, and 'Whom thou sought'st
I am,'
Said mildly, 'Author of all this thou seest
Above, or round about thee or beneath.
This Paradise I give thee, count it thine
To till and keep,<sup>o</sup> and of the fruit to eat:
320 Of every tree that in the garden grows
Eat freely with glad heart; fear here no dearth:
But of the tree whose operation<sup>o</sup> brings
Knowledge of good and ill, which I have set
The pledge of thy obedience and thy faith,
325 Amid the garden by the Tree of Life,
Remember what I warn thee, shun to taste,
And shun the bitter consequence: for know,
The day thou eat'st thereof, my sole command
Transgressed, inevitably thou shalt die;
330 From that day mortal, and this happy state
Shalt lose, expelled from hence into a world
Of woe and sorrow.<sup>6</sup> Sternly he pronounced
The rigid interdiction,<sup>o</sup> which resounds
Yet dreadful in mine ear, though in my choice
335

Not to incur; but soon his clear aspect<sup>o</sup>
 Returned and gracious purpose<sup>o</sup> thus renewed:
 'Not only these fair bounds, but all the earth
 To thee and to thy race I give; as lords
 Possess it, and all things that therein live,
 340 Or live in sea, or air, beast, fish, and fowl.
 In sign whereof each bird and beast behold
 After their kinds; I bring them to receive
 From thee their names, and pay thee fealty
 With low subjection; understand the same
 345 Of fish within their wat'ry residence,
 Not hither summoned, since they cannot change
 Their element to draw the thinner air.'
 As thus he spake, each bird and beast behold
 Approaching two and two, these<sup>o</sup> cow'ring low
 350 With blandishment,<sup>o</sup> each bird stooped on his wing.
 I named them, as they passed, and understood
 Their nature, with such knowledge God endued
 My sudden apprehension:<sup>7</sup> but in these
 I found not what methought I wanted still;
 355 And to the heav'nly Vision thus presumed:
 " 'O by what name, for thou above all these,
 Above mankind, or aught than mankind higher,
 Surpassest far my naming,<sup>8</sup> how may I
 Adore thee, Author of this universe,
 360 And all this good to man, for whose well-being
 So amply, and with hands so liberal
 Thou hast provided all things: but with me
 I see not who partakes. In solitude
 What happiness, who can enjoy alone,
 365 Or all enjoying, what contentment find?'
 Thus I presumptuous; and the Vision bright,
 As with a smile more brightened, thus replied:
 " 'What call'st thou solitude? Is not the earth
 370 With various living creatures, and the air

Replenished,<sup>o</sup> and all these at thy command
 To come and play before thee? Know'st thou not Their language and their ways? They also know,<sup>o</sup>
 And reason not contemptibly; with these
 Find pastime, and bear rule; thy realm is large.'
 375 So spake the Universal Lord, and seemed
 So ordering. I with leave of speech implored,
 And humble deprecation thus replied:
 " 'Let not my words offend thee, Heav'nly Power,
 My Maker, be propitious while I speak.
 380 Hast thou not made me here thy substitute,
 And these inferior far beneath me set?
 Among unequals what society
 Can sort,<sup>o</sup> what harmony or true delight?
 Which must be mutual, in proportion due
 385 Giv'n and received; but in disparity
 The one intense, the other still remiss
 Cannot well suit with either,<sup>9</sup> but soon prove Tedious alike. Of fellowship I speak
 Such as I seek, fit to participate<sup>o</sup>
 390 All rational delight, wherein the brute
 Cannot be human consort; they rejoice
 Each with their kind, lion with lioness;
 So fitly them in pairs thou hast combined;
 Much less can bird with beast, or fish with fowl
 395 So well converse, nor with the ox the ape; Worse then can man with beast, and least of all.'
 "Whereto th' Almighty answered, not displeased:
 'A nice<sup>o</sup> and subtle happiness I see
 Thou to thyself proposest, in the choice
 400 Of thy associates, Adam, and wilt taste
 No pleasure, though in pleasure, solitary.
 What think'st thou then of me, and this my state?
 Seem I to thee sufficiently possessed
 Of happiness, or not? who am alone
 405

From all eternity, for none I know
Second to me or like, equal much less.
How have I then with whom to hold converse
Save with the creatures which I made, and those
To me inferior, infinite descents
410 Beneath what other creatures are to thee?’
“He ceased, I lowly answered: ‘To attain
The height and depth of thy eternal ways
All human thoughts come short, Supreme of things;
Thou in thyself art perfect, and in thee
415 Is no deficiency found; not so is man,
But in degree, the cause of his desire
By conversation with his like to help,
Or solace his defects.<sup>1</sup> No need that thou
Shouldst propagate, already infinite;
420 And through all numbers absolute, though One;
But man by number is to manifest
His single imperfection, and beget
Like of his like, his image multiplied,
In unity defective,<sup>2</sup> which requires 425 Collateral<sup>o</sup> love, and dearest amity.
Thou in thy secrecy<sup>o</sup> although alone,
Best with thyself accompanied, seek’st not
Social communication, yet so pleased,
Canst raise thy creature to what height thou wilt
430 Of union or communion, deified;
I by conversing cannot these erect
From prone, nor in their ways complacency<sup>o</sup> find.’
Thus I emboldened spake, and freedom used
Permissive,<sup>o</sup> and acceptance found, which gained 435 This answer from the gracious Voice Divine:
“ ‘Thus far to try thee, Adam, I was pleased,
And find thee knowing not of beasts alone,
Which thou hast rightly named, but of thyself,
Expressing well the spirit within thee free,
440

My image, not imparted to the brute,
Whose fellowship therefore unmeet<sup>o</sup> for thee
Good reason was thou freely shouldst dislike,
And be so minded still. I, ere thou spak'st,
445 Knew it not good for man to be alone,
And no such company as then thou saw'st
Intended thee, for trial only brought,
To see how thou couldst judge of fit and meet:
What next I bring shall please thee, be assured,
Thy likeness, thy fit help, thy other self,
450 Thy wish, exactly to thy heart's desire.<sup>3</sup>
    "He ended, or I heard no more, for now
My earthly by his heav'nly overpowered,
Which it had long stood under,<sup>o</sup> strained to the height
In that celestial colloquy sublime,
455 As with an object that excels<sup>o</sup> the sense,
Dazzled and spent, sunk down, and sought repair
Of sleep, which instantly fell on me, called
By nature as in aid, and closed mine eyes.
Mine eyes he closed, but open left the cell
460 Of fancy<sup>o</sup> my internal sight, by which Abstract<sup>o</sup> as in a trance methought I saw,
Though sleeping, where I lay, and saw the shape
Still glorious before whom awake I stood;
Who stooping opened my left side, and took 465 From thence a rib, with cordial<sup>o</sup> spirits warm,
And lifeblood streaming fresh; wide was the wound,
But suddenly with flesh filled up and healed:
The rib he formed and fashioned with his hands;
Under his forming hands a creature grew,
470 Manlike, but different sex, so lovely fair
That what seemed fair in all the world seemed now
Mean, or in her summed up, in her contained
And in her looks, which from that time infused

475 Sweetness into my heart, unfelt before,
And into all things from her air<sup>o</sup> inspired
The spirit of love and amorous delight.
She disappeared, and left me dark, I waked
To find her, or forever to deplore
Her loss, and other pleasures all abjure:
480 When out of hope, behold her, not far off,
Such as I saw her in my dream, adorned
With what all earth or heaven could bestow
To make her amiable:<sup>o</sup> on she came,
Led by her heav'nly Maker, though unseen,<sup>4</sup>
485 And guided by his voice, nor uninformed
Of nuptial sanctity and marriage rites:
Grace was in all her steps, Heav'n in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.
I overjoyed could not forbear aloud:
490 " 'This turn hath made amends; thou hast fulfilled
Thy words, Creator bounteous and benign,
Giver of all things fair, but fairest this
Of all thy gifts, nor enviest.<sup>o</sup> I now see
Bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh, my self
495 Before me; woman is her name, of man
Extracted; for this cause he shall forgo
Father and mother, and to his wife adhere;
And they shall be one flesh, one heart, one soul.<sup>5</sup>
"She heard me thus, and though divinely brought,
500 Yet innocence and virgin modesty,
Her virtue and the conscience<sup>o</sup> of her worth
That would be wooed, and not unsought be won,
Not obvious,<sup>o</sup> not obtrusive,<sup>o</sup> but retired,
The more desirable, or to say all,
505 Nature herself, though pure of sinful thought,
Wrought in her so that, seeing me, she turned;
I followed her, she what was honor knew,
And with obsequious<sup>o</sup> majesty approved

510 My pleaded reason. To the nuptial bow'r
I led her blushing like the morn: all heav'n,
And happy constellations on that hour
Shed their selectest influence; the earth
Gave sign of gratulation,<sup>o</sup> and each hill;
Joyous the birds; fresh gales and gentle airs<sup>6</sup>
515 Whispered it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, flung odors from the spicy shrub,
Disporting,<sup>o</sup> till the amorous bird of night<sup>o</sup>
Sung spousal, and bid haste the evening star<sup>o</sup>
On his hill top, to light the bridal lamp.
520 Thus I have told thee all my state, and brought
My story to the sum of earthly bliss
Which I enjoy, and must confess to find
In all things else delight indeed, but such
As used or not, works in the mind no change,
525 Nor vehement desire, these delicacies
I mean of taste, sight, smell, herbs, fruits, and flow'rs,
Walks, and the melody of birds; but here
Far otherwise, transported<sup>o</sup> I behold,
Transported touch; here passion first I felt,
530 Commotion<sup>o</sup> strange, in all enjoyments else
Superior and unmoved, here only weak
Against the charm of beauty's powerful glance.
Or<sup>o</sup> nature failed in me, and left some part
Not proof enough such object to sustain,<sup>o</sup>
535 Or from my side subducting,<sup>o</sup> took perhaps
More than enough; at least on her bestowed
Too much of ornament, in outward show
Elaborate, of inward less exact.
For well I understand in the prime end
540 Of nature her th' inferior, in the mind
And inward faculties, which most excel,
In outward also her resembling less

His image who made both, and less expressing
The character of that dominion giv'n
545 O'er other creatures; yet when I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute<sup>o</sup> she seems
And in herself complete, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say,
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best;
550 All higher knowledge in her presence falls
Degraded, wisdom in discourse with her
Loses discount'nanced,<sup>o</sup> and like folly shows;
Authority and reason on her wait,
As one intended first, not after made
555 Occasionally;<sup>o</sup> and to consummate all,
Greatness of mind and nobleness their seat
Build in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic placed."
To whom the angel with contracted brow:
560 "Accuse not nature, she hath done her part;
Do thou but thine, and be not diffident<sup>o</sup>
Of wisdom, she deserts thee not, if thou
Dismiss not her, when most thou need'st her nigh,
By attributing overmuch to things
565 Less excellent, as thou thyself perceiv'st.
For what admir'st thou, what transports thee so,
An outside? Fair no doubt, and worthy well
Thy cherishing, thy honoring, and thy love,
Not thy subjection: weigh with her thyself;
570 Then value: oft-times nothing profits more
Than self-esteem, grounded on just and right
Well managed; of that skill the more thou know'st,
The more she will acknowledge thee her head,<sup>z</sup>
And to realities yield all her shows:
575 Made so adorn for thy delight the more,
So awful,<sup>o</sup> that with honor thou may'st love
Thy mate, who sees when thou art seen least wise.

But if the sense of touch whereby mankind
Is propagated seem such dear delight
580 Beyond all other, think the same vouchsafed
To cattle and each beast; which would not be
To them made common and divulged,<sup>o</sup> if aught
Therein enjoyed were worthy to subdue
The soul of man, or passion in him move.
585 What higher in her society thou find'st
Attractive, human, rational, love still;
In loving thou dost well, in passion not,
Wherein true love consists not; love refines
The thoughts, and heart enlarges, hath his seat
590 In reason, and is judicious, is the scale<sup>8</sup>
By which to heav'nly love thou may'st ascend,
Not sunk in carnal pleasure, for which cause
Among the beasts no mate for thee was found.”
To whom thus half abashed Adam replied.
595 “Neither her outside formed so fair, nor aught
In procreation common to all kinds
(Though higher of the genial<sup>9</sup> bed by far,
And with mysterious reverence I deem)
So much delights me, as those graceful acts,
600 Those thousand decencies<sup>o</sup> that daily flow
From all her words and actions, mixed with love
And sweet compliance, which declare unfeigned
Union of mind, or in us both one soul;
Harmony to behold in wedded pair
605 More grateful than harmonious sound to the ear.
Yet these subject not; I to thee disclose
What inward thence I feel, not therefore foiled,<sup>o</sup>
Who meet with various objects, from the sense
Variously representing;<sup>1</sup> yet still free
610 Approve the best, and follow what I approve.
To love thou blam'st me not, for love thou say'st
Leads up to Heav'n, is both the way and guide;

Bear with me then, if lawful what I ask;
Love not the heav'nly Spirits, and how their love
615 Express they, by looks only, or do they mix
Irradiance, virtual or immediate<sup>o</sup> touch?"

To whom the angel with a smile that glowed
Celestial rosy red, love's proper hue,<sup>2</sup>
Answered. "Let it suffice thee that thou know'st
620 Us happy, and without love no happiness.
Whatever pure thou in the body enjoy'st
(And pure thou wert created) we enjoy
In eminence,<sup>o</sup> and obstacle find none
Of membrane, joint, or limb, exclusive bars:
625 Easier than air with air, if Spirits embrace,
Total they mix, union of pure with pure
Desiring; nor restrained conveyance need
As flesh to mix with flesh, or soul with soul.
But I can now no more; the parting sun
630 Beyond the earth's green cape and verdant isles
Hesperian sets,<sup>3</sup> my signal to depart.
Be strong, live happy, and love, but first of all
Him whom to love is to obey, and keep
His great command; take heed lest passion sway
635 Thy judgment to do aught, which else free will
Would not admit;<sup>o</sup> thine and of all thy sons
The weal or woe in thee is placed; beware.
I in thy persevering shall rejoice,
And all the blest: stand fast; to stand or fall
640 Free in thine own arbitrament<sup>o</sup> it lies.
Perfect within, no outward aid require;<sup>o</sup>
And all temptation to transgress repel."

So saying, he arose; whom Adam thus Followed with benediction. "Since to part,
645 Go heavenly guest, ethereal messenger,
Sent from whose sov'reign goodness I adore.
Gentle to me and affable hath been

Thy condescension, and shall be honored ever
 With grateful memory: thou to mankind
 Be good and friendly still,<sup>o</sup> and oft return."
 So parted they, the angel up to Heav'n
 From the thick shade, and Adam to his bow'r.

Endnotes

- Note 1: When Milton divided Book 7 of the ten-book version of 1667 into the present Books 7 and 8, he replaced a line reading "To whom thus Adam gratefully replied" with these introductory lines.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Her garden, where she "nurses" her flowers and plants.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The emphasis on choice suggests that Eve is not bound in Eden by the Pauline directive (1 Corinthians 14:34–35) that women refrain from speaking in church and instead learn at home from their husbands, but she voluntarily and for her own pleasure observes this hierarchical decorum.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Graces attended on Venus.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Presumably, God's ways with other worlds and other creatures inhabiting them (if any).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: To find ways of explaining discrepancies between their hypotheses and observed facts.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In the Ptolemaic system, observed irregularities in the motion of heavenly bodies were first explained by hypothesizing eccentric orbits, then by adding epicycles, which were smaller orbits whose centers ride on the circumference of the main eccentric circles and carry the planets. The Copernican system also had some recourse to epicycles.Return to reference 7
- Note 8:
 Raphael declines to "reveal" astronomical truth to Adam, leaving that matter open to human scientific speculation. He suggests here that Adam's Ptolemaic assumptions result from his earthbound perspective, and he implies that angels see the universe in different terms. In the following lines (122–58) he sets forth advanced scientific notions Adam had not imagined: not only Copernican astronomy but multiple universes and other inhabited planets.

- Note 9: Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and the moon. In the Ptolemaic system, the “seventh” is the sun; in the Copernican, earth.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Copernicus described the three motions as daily, annual, and “motion in declination” whereby the earth’s axis swerved so as always to point in the same direction.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Oblique paths that cross each other.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Wheel, that is, the primum mobile, which (if we accept the Ptolemaic system and “save the sun his labor”) revolves around the universe every twenty-four hours, carrying the planets and their spheres with it.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Compare Satan’s inability to remember his origins (5.856–63), from which he infers self-creation, whereas Adam infers a Maker (line 278).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Adam’s ability to name the creatures was said to signify his intuitive understanding of their natures.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Compare God’s commands to Adam (Genesis 1:28–30, 2:16–17) with Milton’s elaboration here.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Adam had already begun naming the sun and features of the earth (lines 272–74), but here he names (and thereby shows he understands) all living creatures.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Adam reasons, as the Scholastics did, from the creatures to the fact of a Creator, but he cannot name (and so indicates that he cannot understand) God, except as God reveals himself.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: As with poorly matched musical instruments, Adam’s string is too taut (“intense”) and the animals’ is too slack (“remiss”) to be in harmony (“suit”).Return to reference 9

- Note 1: God is absolutely perfect, man only relatively so ("in degree"), and thereby needs companionship with a fit mate to assuage ("solace") the "defects" arising from solitude.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: God, "though One," (line 421), contains all numbers, but man has to remedy the "imperfection" of being single (line 423) by procreating and thereby multiplying his single and thereby "defective" image (line 425).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Compare the account in Genesis 2:18 with Milton's elaboration.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Compare Eve's version of these events (4.440–91).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Compare the account in Genesis 2:23–24.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Both breezes and melodies. "Gales": winds.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: See 1 Corinthians 11:3: "the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The ladder of love, a Neoplatonic concept for the movement from sensual love to higher forms, and ultimately to love of God.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Both "nuptial" and "generative." Adam takes respectful issue with the apparent denigration of human sex in Raphael's account of the Neoplatonic ladder, which prompts his question about angelic sex (lines 615–17).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, various objects, variously represented to me by my senses.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: This is not likely to be an embarrassed blush: red is the color traditionally associated with Seraphim, who burn with ardor. Raphael's smile also glows with friendship for Adam and appreciation of his perceptive inference about angelic love.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Cape Verde, near Dakar, and the islands off that coast are the westernmost ("Hesperian") points of Africa.Return to reference 3

Book 9

The Argument

Satan having compassed the earth, with meditated guile returns as a mist by night into Paradise, enters into the serpent sleeping. Adam and Eve in the morning go forth to their labors, which Eve proposes to divide in several places, each laboring apart: Adam consents not, alleging the danger, lest that enemy, of whom they were forewarned, should attempt her found alone: Eve loath to be thought not circumspect or firm enough, urges her going apart, the rather desirous to make trial of her strength; Adam at last yields: the Serpent finds her alone; his subtle approach, first gazing, then speaking, with much flattery extolling Eve above all other creatures. Eve wondering to hear the Serpent speak, asks how he attained to human speech and such understanding not till now; the Serpent answers, that by tasting of a certain tree in the garden he attained both to speech and reason, till then void of both: Eve requires him to bring her to that tree, and finds it to be the Tree of Knowledge forbidden: the Serpent now grown bolder, with many wiles and arguments induces her at length to eat; she pleased with the taste deliberates a while whether to impart thereof to Adam or not, at last brings him of the fruit, relates what persuaded her to eat thereof: Adam at first amazed, but perceiving her lost, resolves through vehemence of love to perish with her; and extenuating the trespass, eats also of the fruit: the effects thereof in them both; they seek to cover their nakedness; then fall to variance and accusation of one another.

No more of talk where God or angel guest
With man, as with his friend, familiar used
To sit indulgent, and with him partake
Rural repast, permitting him the while

5 Venial<sup>o</sup> discourse unblamed: I now must change
Those notes to tragic; foul distrust, and breach
Disloyal on the part of man, revolt,
And disobedience: on the part of Heav'n
Now alienated, distance and distaste,<sup>o</sup>
10 Anger and just rebuke, and judgment giv'n,
That brought into this world a world of woe,
Sin and her shadow Death, and misery
Death's harbinger:<sup>o</sup> sad task, yet argument<sup>o</sup>
Not less but more heroic than the wrath
15 Of stern Achilles on his foe pursued
Thrice fugitive about Troy wall; or rage
Of Turnus for Lavinia disespoused,
Or Neptune's ire or Juno's, that so long
Perplexed the Greek and Cytherea's son;<sup>1</sup>
20 If answerable<sup>o</sup> style I can obtain
Of my celestial patroness, who deigns
Her nightly visitation unimplored,<sup>2</sup>
And dictates to me slumb'ring, or inspires
Easy my unpremeditated verse:
25 Since first this subject for heroic song
Pleased me long choosing, and beginning late;
Not sedulous<sup>o</sup> by nature to indite
Wars, hitherto the only argument<sup>o</sup>
Heroic deemed, chief mastery to dissect
30 With long and tedious havoc fabled knights
In battles feigned; the better fortitude
Of patience and heroic martyrdom
Unsung; or to describe races and games,
Or tilting furniture, emblazoned shields,
35 Impresses quaint, caparisons and steeds;
Bases<sup>3</sup> and tinsel trappings, gorgeous knights
At joust and tournament; then marshaled feast
Served up in hall with sewers,<sup>o</sup> and seneschals;<sup>o</sup>
The skill of artifice<sup>o</sup> or office mean,

40 Not that which justly gives heroic name
To person or to poem. Me of these
Nor skilled nor studious, higher argument
Remains,<sup>4</sup> sufficient of itself to raise
That name, unless an age too late, or cold
Climate, or years damp my intended wing
45 Depressed, and much they may, if all be mine,
Not hers who brings it nightly to my ear.
The sun was sunk, and after him the star
Of Hesperus,<sup>5</sup> whose office is to bring Twilight upon the earth, short arbiter
50 'Twixt day and night, and now from end to end
Night's hemisphere had veiled the horizon round:
When Satan who late<sup>o</sup> fled<sup>6</sup> before the threats
Of Gabriel out of Eden, now improved<sup>o</sup>
In meditated fraud and malice, bent
55 On man's destruction, maugre what might hap
Of heavier on himself,<sup>7</sup> fearless returned.
By night he fled, and at midnight returned
From compassing the earth, cautious of day,
Since Uriel regent of the sun descried
60 His entrance, and forewarned the Cherubim
That kept their watch; thence full of anguish driv'n,
The space of seven continued nights he rode
With darkness, thrice the equinoctial line<sup>o</sup>
He circled, four times crossed the car of Night
65 From pole to pole, traversing each colure;<sup>8</sup>
On the eighth returned, and on the coast averse<sup>o</sup>
From entrance on Cherubic watch, by stealth
Found unsuspected way. There was a place,
Now not, though sin, not time, first wrought the 70 change,
Where Tigris at the foot of Paradise
Into a gulf shot underground, till part
Rose up a fountain by the Tree of Life;

In with the river sunk, and with it rose
Satan involved<sup>o</sup> in rising mist, then sought
75 Where to lie hid. Sea he had searched and land
From Eden over Pontus,<sup>9</sup> and the pool
Maeotis, up beyond the river Ob;
Downward as far Antarctic; and in length
West from Orontes to the ocean barred
80 At Darien, thence to the land where flows
Ganges and Indus: thus the orb he roamed
With narrow<sup>o</sup> search; and with inspection deep
Considered every creature, which of all
Most opportune might serve his wiles, and found
85 The serpent subtlest beast of all the field.<sup>1</sup>
Him after long debate, irresolute<sup>o</sup>
Of<sup>o</sup> thoughts revolved, his final sentence<sup>o</sup> chose Fit vessel, fittest imp<sup>o</sup> of fraud, in whom
To enter, and his dark suggestions hide
90 From sharpest sight: for in the wily snake,
Whatever sleights<sup>o</sup> none would suspicious mark,
As from his wit and native subtlety
Proceeding, which in other beasts observed
Doubt<sup>o</sup> might beget of diabolic pow'r
95 Active within beyond the sense of brute.
Thus he resolved, but first from inward grief
His bursting passion into plaints thus poured:
"O earth, how like to Heav'n, if not preferred
More justly, seat worthier of gods, as built
100 With second thoughts, reforming what was old!
For what God after better worse would build?
Terrestrial heav'n, danced round by other heav'ns
That shine, yet bear their bright officious<sup>o</sup> lamps,
Light above light, for thee alone, as seems,<sup>2</sup>
105 In thee concent'ring all their precious beams
Of sacred influence: as God in Heav'n
Is center, yet extends to all, so thou

Centring receiv'st from all those orbs; in thee,
Not in themselves, all their known virtue appears
110 Productive in herb, plant, and nobler birth
Of creatures animate with gradual life
Of growth, sense, reason,<sup>3</sup> all summed up in man.
With what delight could I have walked thee round,
If I could joy in aught, sweet interchange
115 Of hill and valley, rivers, woods and plains,
Now land, now sea, and shores with forest crowned,
Rocks, dens, and caves; but I in none of these Find place or refuge; and the more I see
Pleasures about me, so much more I feel
120 Torment within me, as from the hateful siege<sup>o</sup>
Of contraries; all good to me becomes Bane,<sup>o</sup> and in Heav'n much worse would be my state.
But neither here seek I, no nor in Heav'n
To dwell, unless by mastering Heav'n's Supreme;
125 Nor hope to be myself less miserable
By what I seek, but others to make such
As I, though thereby worse to me redound:
For only in destroying I find ease
To my relentless thoughts; and him<sup>4</sup> destroyed,
130 Or won to what may work his utter loss,
For whom all this was made, all this will soon
Follow, as to him linked in weal or woe:
In woe then; that destruction wide may range:
To me shall be the glory sole among 135 The infernal Powers, in one day to have marred
What he Almighty styled,<sup>o</sup> six nights and days
Continued making, and who knows how long
Before had been contriving, though perhaps
Not longer than since I in one night freed
140 From servitude inglorious well-nigh half
Th' angelic name, and thinner left the throng

Of his adorers. He to be avenged,
And to repair his numbers thus impaired,
Whether such virtue<sup>o</sup> spent of old now failed
145 More angels to create, if they at least
Are his created, or to spite us more,
Determined to advance into our room
A creature formed of earth, and him endow,
Exalted from so base original,<sup>o</sup>
150 With Heav'nly spoils, our spoils: what he decreed
He effected; man he made, and for him built
Magnificent this world, and earth his seat,
Him lord pronounced, and, O indignity!
Subjected to his service angel wings,
155 And flaming ministers to watch and tend
Their earthy charge: of these the vigilance
I dread, and to elude, thus wrapped in mist
Of midnight vapor glide obscure, and pry
In every bush and brake, where hap<sup>o</sup> may find 160 The serpent sleeping, in whose mazy folds
To hide me, and the dark intent I bring.
O foul descent! that I who erst contended
With gods to sit the highest, am now constrained
Into a beast, and mixed with bestial slime,
165 This essence to incarnate and imbrute,<sup>5</sup>
That to the height of deity aspired;
But what will not ambition and revenge
Descend to? Who aspires must down as low
As high he soared, obnoxious<sup>o</sup> first or last 170 To basest things. Revenge, at first though sweet,
Bitter ere long back on itself recoils;
Let it; I reck<sup>o</sup> not, so it light well aimed,
Since higher I fall short, on him who next
Provokes my envy, this new favorite 175 Of Heav'n, this man of clay, son of despite,
Whom us the more to spite his Maker raised

From dust: spite then with spite is best repaid."

So saying, through each thicket dank or dry,
Like a black mist low creeping, he held on 180 His midnight search, where soonest he might find
The serpent: him fast sleeping soon he found
In labyrinth of many a round self-rolled,
His head the midst, well stored with subtle wiles:
Not yet in horrid shade or dismal den,
185 Nor nocent<sup>o</sup> yet, but on the grassy herb
Fearless unfeared he slept: in at his mouth
The Devil entered, and his brutal<sup>o</sup> sense,
In heart or head, possessing soon inspired
With act intelligential: but his sleep
190 Disturbed not, waiting close<sup>o</sup> th' approach of morn.
Now whenas sacred light began to dawn
In Eden on the humid flow'rs, that breathed
Their morning incense, when all things that breathe,
From th' earth's great altar send up silent praise
195 To the Creator, and his nostrils fill
With grateful<sup>o</sup> smell, forth came the human pair
And joined their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting<sup>o</sup> voice; that done, partake
The season, prime<sup>o</sup> for sweetest scents and airs:
200 Then c6mmune how that day they best may ply
Their growing work; for much their work outgrew
The hands' dispatch of two gard'ning so wide.
And Eve first to her husband thus began:
"Adam, well may we labor still<sup>o</sup> to dress 205 This garden, still to tend plant, herb, and flow'r,
Our pleasant task enjoined, but till more hands
Aid us, the work under our labor grows,
Luxurious<sup>o</sup> by restraint; what we by day
Lop overgrown, or prune, or prop, or bind,
210 One night or two with wanton<sup>o</sup> growth derides,
Tending to wild. Thou therefore now advise
Or hear what to my mind first thoughts present,

Let us divide our labors, thou where choice
Leads thee, or where most needs, whether to wind
215 The woodbine round this arbor, or direct
The clasping ivy where to climb, while I
In yonder spring<sup>o</sup> of roses intermixed
With myrtle, find what to redress<sup>o</sup> till noon:
For while so near each other thus all day
220 Our task we choose, what wonder if so near Looks intervene and smiles, or object new Casual discourse draw on, which intermits<sup>o</sup>
Our day's work brought to little, though begun
Early, and th' hour of supper comes unearned."
225 To whom mild answer Adam thus returned:
"Sole Eve, associate sole,<sup>6</sup> to me beyond
Compare above all living creatures dear,
Well hast thou motioned,<sup>o</sup> well thy thoughts employed
230 How we might best fulfill the work which here
God hath assigned us, nor of me shalt pass
Unpraised: for nothing lovelier can be found
In woman, than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.<sup>7</sup>
235 Yet not so strictly hath our Lord imposed
Labor, as to debar us when we need
Refreshment, whether food, or talk between,
Food of the mind, or this sweet intercourse
Of looks and smiles, for smiles from reason flow,
240 To brute denied, and are of love the food,
Love not the lowest end of human life.
For not to irksome toil, but to delight
He made us, and delight to reason joined.
These paths and bowers doubt not but our joint hands
245 Will keep from wilderness with ease, as wide
As we need walk, till younger hands ere long

Assist us: but if much converse perhaps
Thee satiate, to short absence I could yield.
For solitude sometimes is best society,
And short retirement urges sweet return.
250 But other doubt possesses me, lest harm
Befall thee severed from me; for thou know'st
What hath been warned us, what malicious foe
Envyng our happiness, and of his own
Despairing, seeks to work us woe and shame
255 By sly assault; and somewhere nigh at hand
Watches, no doubt, with greedy hope to find
His wish and best advantage, us asunder,
Hopeless to circumvent us joined, where each
To other speedy aid might lend at need;
260 Whether his first design be to withdraw
Our fealty<sup>o</sup> from God, or to disturb
Conjugal love, than which perhaps no bliss
Enjoyed by us excites his envy more;
Or<sup>o</sup> this, or worse, leave not the faithful side
265 That gave thee being, still shades thee and protects.
The wife, where danger or dishonor lurks,
Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures."
To whom the virgin<sup>8</sup> majesty of Eve,
270 As one who loves, and some unkindness meets,
With sweet austere composure thus replied.
"Offspring of Heav'n and earth, and all earth's lord,
That such an enemy we have, who seeks
Our ruin, both by thee informed I learn,
275 And from the parting angel overheard
As in a shady nook I stood behind,
Just then returned at shut of evening flow'rs.<sup>9</sup>
But that thou shouldst my firmness therefore doubt
To God or thee, because we have a foe
280

May tempt it, I expected not to hear.
 His violence thou fear'st not, being such,
 As we, not capable of death or pain,
 Can either not receive, or can repel.
 His fraud is then thy fear, which plain infers
 285 Thy equal fear that my firm faith and love
 Can by his fraud be shaken or seduced;
 Thoughts, which how found they harbor in thy breast,
 Adam, misthought of o her to thee so dear?"
 To whom with healing words Adam replied.
 290 "Daughter of God and man, immortal Eve,
 For such thou art, from sin and blame entire: o
 Not diffident o of thee do I dissuade
 Thy absence from my sight, but to avoid
 Th' attempt itself, intended by our foe.
 295 For he who tempts, though in vain, at least asperses o
 The tempted with dishonor foul, supposed
 Not incorruptible of faith, not proof
 Against temptation: thou thyself with scorn
 And anger wouldst resent the offered wrong,
 300 Though ineffectual found; misdeem not then,
 If such affront I labor to avert
 From thee alone, which on us both at once
 The enemy, though bold, will hardly dare,
 Or daring, first on me th' assault shall light.
 305 Nor thou his malice and false guile contemn; o
 Subtle he needs must be, who could seduce
 Angels, nor think superfluous others' aid.
 I from the influence of thy looks receive
 Access o in every virtue, in thy sight
 310 More wise, more watchful, stronger, if need were
 Of outward strength; while shame, thou looking on,
 Shame to be overcome or overreached o
 Would utmost vigor raise, and raised unite.

315 Why shouldst not thou like sense within thee feel
When I am present, and thy trial choose
With me, best witness of thy virtue tried.”
So spake domestic Adam in his care
And matrimonial love; but Eve, who thought
320 Less<sup>o</sup> attributed to her faith sincere,
Thus her reply with accent sweet renewed.
“If this be our condition, thus to dwell
In narrow circuit straitened<sup>o</sup> by a foe,
Subtle or violent, we not endued
325 Single with like defense, wherever met,
How are we happy, still<sup>o</sup> in fear of harm?
But harm precedes not sin: only our foe
Tempting affronts us with his foul esteem
Of our integrity: his foul esteem
330 Sticks no dishonor on our front,<sup>o</sup> but turns
Foul on himself; then wherefore shunned or feared
By us? who rather double honor gain
From his surmise proved false, find peace within,
Favor from Heav’n, our witness from th’ event.<sup>o</sup>
335 And what is faith, love, virtue unassayed
Alone, without exterior help sustained?<sup>1</sup>
Let us not then suspect our happy state
Left so imperfect by the Maker wise,
As not secure to single<sup>o</sup> or combined.
340 Frail is our happiness, if this be so,
And Eden were no Eden thus exposed.”
To whom thus Adam fervently replied.
“O woman, best are all things as the will
Of God ordained them, his creating hand
Nothing imperfect or deficient left
345 Of all that he created, much less man,
Or aught that might his happy state secure,
Secure from outward force; within himself
The danger lies, yet lies within his power:

350     Against his will he can receive no harm.
But God left free the will, for what obeys
Reason, is free, and reason he made right,<sup>2</sup>
But bid her well beware, and still erect,<sup>o</sup>
Lest by some fair appearing good surprised
She dictate false, and misinform the will 355     To do what God expressly hath forbid.
Not then mistrust, but tender love enjoins,
That I should mind<sup>o</sup> thee oft, and mind thou me.
Firm we subsist,<sup>o</sup> yet possible to swerve,
Since reason not impossibly may meet
360     Some specious<sup>o</sup> object by the foe suborned,
And fall into deception unaware,
Not keeping strictest watch, as she was warned.
Seek not temptation then, which to avoid
Were better, and most likely if from me
365     Thou sever not: trial will come unsought.
Wouldst thou approve<sup>o</sup> thy constancy, approve
First thy obedience; th' other who can know,
Not seeing thee attempted, who attest?
But if thou think, trial unsought may find 370     Us both securer<sup>o</sup> than thus warned thou seem'st,
Go; for thy stay, not free, absents thee more;
Go in thy native innocence, rely
On what thou hast of virtue, summon all,
For God towards thee hath done his part, do thine."
375     So spake the patriarch of mankind, but Eve
Persisted, yet submiss, though last, replied:
    "With thy permission then, and thus forewarned
Chiefly by what thy own last reasoning words
Touched only, that our trial, when least sought,
380     May find us both perhaps far less prepared,
The willinger I go, nor much expect
A foe so proud will first the weaker seek;
So bent, the more shall shame him his repulse."

385 Thus saying, from her husband's hand her hand
Soft she withdrew, and like a wood nymph light<sup>3</sup>
Oread or Dryad, or of Delia's train,
Betook her to the groves, but Delia's self
In gait surpassed and goddess-like deport,<sup>o</sup>
390 Though not as she with bow and quiver armed,
But with such gardening tools as art yet rude,
Guiltless of fire<sup>4</sup> had formed, or angels brought.
To Pales, or Pomona, thus adorned,
Likest she seemed Pomona when she fled
395 Vertumnus, or to Ceres in her prime,
Yet virgin of Proserpina from Jove.<sup>5</sup>
Her long with ardent look his eye pursued
Delighted, but desiring more her stay.
Oft he to her his charge of quick return
Repeated, she to him as oft engaged
400 To be returned by noon amid the bow'r,
And all things in best order to invite
Noontide repast, or afternoon's repose.
O much deceived, much failing,<sup>o</sup> hapless<sup>o</sup> Eve,
Of thy presumed return! event<sup>o</sup> perverse!
405 Thou never from that hour in Paradise
Found'st either sweet repast, or sound repose;
Such ambush hid among sweet flow'rs and shades
Waited with hellish rancor imminent
To intercept thy way, or send thee back
410 Despoiled of innocence, of faith, of bliss.
For now, and since first break of dawn the Fiend,
Mere serpent in appearance, forth was come,
And on his quest, where likeliest he might find
The only two of mankind, but in them
415 The whole included race, his purposed prey.
In bow'r and field he sought, where any tuft
Of grove or garden plot more pleasant lay,
Their tendance or plantation for delight,<sup>6</sup>

By fountain or by shady rivulet
420 He sought them both, but wished his hap<sup>o</sup> might find
Eve separate; he wished, but not with hope
Of what so seldom chanced, when to his wish,
Beyond his hope, Eve separate he spies,
425 Veiled in a cloud of fragrance, where she stood,
Half spied, so thick the roses bushing round
About her glowed, oft stooping to support
Each flow'r of slender stalk, whose head though gay
Carnation, purple, azure, or specked with gold,
Hung drooping unsustained, then she upstays
430 Gently with myrtle band, mindless<sup>o</sup> the while,
Herself, though fairest unsupported flow'r
From her best prop so far, and storm so nigh.<sup>7</sup>
Nearer he drew, and many a walk traversed
Of stateliest covert, cedar, pine, or palm,
435 Then voluble<sup>o</sup> and bold, now hid, now seen
Among thick-woven arborets<sup>o</sup> and flow'rs Embordered on each bank, the hand<sup>o</sup> of Eve:
Spot more delicious than those gardens feigned
Or<sup>o</sup> of revived Adonis, or renowned 440 Alcinous, host of old Laertes' son,
Or that, not mystic, where the sapient king
Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse.<sup>8</sup>
Much he the place admired, the person more.
As one who long in populous city pent,
445 Where houses thick and sewers annoy<sup>o</sup> the air,
Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe
Among the pleasant villages and farms
Adjoined, from each thing met conceives delight,
The smell of grain, or tedded grass, or kine,<sup>9</sup>
450 Or dairy, each rural sight, each rural sound;
If chance with nymph-like step fair virgin pass,
What pleasing seemed, for<sup>o</sup> her now pleases more,

She most, and in her look sums all delight.
Such pleasure took the Serpent to behold
455 This flow'ry plat,o the sweet recesso of Eve
Thus early, thus alone; her heav'nly form
Angelic, but more soft, and feminine,
Her graceful innocence, her every airo
Of gesture or least action overawed
460 His malice, and with rapine sweet<sup>1</sup> bereaved
His fierceness of the fierce intent it brought:
That space the Evil One abstractedo stood
From his own evil, and for the time remained
Stupidly good,o of enmity disarmed,
465 Of guile, of hate, of envy, of revenge;
But the hot hell that always in him burns,
Though in mid-Heav'n, soon ended his delight,
And tortures him now more, the more he sees
Of pleasure not for him ordained: then soon
470 Fierce hate he recollects, and all his thoughts
Of mischief gratulating,o thus excites:
    "Thoughts, whither have ye led me, with what sweet
Compulsion thus transported to forget
What hither brought us, hate, not love, nor hope
475 Of Paradise for Hell, hope here to taste
Of pleasure, but all pleasure to destroy,
Save what is in destroying, other joy
To me is lost. Then let me not let pass
Occasion which now smiles, behold alone
480 The woman, opportuneo to all attempts,
Her husband, for I view far round, not nigh,
Whose higher intellectual more I shun,
And strength, of courage haughty,o and of limb
Heroic built, though of terrestrialo mold,
485 Foe not formidable, exempt from wound,
I not; so much hath Hell debased, and pain

Enfeebled me, to what I was in Heav'n.
 She fair, divinely fair, fit love for gods,
 Not terrible,<sup>o</sup> though terror be in love
 490 And beauty, not<sup>o</sup> approached by stronger hate,
 Hate stronger, under show of love well feigned,
 The way which to her ruin now I tend."
 So spake the Enemy of mankind, enclosed
 In serpent, inmate bad, and toward Eve
 495 Addressed his way, not with indented<sup>o</sup> wave,
 Prone on the ground, as since, but on his rear,
 Circular base of rising folds, that tow'rd
 Fold above fold a surging maze, his head
 Crested aloft, and carbuncle<sup>o</sup> his eyes;
 500 With burnished neck of verdant<sup>o</sup> gold, erect
 Amidst his circling spires,<sup>o</sup> that on the grass
 Floated redundant:<sup>o</sup> pleasing was his shape,
 And lovely, never since of serpent kind
 Lovelier, not those that in Illyria changed
 505 Hermione and Cadmus, or the god
 In Epidaurus;<sup>2</sup> nor to which transformed
 Ammonian Jove, or Capitoline was seen,
 He with Olympias, this with her who bore
 Scipio, the height of Rome.<sup>3</sup> With tract<sup>o</sup> oblique
 510 At first, as one who sought accéss, but feared
 To interrupt, sidelong he works his way.
 As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought
 Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind
 Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail;
 515 So varied he, and of his tortuous train<sup>o</sup>
 Curled many a wanton<sup>o</sup> wreath in sight of Eve,
 To lure her eye; she busied heard the sound
 Of rustling leaves, but minded not, as used
 To such disport before her through the field,
 520 From every beast, more duteous at her call,
 Than at Circean call the herd disguised.<sup>4</sup>

He bolder now, uncalled before her stood;
But as in gaze admiring: oft he bowed
His turret crest, and sleek enameled<sup>o</sup> neck,
525 Fawning, and licked the ground whereon she trod.
His gentle dumb expression turned at length
The eye of Eve to mark his play; he glad
Of her attention gained, with serpent tongue
Organic, or impulse of vocal air,<sup>5</sup>
530 His fraudulent temptation thus began.

“Wonder not, sovereign mistress, if perhaps
Thou canst, who art sole wonder, much less arm
Thy looks, the heav’n of mildness, with disdain,
Displeased that I approach thee thus, and gaze
535 Insatiate, I thus single, nor have feared
Thy awful<sup>o</sup> brow, more awful thus retired.
Fairest resemblance of thy Maker fair,
Thee all things living gaze on, all things thine
By gift, and thy celestial beauty adore
540 With ravishment beheld, there best beheld
Where universally admired; but here
In this enclosure wild, these beasts among,
Beholders rude, and shallow to discern
Half what in thee is fair, one man except,
545 Who sees thee? (and what is one?) who shouldst be seen
A goddess among gods, adored and served
By angels numberless, thy daily train.”<sup>6</sup>

So glozed<sup>o</sup> the Tempter, and his proem<sup>o</sup> tuned;
550 Into the heart of Eve his words made way,
Though at the voice much marveling; at length
Not unamazed she thus in answer spake.
“What may this mean? Language of man pronounced
By tongue of brute, and human sense expressed?
555 The first at least of these I thought denied

To beasts, whom God on their creation day
Created mute to all articulate sound;
The latter I demur,<sup>o</sup> for in their looks
Much reason, and in their actions oft appears.
Thee, Serpent, subtlest beast of all the field
560 I knew, but not with human voice endued;<sup>o</sup>
Redouble then this miracle, and say,
How cam'st thou speakable<sup>o</sup> of mute, and how
To me so friendly grown above the rest
Of brutal kind, that daily are in sight?
565 Say, for such wonder claims attention due."
To whom the guileful Tempter thus replied:
"Empress of this fair world, resplendent Eve,
Easy to me it is to tell thee all
What thou command'st, and right thou shouldst be 570 obeyed:
I was at first as other beasts that graze
The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low,
As was my food, nor aught but food discerned
Or sex, and apprehended nothing high:
Till on a day roving the field, I chanced
575 A goodly tree far distant to behold
Loaden with fruit of fairest colors mixed,
Ruddy and gold: I nearer drew to gaze;
When from the boughs a savory odor blown,
Grateful to appetite, more pleased my sense
580 Than smell of sweetest fennel, or the teats
Of ewe or goat dropping with milk at ev'n,<sup>z</sup>
Unsucked of lamb or kid, that tend their play.
To satisfy the sharp desire I had
Of tasting those fair apples, I resolved
585 Not to defer;<sup>o</sup> hunger and thirst at once,
Powerful persuaders, quickened at the scent
Of that alluring fruit, urged me so keen.
About the mossy trunk I wound me soon,

590 For high from ground the branches would require
Thy utmost reach or Adam's: round the tree
All other beasts that saw, with like desire
Longing and envying stood, but could not reach.
Amid the tree now got, where plenty hung
Tempting so nigh, to pluck and eat my fill
595 I spared<sup>o</sup> not, for such pleasure till that hour
At feed or fountain never had I found.
Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me, to degree
Of reason in my inward powers, and speech
600 Wanted<sup>o</sup> not long, though to this shape retained.<sup>8</sup>
Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turned my thoughts, and with capacious mind
Considered all things visible in Heav'n,
Or earth, or middle,<sup>o</sup> all things fair and good;
605 But all that fair and good in thy divine
Semblance, and in thy beauty's heav'nly ray
United I beheld; no fair<sup>o</sup> to thine
Equivalent or second, which compelled
Me thus, though importune<sup>o</sup> perhaps, to come
610 And gaze, and worship thee of right declared
Sov'reign of creatures, universal dame."<sup>9</sup>

So talked the spirited<sup>1</sup> sly snake; and Eve
Yet more amazed unwary thus replied:
615 "Serpent, thy overpraising leaves in doubt
The virtue<sup>o</sup> of that fruit, in thee first proved:
But say, where grows the tree, from hence how far?
For many are the trees of God that grow
In Paradise, and various, yet unknown
To us, in such abundance lies our choice,
620 As leaves a greater store of fruit untouched,
Still hanging incorruptible, till men
Grow up to their provision,<sup>2</sup> and more hands
Help to disburden nature of her birth."

To whom the wily adder, blithe and glad:
 625 "Empress, the way is ready, and not long,
 Beyond a row of myrtles, on a flat,
 Fast by <sup>o</sup> a fountain, one small thicket past
 Of blowing myrrh and balm;<sup>3</sup> if thou accept
 My conduct,<sup>o</sup> I can bring thee thither soon."
 630 "Lead then," said Eve. He leading swiftly rolled
 In tangles, and made intricate seem straight,
 To mischief swift. Hope elevates, and joy
 Brightens his crest, as when a wand'ring fire,<sup>o</sup>
 Compact<sup>o</sup> of unctuous<sup>o</sup> vapor, which the night
 635 Condenses, and the cold environs round,
 Kindled through agitation to a flame,
 Which oft, they say, some evil spirit attends,
 Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
 Misleads th' amazed<sup>o</sup> night-wanderer from his way
 640 To bogs and mires, and oft through pond or pool,
 There swallowed up and lost, from succor far.
 So glistered the dire snake, and into fraud
 Led Eve our credulous mother, to the tree
 Of prohibition, root of all our woe;
 645 Which when she saw, thus to her guide she spake:
 "Serpent, we might have spared our coming hither,
 Fruitless to me, though fruit be here to excess,
 The credit of whose virtue<sup>o</sup> rest with thee,
 Wondrous indeed, if cause of such effects.
 650 But of this tree we may not taste nor touch;
 God so commanded, and left that command
 Sole daughter of his voice;<sup>4</sup> the rest, we live
 Law to ourselves, our reason is our law."
 To whom the Tempter guilefully replied:
 655 "Indeed? hath God then said that of the fruit
 Of all these garden trees ye shall not eat,
 Yet lords declared of all in earth or air?"
 To whom thus Eve yet sinless: "Of the fruit

660 Of each tree in the garden we may eat,
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst
The garden, God hath said, 'Ye shall not eat
Thereof, nor shall ye touch it, lest ye die.' "5
She scarce had said, though brief, when now more bold
665 The Tempter, but with show of zeal and love
To man, and indignation at his wrong,
New part puts on, and as to passion moved,
Fluctuates disturbed, yet comely, and in act
Raised, 6 as of some great matter to begin.
As when of old some orator renowned 670 In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence Flourished, since mute, to some great cause addressed,
Stood in himself collected, while each part,
Motion, each act won audience ere the tongue, 9
Sometimes in height began, as no delay
675 Of preface brooking 7 through his zeal of right.
So standing, moving, or to high upgrown
The Tempter all impassioned thus began:
"O sacred, wise, and wisdom-giving plant,
680 Mother of science, 9 now I feel thy power
Within me clear, not only to discern
Things in their causes, but to trace the ways
Of highest agents, deemed however wise.
Queen of this universe, do not believe
Those rigid threats of death; ye shall not die:
685 How should ye? By the fruit? It gives you life
To knowledge. 8 By the Threat'ner? Look on me,
Me who have touched and tasted, yet both live,
And life more perfect have attained than fate
Meant me, by vent'ring higher than my lot.
690 Shall that be shut to man, which to the beast
Is open? Or will God incense his ire

For such a petty trespass, and not praise
Rather your dauntless virtue,<sup>o</sup> whom the pain
Of death denounced,<sup>o</sup> whatever thing death be,
695 Deterred not from achieving what might lead
To happier life, knowledge of good and evil;
Of good, how just?<sup>9</sup> Of evil, if what is evil
Be real, why not known, since easier shunned?
God therefore cannot hurt ye, and be just;
700 Not just, not God; not feared then,<sup>1</sup> nor obeyed:
Your fear itself of death removes the fear.
Why then was this forbid? Why but to awe,
Why but to keep ye low and ignorant,
His worshippers; he knows that in the day
705 Ye eat thereof, your eyes that seem so clear,
Yet are but dim, shall perfectly be then
Opened and cleared, and ye shall be as gods,<sup>2</sup>
Knowing both good and evil as they know.
That ye should be as gods, since I as man,
710 Internal man, is but proportion meet,
I of brute human, ye of human gods.<sup>3</sup>
So ye shall die perhaps, by putting off
Human, to put on gods, death to be wished,
Though threatened, which no worse than this can 715 bring.
And what are gods that man may not become
As they, participating<sup>o</sup> godlike food?
The gods are first, and that advantage use
On our belief, that all from them proceeds;
I question it, for this fair earth I see,
720 Warmed by the sun, producing every kind,
Them nothing: if they all<sup>o</sup> things, who enclosed
Knowledge of good and evil in this tree,
That whoso eats thereof, forthwith attains
Wisdom without their leave? And wherein lies 725 Th' offense, that man should thus attain to know?

What can your knowledge hurt him, or this tree
Impart against his will if all be his?
Or is it envy, and can envy dwell
In heav'nly breasts? These, these and many more 730 Causes import<sub>o</sub> your need of this fair fruit.
Goddess humane,<sup>4</sup> reach then, and freely taste."
He ended, and his words replete with guile
Into her heart too easy entrance won:
Fixed on the fruit she gazed, which to behold
735 Might tempt alone, and in her ears the sound
Yet rung of his persuasive words, impregn'd<sub>o</sub>
With reason, to her seeming, and with truth;
Meanwhile the hour of noon drew on, and waked
An eager appetite, raised by the smell
740 So savory of that fruit, which with desire,
Inclinable now grown to touch or taste,
Solicited her longing eye; yet first
Pausing a while, thus to herself she mused:
"Great are thy virtues,<sub>o</sub> doubtless, best of fruits,
745 Though kept from man, and worthy to be admired,
Whose taste, too long forborne, at first assay<sub>o</sub>
Gave elocution to the mute, and taught
The tongue not made for speech to speak thy praise:
Thy praise he also who forbids thy use,
750 Conceals not from us, naming thee the Tree
Of Knowledge, knowledge both of good and evil;
Forbids us then to taste, but his forbidding
Commends thee more, while it infers<sub>o</sub> the good
By thee communicated, and our want:<sub>o</sub> 755 For good unknown, sure is not had, or had
And yet unknown, is as not had at all.
In plain<sub>o</sub> then, what forbids he but to know,
Forbids us good, forbids us to be wise?
Such prohibitions bind not. But if death
760 Bind us with after-bands,<sub>o</sub> what profits then

Our inward freedom? In the day we eat
 Of this fair fruit, our doom is, we shall die.
 How dies the serpent? He hath eat'n and lives,
 And knows, and speaks, and reasons, and discerns,
 765 Irrational till then. For us alone
 Was death invented? Or to us denied
 This intellectual food, for beasts reserved?
 For beasts it seems: yet that one beast which first
 Hath tasted, envies<sup>o</sup> not, but brings with joy
 770 The good befall'n him, author unsuspect,<sup>5</sup>
 Friendly to man, far from deceit or guile.
 What fear I then, rather what know to fear
 Under this ignorance of good and evil,
 Of God or death, of law or penalty?
 775 Here grows the cure of all, this fruit divine,
 Fair to the eye, inviting to the taste,
 Of virtue<sup>o</sup> to make wise: what hinders then
 To reach, and feed at once both body and mind?"
 So saying, her rash hand in evil hour
 780 Forth reaching to the fruit, she plucked, she eat.<sup>6</sup>
 Earth felt the wound, and nature from her seat
 Sighing through all her works gave signs of woe,
 That all was lost. Back to the thicket slunk
 The guilty serpent, and well might, for Eve
 785 Intent now wholly on her taste, naught else
 Regarded, such delight till then, as seemed,
 In fruit she never tasted, whether true
 Or fancied so, through expectation high
 Of knowledge, nor was godhead from her thought.
 790 Greedily she engorged without restraint,
 And knew not eating death:<sup>7</sup> satiate at length,
 And heightened as with wine, jocund<sup>o</sup> and boon,<sup>o</sup>
 Thus to herself she pleasingly began:
 "O sov'reign, virtuous, precious of all trees
 795 In Paradise, of operation blest

To sapience, hitherto obscured, infamed,<sup>8</sup>
And thy fair fruit let hang, as to no end
Created; but henceforth my early care,
800 Shall tend thee, and the fertile burden ease
Of thy full branches offered free to all;
Till dieted by thee I grow mature
In knowledge, as the gods who all things know;
Though others envy what they cannot give;
805 For had the gift been theirs,<sup>9</sup> it had not here
Thus grown. Experience, next to thee I owe,
Best guide; not following thee, I had remained
In ignorance, thou open'st wisdom's way,
And giv'st access, though secret<sup>o</sup> she retire.
810 And I perhaps am secret;<sup>o</sup> Heav'n is high,
High and remote to see from thence distinct
Each thing on earth; and other care perhaps
May have diverted from continual watch
Our great Forbidder, safe with all his spies
815 About him. But to Adam in what sort<sup>o</sup>
Shall I appear? Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake
Full happiness with me, or rather not,
But keep the odds<sup>o</sup> of knowledge in my power
820 Without copartner? so to add what wants<sup>o</sup>
In female sex, the more to draw his love,
And render me more equal, and perhaps,
A thing not undesirable, sometime
Superior; for inferior who is free?<sup>1</sup>
825 This may be well: but what if God have seen,
And death ensue? Then I shall be no more,
And Adam wedded to another Eve,
Shall live with her enjoying, I extinct;
A death to think. Confirmed then I resolve,
830 Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe:

So dear I love him, that with him all deaths
I could endure, without him live no life."

835 So saying, from the tree her step she turned,
But first low reverence done, as to the power
That dwelt within,<sup>2</sup> whose presence had infused
Into the plant sciential<sup>o</sup> sap, derived
From nectar, drink of gods. Adam the while Waiting desirous her return, had wove
Of choicest flow'rs a garland to adorn
840 Her tresses, and her rural labors crown,
As reapers oft are wont<sup>o</sup> their harvest queen.
Great joy he promised to his thoughts, and new Solace in her return, so long delayed;
Yet oft his heart, divine of<sup>o</sup> something ill,
845 Misgave him; he the falt'ring measure<sup>o</sup> felt;
And forth to meet her went, the way she took
That morn when first they parted; by the Tree
Of Knowledge he must pass; there he her met,
Scarce from the tree returning; in her hand
850 A bough of fairest fruit that downy smiled,
New gathered, and ambrosial<sup>o</sup> smell diffused.
To him she hasted, in her face excuse
Came prologue,<sup>3</sup> and apology to prompt,
Which with bland<sup>o</sup> words at will she thus addressed.
855 "Hast thou not wondered, Adam, at my stay?
Thee I have missed, and thought it long, deprived
Thy presence, agony of love till now
Not felt, nor shall be twice, for never more
Mean I to try, what rash untried I sought,
860 The pain of absence from thy sight. But strange
Hath been the cause, and wonderful to hear:
This tree is not as we are told, a tree
Of danger tasted,<sup>o</sup> nor to evil unknown
Op'ning the way, but of divine effect
865 To open eyes, and make them gods who taste;

And hath been tasted such: the serpent wise,
 Or<sup>o</sup> not restrained as we, or not obeying,
 Hath eaten of the fruit, and is become,
 Not dead, as we are threatened, but thenceforth
 870 Endued with human voice and human sense,
 Reasoning to admiration,<sup>o</sup> and with me
 Persuasively<sup>o</sup> hath so prevailed, that I
 Have also tasted, and have also found
 Th' effects to correspond, opener mine eyes,
 875 Dim erst,<sup>o</sup> dilated spirits, ampler heart,
 And growing up to godhead; which for thee
 Chiefly I sought, without thee can despise.
 For bliss, as thou hast part, to me is bliss,
 Tedious, unshared with thee, and odious soon.
 880 Thou therefore also taste, that equal lot
 May join us, equal joy, as equal love;
 Lest thou not tasting, different degree<sup>o</sup>
 Disjoin us, and I then too late renounce
 Deity for thee, when fate will not permit."<sup>4</sup>
 885     Thus Eve with count'nance blithe her story told;
 But in her cheek distemper<sup>5</sup> flushing glowed.
 On th' other side, Adam, soon as he heard
 The fatal trespass done by Eve, amazed,<sup>o</sup>
 Astonied<sup>o</sup> stood and blank, while horror chill
 890 Ran through his veins, and all his joints relaxed;
 From his slack hand the garland wreathed for Eve
 Down dropped, and all the faded roses shed:
 Speechless he stood and pale, till thus at length
 First to himself he inward silence broke:
 895     "O fairest of creation, last and best
 Of all God's works, creature in whom excelled
 Whatever can to sight or thought be formed,
 Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!
 How art thou lost, how on a sudden lost,
 900 Defaced, deflow'ed, and now to death devote?<sup>o</sup>

Rather how hast thou yielded to transgress
 The strict forbiddance, how to violate
 The sacred<sup>o</sup> fruit forbidd'n! Some cursèd fraud
 Of enemy hath beguiled thee, yet unknown,
 905 And me with thee hath ruined, for with thee
 Certain my resolution is to die;
 How can I live without thee, how forgo
 Thy sweet converse and love so dearly joined,
 To live again in these wild woods forlorn?
 910 Should God create another Eve, and I
 Another rib afford, yet loss of thee
 Would never from my heart; no no, I feel
 The link of nature draw me: flesh of flesh,
 915 Bone of my bone thou art,<sup>6</sup> and from thy state
 Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe."
 So having said, as one from sad dismay
 Recomforted, and after thoughts disturbed
 Submitting to what seemed remédiless,
 Thus in calm mood his words to Eve he turned:
 920 "Bold deed thou hast presumed, advent'rous Eve,
 And peril great provoked, who thus hast dared
 Had it been only coveting to eye
 That sacred fruit, sacred<sup>o</sup> to abstinence,
 Much more to taste it under ban to touch.
 925 But past who can recall, or done undo?
 Not God omnipotent, nor fate; yet so
 Perhaps thou shalt not die, perhaps the fact<sup>o</sup>
 Is not so heinous now, foretasted fruit,
 Profaned first by the serpent, by him first 930 Made common and unhallowed ere our taste;
 Nor yet on him found deadly, he yet lives,
 Lives, as thou saidst, and gains to live as man
 Higher degree of life, inducement strong
 To us, as likely tasting to attain
 935 Proportional ascent, which cannot be

But to be gods, or angels demigods.
Nor can I think that God, Creator wise,
Though threat'ning, will in earnest so destroy
Us his prime creatures, dignified so high,
940 Set over all his works, which in our fall,
For us created, needs with us must fail,
Dependent made; so God shall uncreate,
Be frustrate, do, undo, and labor lose,
Not well conceived of God, who though his power
945 Creation could repeat, yet would be loath
Us to abolish, lest the Adversary<sup>o</sup>
Triumph and say; 'Fickle their state whom God
Most favors, who can please him long? Me first
He ruined, now mankind; whom will he next?'
950 Matter of scorn, not to be given the Foe.
However I with thee have fixed my lot,
Certain<sup>o</sup> to undergo like doom; if death
Consort<sup>o</sup> with thee, death is to me as life;
So forcible within my heart I feel
955 The bond of nature draw me to my own,
My own in thee, for what thou art is mine;
Our state cannot be severed, we are one,
One flesh; to lose thee were to lose myself."
So Adam, and thus Eve to him replied:
960 "O glorious trial of exceeding<sup>7</sup> love,
Illustrious evidence, example high!
Engaging me to emulate, but short
Of thy perfection, how shall I attain,
Adam, from whose dear side I boast me sprung,
965 And gladly of our union hear thee speak,
One heart, one soul in both; whereof good proof
This day affords, declaring thee resolved,
Rather than death or aught<sup>o</sup> than death more dread
Shall separate us, linked in love so dear,
970 To undergo with me one guilt, one crime,

If any be, of tasting this fair fruit,
Whose virtue, <sup>o</sup> for of good still good proceeds,
Direct, or by occasion <sup>o</sup> hath presented
This happy trial of thy love, which else
975 So eminently never had been known.
Were it <sup>o</sup> I thought death menaced would ensue <sup>o</sup>
This my attempt, I would sustain alone
The worst, and not persuade thee, rather die
Deserted, than oblige <sup>o</sup> thee with a fact <sup>o</sup>
980 Pernicious to thy peace, chiefly assured
Remarkably so late of thy so true,
So faithful love unequaled; <sup>8</sup> but I feel
Far otherwise th' event, <sup>o</sup> not death, but life
Augmented, opened eyes, new hopes, new joys,
985 Taste so divine, that what of sweet before Hath touched my sense, flat seems to this, and harsh.
On my experience, Adam, freely taste,
And fear of death deliver to the winds."
So saying, she embraced him, and for joy
990 Tenderly wept, much won that he his love
Had so ennobled, as of choice to incur
Divine displeasure for her sake, or death.
In recompense (for such compliance bad
Such recompense best merits) from the bough
995 She gave him of that fair enticing fruit
With liberal hand: he scrupled not to eat
Against his better knowledge, not deceived, <sup>9</sup>
But fondly <sup>o</sup> overcome with female charm.
Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
1000 In pangs, and nature gave a second groan;
Sky loured, and muttering thunder, some sad drops
Wept at completing of the mortal sin
Original; <sup>1</sup> while Adam took no thought,
Eating his fill, nor Eve to iterate <sup>o</sup>
1005

Her former trespass feared, the more to soothe
Him with her loved society, that now
As with new wine intoxicated both
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
Divinity within them breeding wings
1010 Wherewith to scorn the earth: but that false fruit
Far other operation first displayed,
Carnal desire inflaming, he on Eve
Began to cast lascivious eyes, she him
As wantonly repaid; in lust they burn:
1015 Till Adam thus 'gan Eve to dalliance move:
    "Eve, now I see thou art exact of taste,
And elegant, of sapience<sup>2</sup> no small part,
Since to each meaning savor we apply,
And palate call judicious; I the praise
1020 Yield thee, so well this day thou hast purveyed.<sup>o</sup>
Much pleasure we have lost, while we abstained
From this delightful fruit, nor known till now
True relish, tasting; if such pleasure be
In things to us forbidden, it might be wished,
1025 For this one tree had been forbidden ten.
But come, so well refreshed, now let us play,
As meet<sup>o</sup> is, after such delicious fare;
For never did thy beauty since the day
I saw thee first and wedded thee, adorned
1030 With all perfections, so inflame my sense
With ardor to enjoy thee, fairer now
Than ever, bounty of this virtuous tree."
    So said he, and forbore not glance or toy<sup>o</sup>
Of amorous intent, well understood
1035 Of<sup>o</sup> Eve, whose eye darted contagious fire.
Her hand he seized, and to a shady bank,
Thick overhead with verdant roof embow'ed
He led her nothing loath; flow'rs were the couch,
Pansies, and violets, and asphodel,
1040

And hyacinth, earth's freshest softest lap.
 There they their fill of love and love's disport
 Took largely, of their mutual guilt the seal,
 The solace of their sin, till dewy sleep
 Oppressed them, wearied with their amorous play.
 1045 Soon as the force of that fallacious fruit,
 That with exhilarating vapor bland<sup>o</sup>
 About their spirits had played, and inmost powers
 Made err, was now exhaled, and grosser sleep
 Bred of unkindly fumes,<sup>o</sup> with conscious dreams
 1050 Encumbered,<sup>o</sup> now had left them, up they rose
 As from unrest, and each the other viewing,
 Soon found their eyes how opened, and their minds
 How darkened; innocence, that as a veil
 Had shadowed them from knowing ill, was gone,
 1055 Just confidence, and native righteousness,
 And honor from about them, naked left
 To guilty shame: he<sup>o</sup> covered, but his robe
 Uncovered more. So rose the Danite strong
 Hercúlean Samson from the harlot-lap
 1060 Of Philistéan Dálilah, and waked
 Shorn of his strength,<sup>3</sup> they destitute and bare
 Of all their virtue: silent, and in face
 Confounded long they sat, as stricken mute,
 Till Adam, though not less than Eve abashed,
 1065 At length gave utterance to these words constrained:
<sup>o</sup>
 "O Eve, in evil<sup>4</sup> hour thou didst give ear
 To that false worm, of whomsoever taught
 To counterfeit man's voice, true in our fall,
 False in our promised rising; since our eyes
 1070 Opened we find indeed, and find we know
 Both good and evil, good lost and evil got,<sup>5</sup>
 Bad fruit of knowledge, if this be to know,
 Which leaves us naked thus, of honor void,

Of innocence, of faith, of purity,
1075 Our wonted<sup>o</sup> ornaments now soiled and stained,
And in our faces evident the signs
Of foul concupiscence;<sup>6</sup> whence evil store;
Even shame, the last of evils; of the first
Be sure then. How shall I behold the face
1080 Henceforth of God or angel, erst with joy
And rapture so oft beheld? Those heav'nly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly, with their blaze
Insufferably bright. O might I here
In solitude live savage, in some glade
1085 Obscured, where highest woods impenetrable
To star or sunlight, spread their umbrage<sup>o</sup> broad,
And brown as evening: cover me ye pines,
Ye cedars, with innumerable boughs
Hide me, where I may never see them more.
1090 But let us now, as in bad plight, devise
What best may for the present serve to hide
The parts of each from other, that seem most
To shame obnoxious,<sup>o</sup> and unseemliest seen,
Some tree whose broad smooth leaves together
1095       sewed,
And girded on our loins, may cover round
Those middle parts, that this newcomer, shame,
There sit not, and reproach us as unclean."
      So counseled he, and both together went Into the thickest wood, there soon they chose 1100 The fig tree,<sup>z</sup> not that kind for fruit renowned,
But such as at this day to Indians known
In Malabar or Deccan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
1105 About the mother tree, a pillared shade
High overarched, and echoing walks between;
There oft the Indian herdsman shunning heat

Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds
At loopholes cut through thickest shade: those 1110 leaves
They gathered, broad as Amazonian targe,<sup>o</sup>
And with what skill they had, together sewed,
To gird their waist, vain covering if to hide
Their guilt and dreaded shame. O how unlike
To that first naked glory. Such of late
1115 Columbus found th' American so girt
With feathered cincture,<sup>o</sup> naked else and wild,
Among the trees on isles and woody shores.
Thus fenced, and as they thought, their shame in part
Covered, but not at rest or ease of mind,
1120 They sat them down to weep, nor only tears
Rained at their eyes, but high winds worse within Began to rise, high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord, and shook sore
Their inward state of mind, calm region once
1125 And full of peace, now tossed and turbulent:
For understanding ruled not, and the will Heard not her lore, both in subjection now
To sensual appetite, who from beneath
Usurping over sov'reign reason claimed
1130 Superior sway: from thus distempered breast,<sup>8</sup>
Adam, estranged<sup>o</sup> in look and altered style,
Speech intermitted<sup>o</sup> thus to Eve renewed:
"Would thou hadst hearkened to my words, and stayed
With me, as I besought thee, when that strange
1135 Desire of wand'ring this unhappy morn,
I know not whence possessed thee; we had then
Remained still happy, not as now, despoiled
Of all our good, shamed, naked, miserable.

Let none henceforth seek needless cause to approve<sup>o</sup>

The faith they owe; when earnestly they seek Such proof, conclude, they then begin to fail."

To whom soon moved with touch of blame thus Eve:

1145 "What words have passed thy lips, Adam severe,
Imput'st thou that to my default, or will
Of wand'ring, as thou call'st it, which who knows
But might as ill have happened thou being by,
Or to thyself perhaps: hadst thou been there,
Or here th' attempt, thou couldst not have discerned
Fraud in the serpent, speaking as he spake;
1150 No ground of enmity between us known,
Why he should mean me ill, or seek to harm.
Was I to have never parted from thy side?
As good have grown there still a lifeless rib.
Being as I am, why didst not thou the head
1155 Command me absolutely not to go,
Going into such danger as thou saidst?
Too facile<sup>o</sup> then thou didst not much gainsay,<sup>o</sup>
Nay didst permit, approve, and fair dismiss.
Hadst thou been firm and fixed in thy dissent,
1160 Neither had I transgressed, nor thou with me."

To whom then first incensed Adam replied.
"Is this the love, is this the recompense
Of mine to thee, ingrateful Eve, expressed<sup>o</sup>
Immutable when thou wert lost, not I,
1165 Who might have lived and joyed immortal bliss,
Yet willingly chose rather death with thee:
And am I now upbraided, as the cause
Of thy transgressing? not enough severe,
It seems, in thy restraint: what could I more?
1170 I warned thee, I admonished thee, foretold
The danger, and the lurking enemy
That lay in wait; beyond this had been force,

And force upon free will hath here no place.
 But confidence then bore thee on, secure<sup>o</sup>
 1175 Either to meet no danger, or to find
 Matter of glorious trial; and perhaps
 I also erred in overmuch admiring
 What seemed in thee so perfect, that I thought
 No evil durst attempt thee, but I rue 1180 That error now, which is become my crime,
 And thou th' accuser. Thus it shall befall
 Him who to worth in women overtrusting
 Lets her will rule; restraint she will not brook,<sup>o</sup>
 And left to herself, if evil thence ensue,
 1185 She first his weak indulgence will accuse."
 Thus they in mutual accusation spent
 The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning,
 And of their vain contest appeared no end.

Endnotes

- Note 1:
 In this fourth proem (lines 1–47), after signaling his change from pastoral to tragic mode (lines 1–6), Milton emphasizes tragic elements in several classical epics: Achilles pursuing Hector three times around the wall of Troy before killing him (Iliad 22); Turnus fighting Aeneas over the loss of his betrothed Lavinia, and then killed by Aeneas; Odysseus ("the Greek") and Aeneas ("Cytherea's son," that is, Venus's son) tormented ("perplexed") by Neptune (Poseidon) and Juno, respectively.
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Milton does not here invoke the Muse but testifies to her customary nightly visits. Milton's nephew reports that he often awoke in the morning with lines of poetry fully formed in his head, ready to dictate them to a scribe.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Cloth coverings for horses; "tilting furniture": equipment for jousting; "impresses quaint": cunningly designed heraldic devices on shields; "caparisons": ornamental trappings or armor for horses. After rejecting the classical epic subjects, Milton here rejects the familiar topics of romance.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: For a heroic poem. He proceeds to recap worries he has voiced before: that the times might not be receptive to such poems ("age too late"), that the "cold Climate" of England or his own advanced age might "damp" (benumb, dampen) his "intended wing / Depressed" (poetic flights held down, kept from soaring).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Venus, the evening star.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: At the end of Book 4.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, despite ("maugre") what might result in heavier punishments for himself.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The colures are two great circles that intersect at right angles at the poles. By circling the globe from east to west at the equator and then over the north and south poles, Satan can remain in darkness, keeping the earth between himself and the sun. "Car of Night" (line 65): the earth's shadow, imagined as the chariot of the goddess Night.Return to reference 8
- Note 9:
The Black Sea. Satan's journey (lines 77–82) takes him from there to the Sea of Azov in Russia ("Maeotis"), beyond the river "Ob" in Siberia, which flows into the Arctic Ocean, then south to Antarctica; thence west from "Orontes" (a river in Syria) across the Atlantic to "Darien" (the Isthmus of Panama), then across the Pacific and Asia to India where the "Ganges" and "Indus" rivers flow.
Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The serpent is so described in Genesis 3:1.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Like Adam (8.15ff.) and Eve (4.657–58) but not Raphael (8.114–78), Satan assumes a Ptolemaic universe centered on the earth and humankind.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Graduated in steps ("gradual," 112) from vegetable to animal to rational forms (souls); compare 5.469–90.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Adam. "This" (line 132): the universe.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Satan "imbruting" himself in a snake parodies, grotesquely, the Son's incarnation in human form, as Christ.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Adam puns on "sole" as "unrivalled" and "only" (see 4.411).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Adam's compliments resemble the praises of a good wife in Proverbs 31.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The term here means unspotted or peerless; Milton has insisted at the end of Books 4 and 8 that Adam and Eve have sex.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Somewhat confusing, since Eve heard the full story of the war in Heaven and Raphael's earlier warnings; Raphael's parting words (8.630–43) overheard by Eve do not specifically mention Satan but warn Adam to resist his passion for Eve. He does, however, reiterate the charge to obey the "great command" and repel temptation.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Compare with Areopagitica, p. 1413.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Right reason, a classical concept accommodated to Christian thought, is the God-given power to apprehend truth and moral law.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Light-footed, with overtones of "fickle" or "frivolous." "Oread" (next line): a mountain nymph. "Dryad": a wood nymph. "Delia": Diana, born on the isle of Delos, hunted with a "train" of nymphs.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Having no experience of fire, not needed in Paradise. Milton may be alluding to the guilt of Prometheus, who stole fire from heaven.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
These goddesses, like Eve, are associated with agriculture (lines 393–96)—Pales, with flocks and pastures; Pomona, with fruit trees; Ceres, with harvests—and the latter two foreshadow Eve's situation. Pomona was chased by the wood god "Vertumnus" in many guises before surrendering to him; Ceres was impregnated by Jove with Proserpina—later carried off to Hades by Pluto.

Return to reference 5

- Note 6: That is, which they had cultivated or planted for their pleasure.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The conceit of the flower-gatherer who is herself gathered evokes the story of Proserpina, to whom it was applied in 4.269–71.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The gardens of Adonis were beauty spots named for the lovely youth loved by Venus, killed by a boar, and subsequently revived; Odysseus (“Laertes’ son”) was entertained by Alcinous in his beautiful gardens; Solomon (“the sapient king”) entertained his “fair Egyptian spouse,” the Queen of Sheba, in a real garden (not “mystic,” or “feigned,” as the others were).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Cattle. “Tedded”: spread out to dry, like hay.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: From Latin rapere, to seize, the root of both “rape” and “rapture,” underscoring the paradox of the ravisher (temporarily) ravished.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The legendary founder of Thebes, Cadmus, and his wife Harmonia (Milton’s “Hermione”) were changed to serpents when they went to Illyria in old age; Aesculapius, god of healing, sometimes came forth as a serpent from his temple in Epidaurus.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Jupiter Ammon (“Ammonian Jove”) made love to Olympias in the form of a snake and sired Alexander the Great; the Jupiter worshipped in Rome (“Capitoline”), also in serpent form, sired Scipio Africanus, the savior and great leader (“height”) of Rome.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Circe, in the Odyssey, transformed men to beasts and was attended by an obedient herd.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Satan either used the actual tongue of the serpent or impressed the air with his own voice.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Satan’s entire speech is couched in the extravagant praises of the Petrarchan love convention.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: According to Pliny, serpents ate fennel to aid in shedding their skins and to sharpen their eyesight; folklore had it that they drank the milk of sheep and goats.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: There is no precedent in Genesis or the interpretative tradition for Satan's powerfully persuasive argument by analogy based on the snake's supposed experience of attaining to reason and speech by eating the forbidden fruit.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Satan continues his Petrarchan language of courtship.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Both inspired by and possessed by an evil spirit, Satan.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, until the numbers of the human race are such as to consume the food God has provided.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Blooming trees that exude the aromatic gums myrrh and balm (balsam).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: God's only direct commandment (in Hebrew, Bath Kol, "daughter of a voice" from heaven). Otherwise (see following), they follow the moral law of nature, known to them perfectly by their unfallen reason, "our reason is our law."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Eve's formulation indicates her "sufficient" understanding of the prohibition and the conditions of life in Eden. See 3.98–101.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Drawn up to full dignity. Satan as the snake takes on the role of a Greek or Roman orator defending liberty (lines 670–72), a Demosthenes or a Cicero.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Bursting into the middle of his speech without a preface, and "upgrown" to the impassioned high style ("high") at once (lines 675–78).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, life as well as knowledge, and a better life enhanced by knowledge, which Satan in the snake presents as a magical property of the tree.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, how can it be just to forbid the knowledge of good?Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Satan's sophism invites atheism: if God forbids knowledge of good and evil he is not just, therefore not God, therefore his threat of death need not be feared.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Hereafter, Satan speaks of "gods," not God.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Satan invites the aspiration to divinity, based on analogy to the supposed experience of the snake.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Both "human" and "gracious" or "kindly."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: An authority or informant beyond suspicion.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Ate: an accepted past tense, pronounced et.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, she is eating death and doesn't know it, or experience it yet, but also, punning, death is eating her too.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Slandered. "Sapience": both knowledge and tasting (Latin sapere).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Like Satan, Eve now conflates gods and God, ascribing envy but also lack of power to "them."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: See Satan, 1.248–63, 5.790–97.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Eve ends with idolatry, worship of the tree.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, excuse came like the prologue in a play, and apology ( justification, self-defense) served as prompter.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Compare Eve in soliloquy, lines 817–33.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, disorder arising from disturbance of the balance of humors in the body, intoxication.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Adam echoes Genesis 2:23–24.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The word, which Eve intends as praise, carries the implication of "excessive."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, since I have so recently been assured of your unparalleled love.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: See 1 Timothy 2:14: "And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The theological doctrine that all Adam's descendants are stained by Adam's sin and are thereby subject to physical death and (unless saved by grace) to damnation.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Adam commends Eve for her fine ("exact") and discriminating ("elegant") taste, as a part of "sapience," which means both "taste" and "wisdom."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Samson, of the tribe of Dan, told the "harlot" Philistine Delilah that the secret of his strength (like that of Hercules) lay in his hair; she sheared it off while he slept, and when he awoke he was easily captured and blinded by his enemies.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Adam's bitter pun—Eve, evil—repudiates the actual etymology of Eve, "life," which Adam will later reaffirm (11.159–61).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Milton, like most commentators, derives the tree's name from the event (4.222, 11.84–89).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The theological term for the unruly human passions and desires seen as one effect of the Fall, a sign of abundance ("store") of evils. If "shame" (see following lines) is the "last" evil, the "first" is probably the guiltiness that produces it, according to Milton's Christian Doctrine (1.12).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The banyan, or Indian fig, has small leaves, but the account Milton draws on from Gerard's Herbal (1597) contains the details of lines 1104–11; Malabar and Deccan (line 1103) are in southern India.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The immediate psychological effects of the Fall are evident in the subjection of reason to the lower faculties of sensual appetite.Return to reference 8

Book 10

The Argument

Man's transgression known, the guardian angels forsake Paradise, and return up to heaven to approve their vigilance, and are approved, God declaring that the entrance of Satan could not be by them prevented. He sends his Son to judge the transgressors, who descends and gives sentence accordingly; then in pity clothes them both, and reascends. Sin and Death, sitting till then at the gates of hell, by wondrous sympathy feeling the success of Satan in this new world, and the sin by man there committed, resolve to sit no longer confined in hell, but to follow Satan their sire up to the place of man: to make the way easier from hell to this world to and fro, they pave a broad highway or bridge over chaos, according to the track that Satan first made; then preparing for earth, they meet him proud of his success returning to hell; their mutual gratulation. Satan arrives at Pandemonium, in full assembly relates with boasting his success against man; instead of applause is entertained with a general hiss by all his audience, transformed with himself also suddenly into serpents, according to his doom given in Paradise; then deluded with a show of the Forbidden Tree springing up before them, they greedily reaching to take of the fruit, chew dust and bitter ashes. The proceedings of Sin and Death; God foretells the final victory of his Son over them, and the renewing of all things; but for the present commands his angels to make several alterations in the heavens and elements. Adam more and more perceiving his fallen condition, heavily bewails, rejects the condolment of Eve; she persists and at length appeases him: then to evade the curse likely to fall on their offspring, proposes to Adam violent ways which he approves not, but conceiving better hope, puts her in mind of the late promise made them, that her seed should be revenged on the Serpent, and exhorts her with him to seek peace of the offended Deity, by repentance and supplication.

Meanwhile the heinous and despiteful act
Of Satan done in Paradise, and how
He in the serpent had perverted Eve,
Her husband she, to taste the fatal fruit,
Was known in Heav'n; for what can scape the eye
5 Of God all-seeing, or deceive his heart
Omniscient, who in all things wise and just,
Hindered not Satan to attempt the mind
Of man, with strength entire, and free will armed,
Complete<sup>o</sup> to have discovered and repulsed
10 Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend.
For still they knew, and ought to have still<sup>o</sup> remembered
The high injunction not to taste that fruit,
Whoever tempted; which they not obeying,
Incurred, what could they less, the penalty,
15 And manifold in sin, deserved to fall.
Up into Heav'n from Paradise in haste
Th' angelic guards ascended, mute and sad
For man, for of his state by this<sup>o</sup> they knew,
Much wond'ring how the subtle Fiend had stol'n
20 Entrance unseen. Soon as th' unwelcome news
From earth arrived at Heaven gate, displeased
All were who heard, dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visages, yet mixed
With pity, violated not their bliss.
25 About the new-arrived, in multitudes
Th' ethereal people ran, to hear and know
How all befell: they towards the throne supreme Accountable made haste to make appear
With righteous plea, their utmost vigilance,
30 And easily approved;<sup>1</sup> when the Most High

Eternal Father from his secret cloud,
Amidst in thunder uttered thus his voice:

35 "Assembled Angels, and ye Powers returned
From unsuccessful charge, be not dismayed,
Nor troubled at these tidings from the earth,
Which your sincerest care could not prevent,
Foretold so lately what would come to pass,
When first this tempter crossed the gulf from Hell.
I told ye then he should prevail and speed<sup>o</sup>
40 On his bad errand, man should be seduced
And flattered out of all, believing lies
Against his Maker; no decree of mine
Concurring to necessitate his fall,
Or touch with lightest moment<sup>2</sup> of impulse
45 His free will, to her own inclining left
In even scale. But fall'n he is, and now
What rests,<sup>o</sup> but that the mortal sentence pass
On his transgression, death denounced<sup>o</sup> that day,
Which he presumes already vain and void,
50 Because not yet inflicted, as he feared,
By some immediate stroke; but soon shall find
Forbearance no acquittance ere day end.<sup>3</sup>
Justice shall not return as bounty scorned.
But whom send I to judge them? Whom but thee
55 Vicegerent Son, to thee I have transferred
All judgment, whether in Heav'n, or earth, or Hell.<sup>4</sup>
Easy it may be seen that I intend
Mercy colleague with justice, sending thee
Man's friend, his mediator, his designed 60 Both ransom and redeemer voluntary,
And destined man himself to judge man fall'n."
So spake the Father, and unfolding bright
Toward the right hand his glory, on the Son
Blazed forth unclouded deity; he full
65 Resplendent all his Father manifest

Expressed, and thus divinely answered mild:

“Father Eternal, thine is to decree,
Mine both in Heav’n and earth to do thy will Supreme, that thou in me thy Son beloved
70 May’st ever rest well pleased. I go to judge
On earth these thy transgressors; but thou know’st,
Whoever judged, the worst on me must light,
When time shall be, for so I undertook
Before thee; and not repenting, this obtain
75 Of right, that I may mitigate their doom
On me derived,<sup>o</sup> yet I shall temper so
Justice with mercy, as may illustrate most<sup>o</sup>
Them fully satisfied, and thee appease.
Attendance none shall need, nor train,<sup>o</sup> where none
80 Are to behold the judgment, but the judged,
Those two; the third best absent is condemned,
Convict<sup>o</sup> by flight, and rebel to all law:
Conviction to the serpent none belongs.”

Thus saying, from his radiant seat he rose
85 Of high collateral<sup>o</sup> glory: him Thrones and Powers,
Princedoms, and Dominations ministrant
Accompanied to Heaven gate, from whence
Eden and all the coast<sup>o</sup> in prospect lay.
Down he descended straight; the speed of gods
90 Time counts not,<sup>5</sup> though with swiftest minutes winged.

Now was the sun in western cadence<sup>o</sup> low
From noon, and gentle airs due at their hour
To fan the earth now waked, and usher in
The evening cool, when he from wrath more cool
95 Came the mild Judge and Intercessor both
To sentence man: the voice of God they heard
Now walking in the garden, by soft winds
Brought to their ears, while day declined; they heard,

100 And from his presence hid themselves among
The thickest trees, both man and wife, till God
Approaching, thus to Adam called aloud.
"Where art thou Adam, wont<sup>o</sup> with joy to meet
My coming seen far off? I miss thee here,
Not pleased, thus entertained with solitude,
105 Where obvious duty erewhile appeared unsought:
Or come I less conspicuous, or what change
Absents thee, or what chance detains? Come forth."
He came, and with him Eve, more loath, though first
To offend, discount'nanced both, and discomposed;
110 Love was not in their looks, either to God
Or to each other, but apparent<sup>o</sup> guilt,
And shame, and perturbation, and despair,
Anger, and obstinacy, and hate, and guile.
Whence Adam falt'ring long, thus answered brief:
115 "I heard thee in the garden, and of thy voice Afraid, being naked, hid myself." To whom
The gracious Judge without revile<sup>o</sup> replied:
"My voice thou oft hast heard, and hast not feared,
But still<sup>o</sup> rejoiced, how is it now become 120 So dreadful to thee? That thou art naked, who Hath told thee? Hast thou eaten of the tree
Whereof I gave thee charge thou shouldst not eat?"
To whom thus Adam sore beset replied.
"O Heav'n! in evil strait this day I stand
125 Before my Judge, either to undergo Myself the total crime, or to accuse
My other self, the partner of my life;
Whose failing, while her faith to me remains,
I should conceal, and not expose to blame
130 By my complaint; but strict necessity
Subdues me, and calamitous constraint,
Lest on my head both sin and punishment,
However insupportable, be all

135      Devolved;° though should I hold my peace, yet thou
Wouldst easily detect what I conceal.
This woman whom thou mad'st to be my help,
And gav'st me as thy perfect gift, so good,
So fit, so acceptáble, so divine,
140      That from her hand I could suspect no ill,
And what she did, whatever in itself,
Her doing seemed to justify the deed;
She gave me of the tree, and I did eat."6
    To whom the Sov'reign Presence thus replied.
145      "Was she thy God, that her thou didst obey
Before his voice, or was she made thy guide,
Superior, or but equal, that to her
Thou didst resign thy manhood, and the place
Wherein God set thee above her made of thee,
150      And for thee,7 whose perfection far excelled
Hers in all real dignity: adorned
She was indeed, and lovely to attract
Thy love, not thy subjection, and her gifts
Were such as under government well seemed,
Unseemly to bear rule, which was thy part
155      And person,8 hadst thou known thyself aright."
    So having said, he thus to Eve in few°
"Say woman, what is this which thou hast done?"
    To whom sad Eve with shame nigh overwhelmed,
160      Confessing soon, yet not before her Judge
Bold or loquacious, thus abashed replied:
"The serpent me beguiled and I did eat."
    Which when the Lord God heard, without delay
To judgment he proceeded on th' accused
Serpent though brute, unable to transfer
165      The guilt on him who made him instrument
Of mischief, and polluted from the end°
Of his creation; justly then accursed,
As vitiated in nature:9 more to know

170 Concerned not man (since he no further knew)
Nor altered his offense; yet God at last
To Satan first in sin his doom applied,
Though in mysterious terms, judged as then best:
And on the serpent thus his curse let fall.
175 "Because thou hast done this, thou art accursed
Above all cattle, each beast of the field;
Upon thy belly groveling thou shalt go,
And dust shalt eat all the days of thy life.
Between thee and the woman I will put
Enmity, and between thine and her Seed;
180 Her Seed shall bruise thy head, thou bruise his heel."<sup>1</sup>
So spake this oracle, then verified
When Jesus son of Mary second Eve,
Saw Satan fall like lightning down from Heav'n,<sup>2</sup>
Prince of the air; then rising from his grave
185 Spoiled Principalities and Powers, triumphed
In open show, and with ascension bright
Captivity led captive through the air,
The realm itself of Satan long usurped,
Whom he shall tread at last under our feet;
190 Ev'n he who now foretold his fatal bruise,
And to the woman thus his sentence turned.
"Thy sorrow I will greatly multiply
By thy conception; children thou shalt bring
In sorrow forth, and to thy husband's will 195 Thine shall submit, he over thee shall rule."
On Adam last thus judgment he pronounced.
"Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife,
And eaten of the tree concerning which
I charged thee, saying: Thou shalt not eat thereof,
200 Cursed is the ground for thy sake, thou in sorrow
Shalt eat thereof all the days of thy life;

Thorns also and thistles it shall bring thee forth
Unbid, and thou shalt eat th' herb of the field,
In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread,
205 Till thou return unto the ground, for thou
Out of the ground wast taken: know thy birth,
For dust thou art, and shalt to dust return."

So judged he man, both judge and savior sent,
And th' instant stroke of death denounced<sup>o</sup> that day
210 Removed far off; then pitying how they stood
Before him naked to the air, that now
Must suffer change, disdained not to begin
Thenceforth the form of servant to assume,
As when he washed his servants' feet,<sup>3</sup> so now
215 As father of his family he clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts, or<sup>o</sup> slain,
Or as the snake with youthful coat repaid;
And thought not much<sup>o</sup> to clothe his enemies:
Nor he their outward only with the skins
220 Of beasts, but inward nakedness, much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness,
Arraying covered from his Father's sight.
To him with swift ascent he up returned,
Into his blissful bosom reassumed
225 In glory as of old, to him appeased
All, though all-knowing, what had passed with man
Recounted, mixing intercession sweet.
Meanwhile ere thus was sinned and judged on earth,
Within the gates of Hell sat Sin and Death,
230 In counterview within the gates, that now
Stood open wide, belching outrageous<sup>o</sup> flame
Far into Chaos, since the Fiend passed through,
Sin opening, who thus now to Death began:
"O son, why sit we here each other viewing
235 Idly, while Satan our great author<sup>o</sup> thrives
In other worlds, and happier seat provides

For us his offspring dear? It cannot be,
But that success attends him; if mishap,
Ere this he had returned, with fury driv'n
240 By his avengers, since no place like<sup>o</sup> this
Can fit his punishment, or their revenge.
Methinks I feel new strength within me rise,
Wings growing, and dominion giv'n me large
Beyond this deep; whatever draws me on,
245 Or sympathy, or some connatural force
Powerful at greatest distance to unite
With secret amity things of like kind
By secretest conveyance.<sup>4</sup> Thou my shade
Inseparable must with me along:
250 For Death from Sin no power can separate.
But lest the difficulty of passing back
Stay his return perhaps over this gulf
Impassable, impervious,<sup>o</sup> let us try
Advent'rous work, yet to thy power and mine
255 Not unagreeable, to found<sup>o</sup> a path
Over this main from Hell to that new world
Where Satan now prevails, a monument
Of merit high to all th' infernal host,
Easing their passage hence, for intercourse,<sup>o</sup>
260 Or transmigration,<sup>o</sup> as their lot shall lead.
Nor can I miss the way, so strongly drawn
By this new-felt attraction and instínt."

Whom thus the meager<sup>o</sup> shadow answered soon:
265 "Go whither fate and inclination strong
Leads thee, I shall not lag behind, nor err
The way, thou leading, such a scent I draw
Of carnage, prey innumerable, and taste
The savor of death from all things there that live:
Nor shall I to the work thou enterprisest
270 Be wanting, but afford thee equal aid."
So saying, with delight he snuffed the smell

Of mortal change on earth. As when a flock
Of ravenous fowl, though many a league remote,
Against<sup>o</sup> the day of battle, to a field,
275 Where armies lie encamped, come flying, lured
With scent of living carcasses designed<sup>o</sup>
For death, the following day, in bloody fight.
So scented the grim feature,<sup>o</sup> and upturned
His nostril wide into the murky air,
280 Sagacious<sup>o</sup> of his quarry from so far.
Then both from out Hell gates into the waste
Wide anarchy of Chaos damp and dark Flew diverse,<sup>o</sup> and with power (their power was great)
Hovering upon the water, what they met
285 Solid or slimy, as in raging sea
Tossed up and down, together crowded drive
From each side shoaling<sup>o</sup> towards the mouth of Hell.
As when two polar winds blowing adverse
Upon the Cronian Sea,<sup>5</sup> together drive
290 Mountains of ice, that stop th' imagined way
Beyond Petsora eastward, to the rich
Cathaiian coast. The aggregated soil
Death with his mace petrific,<sup>6</sup> cold and dry,
As with a trident smote, and fixed as firm
295 As Delos floating once; the rest his look
Bound with Gorgonian rigor not to move,<sup>7</sup>
And with asphaltic slime;<sup>o</sup> broad as the gate,
Deep to the roots of Hell the gathered beach
They fastened, and the mole<sup>o</sup> immense wrought on 300 Over the foaming deep high-arched, a bridge
Of length prodigious joining to the wall<sup>o</sup>
Immovable of this now fenceless world
Forfeit to Death; from hence a passage broad,
Smooth, easy, inoffensive<sup>o</sup> down to Hell.
305 So, if great things to small may be compared,

Xerxes,<sup>8</sup> the liberty of Greece to yoke,
From Susa his Memnonian palace high
Came to the sea, and over Hellespont
Bridging his way, Europe with Asia joined,
310 And scourged with many a stroke th' indignant waves.
Now had they brought the work by wondrous art
Pontifical,<sup>9</sup> a ridge of pendent rock
Over the vexed<sup>o</sup> abyss, following the track
Of Satan, to the selfsame place where he 315 First lighted from his wing, and landed safe
From out of Chaos to the outside bare
Of this round world: with pins of adamant
And chains they made all fast, too fast they made
And durable; and now in little space
320 The confines<sup>o</sup> met of empyrean Heav'n
And of this world, and on the left hand Hell
With long reach interposed; three sev'ral ways
In sight, to each of these three places led.<sup>1</sup>
And now their way to earth they had descried,<sup>o</sup>
325 To Paradise first tending, when behold
Satan in likeness of an angel bright
Betwixt the Centaur and the Scorpion<sup>2</sup> steering
His zenith, while the sun in Aries rose:
Disguised he came, but those his children dear
330 Their parent soon discerned, though in disguise.
He, after Eve seduced, unminded<sup>o</sup> slunk
Into the wood fast by, and changing shape
To observe the sequel, saw his guileful act
By Eve, though all unweeting,<sup>o</sup> seconded
335 Upon her husband, saw their shame that sought
Vain covertures;<sup>o</sup> but when he saw descend
The Son of God to judge them, terrified
He fled, not hoping to escape, but shun
The present, fearing guilty what his wrath

340 Might suddenly inflict; that past, returned
By night, and list'ning where the hapless pair
Sat in their sad discourse, and various plaint,
Thence gathered his own doom, which understood
345 Not instant, but of future time.<sup>3</sup> With joy
And tidings fraught, to Hell he now returned,
And at the brink of Chaos, near the foot
Of this new wondrous pontifice,<sup>o</sup> unhop'd
Met who to meet him came, his offspring dear.
350 Great joy was at their meeting, and at sight
Of that stupendous bridge his joy increased.
Long he admiring stood, till Sin, his fair
Enchanting daughter, thus the silence broken:
    "O parent, these are thy magnific deeds,
355 Thy trophies,<sup>4</sup> which thou view'st as not thine own,
Thou art their author and prime architect:
For I no sooner in my heart divined,
My heart, which by a secret harmony
Still moves with thine, joined in connection sweet,
That thou on earth hadst prospered, which thy looks 360 Now also evidence, but straight<sup>o</sup> I felt Though distant from thee worlds between, yet felt
That I must after thee with this thy son;
Such fatal consequence<sup>5</sup> unites us three:
Hell could no longer hold us in her bounds,
365 Nor this unvoyageable gulf obscure
Detain from following thy illustrious track.
Thou hast achieved our liberty, confined
Within Hell gates till now, thou us empow'rd
To fortify thus far, and overlay
370 With this portentous<sup>o</sup> bridge the dark abyss.
Thine now is all this world, thy virtue<sup>o</sup> hath won
What thy hands builded not, thy wisdom gained
With odds<sup>o</sup> what war hath lost, and fully avenged
375 Our foil in Heav'n; here thou shalt monarch reign,

There didst not; there let him still victor sway,
As battle hath adjudged, from this new world
Retiring, by his own doom alienated,
And henceforth monarchy with thee divide
Of all things parted by th' empyreal bounds,
380 His quadrature, from thy orbicular world,<sup>6</sup>
Or try<sup>o</sup> thee now more dangerous to his throne."
Whom thus the Prince of Darkness answered glad:
"Fair daughter, and thou son and grandchild both,
High proof ye now have giv'n to be the race
385 Of Satan (for I glory in the name, Antagonist<sup>7</sup> of Heav'n's Almighty King)
Amplly have merited of me, of all
Th' infernal empire, that so near Heav'n's door
Triumphal with triumphal act<sup>8</sup> have met,
390 Mine with this glorious work, and made one realm
Hell and this world, one realm, one continent
Of easy thoroughfare. Therefore while I
Descend through darkness, on your road with ease
To my associate powers, them to acquaint
395 With these successes, and with them rejoice,
You two this way, among those numerous orbs
All yours, right down to Paradise descend;
There dwell and reign in bliss, thence on the earth
Dominion exercise and in the air,
400 Chiefly on man, sole lord of all declared,
Him first make sure your thrall,<sup>o</sup> and lastly kill.
My substitutes I send ye, and create
Plenipotent<sup>o</sup> on earth, of matchless might Issuing from me: on your joint vigor now
405 My hold of this new kingdom all depends,
Through Sin to Death exposed by my exploit.
If your joint power prevail, th' affairs of Hell
No detriment need fear, go and be strong."
410 So saying he dismissed them, they with speed

Their course through thickest constellations held Spreading their bane;° the blasted° stars looked wan,
    And planets, planet-strook,<sup>9</sup> real eclipse
    Then suffered. Th' other way Satan went down
    The causey° to Hell gate; on either side
415 Disparted Chaos over-built exclaimed,
    And with rebounding surge the bars assailed,
    That scorned his indignation.<sup>1</sup> Through the gate,
    Wide open and unguarded, Satan passed,
    And all about found desolate; for those<sup>2</sup>
420 Appointed to sit there, had left their charge,
    Flown to the upper world; the rest were all
    Far to the inland retired, about the walls
    Of Pandemonium, city and proud seat
    Of Lucifer, so by allusion° called,
425 Of that bright star to Satan paragoned.<sup>3</sup>
    There kept their watch the legions, while the grand<sup>4</sup>
    In council sat, solicitous° what chance
    Might intercept their emperor sent, so he Departing gave command, and they observed.
430 As when the Tartar from his Russian foe
    By Astracan over the snowy plains
    Retires, or Bactrian Sophi from the horns
    Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond
    The realm of Aladule, in his retreat
435 To Tauris or Casbeen:<sup>5</sup> so these the late
    Heav'n-banished host, left desert utmost Hell
    Many a dark league, reduced° in careful watch
    Round their metropolis, and now expecting
    Each hour their great adventurer from the search
440 Of foreign worlds: he through the midst unmarked,°
    In show plebeian angel militant
    Of lowest order, passed; and from the door
    Of that Plutonian<sup>6</sup> hall, invisible

445      Ascended his high throne, which under state<sup>o</sup>
Of richest texture spread, at th' upper end
Was placed in regal luster. Down a while
He sat, and round about him saw unseen:
At last as from a cloud his fulgent head
And shape star-bright appeared, or brighter, clad 450      With what permissive<sup>o</sup> glory since his fall
Was left him, or false glitter: all amazed
At that so sudden blaze the Stygian<sup>7</sup> throng
Bent their aspéct, and whom they wished beheld,
Their mighty chief returned: loud was th' acclaim:
455      Forth rushed in haste the great consulting peers,
Raised from their dark divan,<sup>8</sup> and with like joy
Congratulant approached him, who with hand
Silence, and with these words attention won:
460      "Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues,
Powers,
For in possession such, not only of right,
I call ye<sup>9</sup> and declare ye now, returned
Successful beyond hope, to lead ye forth
Triumphant out of this infernal pit
Abominable, accurst, the house of woe,
465      And dungeon of our tyrant: now possess,
As lords, a spacious world, to our native Heaven
Little inferior, by my adventure hard
With peril great achieved. Long were to tell
What I have done, what suffered, with what pain
470      Voyaged th' unreal,<sup>o</sup> vast, unbounded deep
Of horrible confusion, over which
By Sin and Death a broad way now is paved
To expedite your glorious march; but I
Toiled out my uncouth<sup>o</sup> passage, forced to ride
475      Th' untractable abyss, plunged in the womb
Of unoriginal<sup>1</sup> Night and Chaos wild,
That jealous of their secrets fiercely opposed

My journey strange, with clamorous uproar
Protesting Fate<sup>2</sup> supreme; thence how I found
480 The new-created world, which fame in Heav'n
Long had foretold, a fabric wonderful
Of absolute perfection, therein man
Placed in a paradise, by our exile
Made happy: him by fraud I have seduced
485 From his Creator, and the more to increase
Your wonder, with an apple. He thereat
Offended, worth your laughter, hath giv'n up
Both his beloved man and all his world,
To Sin and Death a prey, and so to us,
490 Without our hazard, labor, or alarm,
To range in, and to dwell, and over man
To rule, as over all he should have ruled.
True is, me also he hath judged, or rather
Me not, but the brute serpent in whose shape
495 Man I deceived; that which to me belongs,
Is enmity, which he will put between
Me and mankind; I am to bruise his heel;
His seed, when is not set, shall bruise my head:
A world who would not purchase with a bruise,
500 Or much more grievous pain? Ye have th' account
Of my performance: what remains, ye gods,
But up and enter now into full bliss."<sup>3</sup>

So having said, a while he stood, expecting
Their universal shout and high applause
505 To fill his ear, when contrary he hears
On all sides, from innumerable tongues
A dismal universal hiss, the sound
Of public scorn; he wondered, but not long
Had leisure, wond'ring at himself now more;
510 His visage drawn he felt to sharp and spare,
His arms clung to his ribs, his legs entwining
Each other, till supplanted<sup>o</sup> down he fell

A monstrous serpent on his belly prone,
 Reluctant,<sup>o</sup> but in vain, a greater power
 515 Now ruled him, punished in the shape he sinned,
 According to his doom: he would have spoke,
 But hiss for hiss returned with forkèd tongue
 To forkèd tongue, for now were all transformed
 Alike, to serpents<sup>4</sup> all as accessories
 520 To his bold riot:<sup>o</sup> dreadful was the din
 Of hissing through the hall, thick swarming now
 With complicated<sup>o</sup> monsters, head and tail,
 Scorpion and asp, and amphisbaena dire,
 Cerastes horned, hydrus, and ellops drear,
 525 And dipsas<sup>5</sup> (not so thick swarmed once the soil
 Bedropped with blood of Gorgon, or the isle
 Ophiusa)<sup>6</sup> but still greatest he the midst,
 Now dragon grown, larger than whom the sun
 Engendered in the Pythian vale on slime,
 530 Huge Python,<sup>7</sup> and his power no less he seemed Above the rest still to retain; they all
 Him followed issuing forth to th' open field,
 Where all yet left of that revolted rout
 Heav'n-fall'n, in station stood or just array,<sup>8</sup>
 535 Sublime<sup>o</sup> with expectation when to see
 In triumph issuing forth their glorious chief;
 They saw, but other sight instead, a crowd
 Of ugly serpents; horror on them fell,
 And horrid sympathy; for what they saw,
 540 They felt themselves now changing; down their arms,
 Down fell both spear and shield, down they as fast,
 And the dire hiss renewed, and the dire form
 Caught by contagion, like in punishment,
 As in their crime. Thus was th' applause they meant,
 545 Turned to exploding hiss, triumph to shame

Cast on themselves from their own mouths. There stood
A grove hard by, sprung up with this their change,
His will who reigns above, to aggravate
Their penance,<sup>o</sup> laden with fair fruit, like that 550 Which grew in Paradise, the bait of Eve
Used by the Tempter: on that prospect strange
Their earnest eyes they fixed, imagining
For one forbidden tree a multitude
Now ris'n, to work them further woe or shame;
555 Yet parched with scalding thirst and hunger fierce,
Though to delude them sent, could not abstain,
But on they rolled in heaps, and up the trees
Climbing, sat thicker than the snaky locks
That curled Megaera:<sup>9</sup> greedily they plucked 560 The fruitage fair to sight, like that which grew
Near that bituminous lake where Sodom flamed;<sup>1</sup>
This more delusive, not the touch, but taste
Deceived; they fondly<sup>o</sup> thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust,<sup>o</sup> instead of fruit
565 Chewed bitter ashes, which th' offended taste
With spattering noise rejected: oft they assayed,<sup>o</sup>
Hunger and thirst constraining, drugged as oft,
With hatefulest disrelish writhed their jaws
With soot and cinders filled; so oft they fell
570 Into the same illusion, not as man Whom they triumphed once lapsed.<sup>2</sup> Thus were they plagued
And worn with famine, long and ceaseless hiss,
Till their lost shape, permitted, they resumed,<sup>3</sup>
Yearly enjoined, some say, to undergo 575 This annual humbling certain numbered days,
To dash their pride, and joy for man seduced.
However some tradition they dispersed
Among the heathen of their purchase<sup>o</sup> got,

580 And fabled how the serpent, whom they called Ophion with Eurynome, the wide-
Encroaching Eve perhaps, had first the rule
Of high Olympus, thence by Saturn driv'n
And Ops, ere yet Dictaeon Jove was born.<sup>4</sup>
Meanwhile in Paradise the hellish pair
585 Too soon arrived, Sin there in power before,
Once actual, now in body, and to dwell
Habitual habitant;<sup>5</sup> behind her Death
Close following pace for pace, not mounted yet
On his pale horse:<sup>6</sup> to whom Sin thus began:
590 "Second of Satan sprung, all-conquering Death,
What think'st thou of our empire now, though earned
With travail<sup>o</sup> difficult, not better far
Than still at Hell's dark threshold to have sat watch,
Unnamed, undreaded, and thyself half-starved?"
595 Whom thus the Sin-born monster answered soon:
"To me, who with eternal famine pine,
Alike is Hell, or Paradise, or Heaven,
There best, where most with ravin<sup>o</sup> I may meet;
Which here, though plenteous, all too little seems 600 To stuff this maw, this vast unhidebound corpse."<sup>7</sup>
To whom th' incestuous mother thus replied:
"Thou therefore on these herbs, and fruits, and flow'rs
Feed first, on each beast next, and fish, and fowl,
No homely morsels, and whatever thing
605 Thy scythe of Time mows down, devour unspared,
Till I in man residing through the race,
His thoughts, his looks, words, actions all infect,
And season him thy last and sweetest prey."
This said, they both betook them several ways,
610 Both to destroy, or unimmortal make
All kinds, and for destruction to mature

Sooner or later; which th' Almighty seeing,
 From his transcendent seat the saints among,
 To those bright orders uttered thus his voice:
 615 "See with what heat these dogs of Hell advance
 To waste and havoc<sup>o</sup> yonder world, which I
 So fair and good created, and had still
 Kept in that state, had not the folly of man
 Let in these wasteful furies, who impute
 620 Folly to me, so doth the Prince of Hell
 And his adherents, that with so much ease
 I suffer them to enter and possess
 A place so heav'nly, and conniving seem
 To gratify my scornful enemies,
 625 That laugh, as if transported with some fit
 Of passion, I to them had quitted all,<sup>o</sup>
 At random yielded up to their misrule;
 And know not that I called and drew them thither
 My hellhounds, to lick up the draff<sup>o</sup> and filth
 630 Which man's polluting sin with taint hath shed
 On what was pure, till crammed and gorged, nigh burst
 With sucked and glutted offal, at one sling
 Of thy victorious arm, well-pleasing Son,
 Both Sin, and Death, and yawning grave at last 635 Through Chaos hurled, obstruct the mouth of Hell
 Forever, and seal up his ravenous jaws.
 Then Heav'n and earth renewed shall be made pure
 To sanctity that shall receive no stain:
 Till then the curse pronounced on both precedes."<sup>o</sup>
 640 He ended, and the heav'nly audience loud
 Sung hallelujah, as the sound of seas,
 Through multitude that sung: "Just are thy ways,
 Righteous are thy decrees on all thy works;
 Who can extenuate<sup>o</sup> thee? Next, to the Son,
 645 Destined restorer of mankind, by whom
 New heav'n and earth shall to the ages rise,

Or down from Heav'n descend." Such was their song,
While the Creator calling forth by name
His mighty angels gave them several charge,
650 As sorted<sup>o</sup> best with present things. The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the earth with cold and heat
Scarce tolerable, and from the north to call
Decrepit winter, from the south to bring 655 Solstitial summer's heat. To the blank<sup>o</sup> moon
Her office they prescribed, to th' other five
Their planetary motions and aspects<sup>8</sup>
In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite,
Of noxious efficacy, and when to join
660 In synod<sup>o</sup> unbenign, and taught the fixed<sup>o</sup>
Their influence malignant when to show'r,
Which of them rising with the sun, or falling,
Should prove tempestuous:<sup>o</sup> to the winds they set
Their corners, when with bluster to confound
665 Sea, air, and shore, the thunder when to roll
With terror through the dark aerial hall.
Some say<sup>9</sup> he bid his angels turn askance
The poles of earth twice ten degrees and more
From the sun's axle; they with labor pushed
670 Oblique the centric globe:<sup>o</sup> some say the sun
Was bid turn reins from th' equinoctial road<sup>o</sup>
Like distant breadth to Taurus<sup>1</sup> with the sev'n
Atlantic Sisters, and the Spartan Twins
Up to the Tropic Crab; thence down amain<sup>o</sup>
675 By Leo and the Virgin and the Scales,
As deep as Capricorn, to bring in change
Of seasons to each clime; else<sup>o</sup> had the spring
Perpetual smiled on earth with vernant<sup>o</sup> flow'rs,
Equal in days and nights, except to those 680 Beyond the polar circles; to them day
Had unbenighted<sup>o</sup> shone, while the low sun

To recompense his distance, in their sight
Had rounded still<sup>o</sup> th' horizon, and not known
Or<sup>o</sup> east or west, which had forbid the snow
685 From cold Estotiland, and south as far
Beneath Magellan.<sup>2</sup> At that tasted fruit
The sun, as from Thyestean banquet, turned
His course intended;<sup>3</sup> else how had the world
690 Inhabited, though sinless, more than now,
Avoided pinching cold and scorching heat?
These changes in the heav'ns, though slow, produced
Like change on sea and land, sideral blast,<sup>4</sup>
Vapor, and mist, and exhalation hot,
Corrupt and pestilent: now from the north
695 Of Norumbega, and the Samoed shore
Bursting their brazen dungeon, armed with ice
And snow and hail and stormy gust and flaw,<sup>o</sup>
Boreas and Caecias and Argestes loud
And Thrascias rend the woods and seas upturn;
700 With adverse blast upturns them from the south
Notus and Afer black with thund'rous clouds
From Serraliona,<sup>5</sup> thwart of these as fierce
Forth rush the Levant and the ponent<sup>o</sup> winds
Eurus and Zephyr with their lateral noise,
705 Sirocco and Libecchio.<sup>6</sup> Thus began
Outrage from lifeless things; but Discord first
Daughter of Sin, among th' irrational,
Death introduced through fierce antipathy:<sup>7</sup>
Beast now with beast gan war, and fowl with fowl,
710 And fish with fish; to graze the herb<sup>o</sup> all leaving,
Devour'd each other; nor stood much in awe
Of man, but fled him, or with count'nance grim
Glared on him passing: these were from without
The growing miseries, which Adam saw
715 Already in part, though hid in gloomiest shade,

To sorrow abandoned, but worse felt within,
And in a troubled sea of passion tossed,
Thus to disburden sought with sad complaint:
720 "O miserable of happy!<sup>8</sup> Is this the end
Of this new glorious world, and me so late
The glory of that glory, who now become
Accurst of blessed, hide me from the face
Of God, whom to behold was then my height
725 Of happiness: yet well, if here would end
The misery, I deserved it, and would bear
My own deservings; but this will not serve;
All that I eat or drink, or shall beget,
Is propagated<sup>9</sup> curse. O voice once heard
730 Delightfully, 'Increase and multiply,'
Now death to hear! For what can I increase
Or multiply, but curses on my head?
Who of all ages to succeed, but feeling
The evil on him brought by me, will curse
735 My head: 'Ill fare our ancestor impure,
For this we may thank Adam'; but his thanks
Shall be the execration; so besides
Mine own that bide upon me, all from me
Shall with a fierce reflux on me redound,
740 On me as on their natural center light
Heavy, though in their place.<sup>1</sup> O fleeting joys
Of Paradise, dear bought with lasting woes!
Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mold me man, did I solicit thee
745 From darkness to promote me, or here place
In this delicious garden? As my will Concurred not to my being, it were but right
And equal<sup>o</sup> to reduce me to my dust,
Desirous to resign, and render back
750 All I received, unable to perform
Thy terms too hard, by which I was to hold

The good I sought not. To the loss of that,
Sufficient penalty, why hast thou added
The sense of endless woes? Inexplicable
Thy justice seems; yet to say truth, too late
755 I thus contest; then should have been refused
Those terms whatever, when they were proposed:
Thou<sup>2</sup> didst accept them; wilt thou enjoy the good,
Then cavil<sup>o</sup> the conditions? And though God
760 Made thee without thy leave, what if thy son
Prove disobedient, and reprov'd, retort,
'Wherefore didst thou beget me? I sought it not':
Wouldst thou admit for his contempt of thee
That proud excuse? Yet him not thy election,<sup>o</sup>
But natural necessity begot.
765 God made thee of choice his own, and of his own
To serve him, thy reward was of his grace,
Thy punishment then justly is at his will.
Be it so, for I submit, his doom is fair,
That dust I am, and shall to dust return:
770 O welcome hour whenever! Why delays
His hand to execute what his decree
Fixed on this day? Why do I overlive,
Why am I mocked with death, and lengthened out
To deathless pain? How gladly would I meet
775 Mortality my sentence, and be earth
Insensible, how glad would lay me down
As in my mother's lap! There I should rest
And sleep secure; his dreadful voice no more
Would thunder in my ears, no fear of worse
780 To me and to my offspring would torment me
With cruel expectation. Yet one doubt
Pursues me still, lest all I<sup>o</sup> cannot die,
Lest that pure breath of life, the spirit of man
Which God inspired, cannot together perish
785 With this corporeal clod; then in the grave,

Or in some other dismal place, who knows
But I shall die a living death? O thought
Horrid, if true! Yet why? It was but breath
Of life that sinned; what dies but what had life
790 And sin? The body properly hath neither.
All of me then shall die:<sup>3</sup> let this appease
The doubt, since human reach no further knows.
For though the Lord of all be infinite,
Is his wrath also? Be it, man is not so,
795 But mortal doomed. How can he exercise
Wrath without end on man whom death must end?
Can he make deathless death? That were to make Strange contradiction, which to God himself
Impossible is held, as argument
800 Of weakness, not of power. Will he draw out,
For anger's sake, finite to infinite
In punished man, to satisfy his rigor
Satisfied never; that were to extend
His sentence beyond dust and nature's law,
805 By which all causes else according still
To the reception of their matter act,
Not to th' extent of their own sphere.<sup>4</sup> But say
That death be not one stroke, as I supposed,
Bereaving<sup>o</sup> sense, but endless misery
810 From this day onward, which I feel begun
Both in me, and without<sup>o</sup> me, and so last
To perpetuity; ay me, that fear
Comes thund'ring back with dreadful revolution<sup>o</sup>
On my defenseless head; both Death and I
815 Am found eternal, and incorporate<sup>o</sup> both,
Nor I on my part single, in me all
Posterity stands cursed: fair patrimony
That I must leave ye, sons; O were I able
To waste it all myself, and leave ye none!
820 So disinherited how would ye bless

Me now your curse! Ah, why should all mankind
For one man's fault thus guiltless be condemned,
If guiltless? But from me what can proceed,
But all corrupt, both mind and will depraved,
825 Not to do<sup>o</sup> only, but to will the same
With me? How can they then acquitted stand
In sight of God? Him after all disputes
Forced I absolve: all my evasions vain
And reasonings, though through mazes, lead me still 830 But to my own conviction: first and last
On me, me only, as the source and spring
Of all corruption, all the blame lights due;
So might the wrath.<sup>5</sup> Fond<sup>o</sup> wish! Couldst thou support
That burden heavier than the earth to bear,
835 Than all the world much heavier, though divided
With that bad woman? Thus what thou desir'st,
And what thou fear'st, alike destroys all hope
Of refuge, and concludes thee miserable
Beyond all past example and future,
840 To Satan only like both crime and doom.
O conscience, into what abyss of fears
And horrors hast thou driv'n me; out of which I find no way, from deep to deeper plunged!"
Thus Adam to himself lamented loud
845 Through the still night, not now, as ere man fell,
Wholesome and cool, and mild, but with black air
Accompanied, with damps<sup>o</sup> and dreadful gloom,
Which to his evil conscience represented
All things with double terror: on the ground
850 Outstretched he lay, on the cold ground, and oft
Cursed his creation, Death as oft accused
Of tardy execution, since denounced<sup>o</sup>
The day of his offense: "Why comes not Death,"
Said he, "with one thrice-acceptable stroke
855

To end me? Shall Truth fail to keep her word,
Justice divine not hasten to be just?
But Death comes not at call, Justice divine
Mends not her slowest pace for prayers or cries.
860 O woods, O fountains, hillocks, dales, and bow'rs,
With other echo late I taught your shades
To answer, and resound far other song."<sup>6</sup>
Whom thus afflicted when sad Eve beheld,
Desolate where she sat, approaching nigh,
Soft words to his fierce passion she assayed;<sup>o</sup>
865 But her with stern regard he thus repelled:
    "Out of my sight, thou serpent,<sup>7</sup> that name best
    Befits thee with him leagued, thyself as false
    And hateful; nothing wants,<sup>o</sup> but that thy shape,
    Like his, and color serpentine may show
870 Thy inward fraud, to warn all creatures from thee
    Henceforth; lest that too heav'nly form, pretended<sup>8</sup>
    To hellish falsehood, snare them. But<sup>o</sup> for thee
    I had persisted happy, had not thy pride
    And wand'ring vanity, when least was safe,
875 Rejected my forewarning, and disdained
    Not to be trusted, longing to be seen
    Though by the Devil himself, him overweening<sup>o</sup>
    To overreach, but with the serpent meeting
    Fooled and beguiled, by him thou, I by thee,
880 To trust thee from my side, imagined wise,
    Constant, mature, proof against all assaults,
    And understood not all was but a show
    Rather than solid virtue, all but a rib
    Crooked by nature, bent, as now appears,
885 More to the part sinister<sup>o</sup> from me drawn,
    Well if thrown out, as supernumerary
    To my just number found.<sup>9</sup> O why did God,
    Creator wise, that peopled highest heav'n
    With Spirits masculine,<sup>1</sup> create at last

890 This novelty on earth, this fair defect
Of nature,<sup>2</sup> and not fill the world at once
With men as angels without feminine,
Or find some other way to generate
Mankind? This mischief had not then befall'n,
895 And more that shall befall, innumerable
Disturbances on earth through female snares,
And strait conjunction<sup>3</sup> with this sex: for either
He never shall find out fit mate, but such
As some misfortune brings him, or mistake,
900 Or whom he wishes most shall seldom gain
Through her perverseness, but shall see her gained
By a far worse, or if she love, withheld
By parents, or his happiest choice too late
Shall meet, already linked and wedlock-bound
905 To a fell<sup>o</sup> adversary, his hate or shame:
Which infinite calamity shall cause
To human life, and household peace confound."
He added not, and from her turned, but Eve
Not so repulsed, with tears that ceased not flowing,
910 And tresses all disordered, at his feet
Fell humble, and embracing them, besought
His peace, and thus proceeded in her plaint:
"Forsake me not thus, Adam, witness Heav'n
What love sincere, and reverence in my heart
915 I bear thee, and unweeting<sup>o</sup> have offended,
Unhappily deceived; thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees;<sup>4</sup> bereave me not,
Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel in this uttermost distress,
920 My only strength and stay: forlorn of thee,
Whither shall I betake me, where subsist?
While yet we live, scarce one short hour perhaps,
Between us two let there be peace, both joining,
As joined in injuries, one enmity
925

Against a foe by doom express<sup>o</sup> assigned us,
That cruel serpent: on me exercise not
Thy hatred for this misery befall'n,
On me already lost, me than thyself
930 More miserable; both have sinned, but thou
Against God only, I against God and thee,
And to the place of judgment will return,
There with my cries importune Heaven, that all
The sentence from thy head removed may light
On me, sole cause to thee of all this woe,
935 Me me only just object of his ire."<sup>5</sup>

She ended weeping, and her lowly plight,<sup>o</sup>
Immovable till peace obtained from fault
Acknowledged and deplored, in Adam wrought
Commiseration; soon his heart relented
940 Towards her, his life so late and sole delight,
Now at his feet submissive in distress,
Creature so fair his reconciliation seeking,
His counsel whom she had displeased, his aid;
As one disarmed, his anger all he lost,
945 And thus with peaceful words upraised her soon:
"Unwary, and too desirous, as before,
So now of what thou know'st not, who desir'st
The punishment all on thyself; alas!
Bear thine own first, ill able to sustain
950 His full wrath whose thou feel'st as yet least part,
And my displeasure bear'st so ill."<sup>6</sup> If prayers
Could alter high decrees, I to that place
Would speed before thee, and be louder heard,
That on my head all might be visited,
955 Thy frailty and infirmer sex forgiv'n,
To me committed and by me exposed.
But rise, let us no more contend, nor blame
Each other, blamed enough elsewhere, but strive
In offices of love, how we may light'n
960

Each other's burden in our share of woe;
 Since this day's death denounced, if aught I see,
 Will prove no sudden, but a slow-paced evil,
 A long day's dying to augment our pain,
 And to our seed (O hapless seed!) derived."° 965     To whom thus Eve, recovering heart, replied:
 "Adam, by sad experiment I know
 How little weight my words with thee can find,
 Found so erroneous, thence by just event°
 Found so unfortunate; nevertheless,
 970     Restored by thee, vile as I am, to place
 Of new acceptance, hopeful to regain
 Thy love, the sole contentment of my heart
 Living or dying, from thee I will not hide
 What thoughts in my unquiet breast are ris'n,
 975     Tending to some relief of our extremes,
 Or end, though sharp and sad, yet tolerable,
 As in our evils, and of easier choice.
 If care of our descent perplex us most, 7
 Which must be born to certain woe, devoured
 980     By Death at last, and miserable it is
 To be to others cause of misery,
 Our own begotten, and of our loins to bring
 Into this cursèd world a woeful race,
 That after wretched life must be at last
 985     Food for so foul a monster, in thy power
 It lies, yet ere conception to prevent
 The race unblest, to being yet unbegot.
 Childless thou art, childless remain; so Death
 Shall be deceived° his glut, and with us two 990     Be forced to satisfy his rav'nous maw.
 But if thou judge it hard and difficult,
 Conversing, looking, loving, to abstain
 From love's due rites, nuptial embraces sweet,
 And with desire to languish without hope,
 995

Before the present object<sup>8</sup> languishing
With like desire, which would be misery
And torment less than none of what we dread,
Then both ourselves and seed at once to free
From what we fear for both, let us make short,<sup>o</sup>
1000 Let us seek Death, or he not found, supply
With our own hands his office on ourselves;
Why stand we longer shivering under fears,
That show no end but death, and have the power,
Of many ways to die the shortest choosing,
1005 Destruction with destruction to destroy."

She ended here, or vehement despair
Broke off the rest; so much of death her thoughts
Had entertained, as dyed her cheeks with pale.
But Adam with such counsel nothing swayed,
1010 To better hopes his more attentive mind
Laboring had raised, and thus to Eve replied.

"Eve thy contempt of life and pleasure seems
To argue in thee something more sublime
And excellent than what thy mind contemns;<sup>o</sup>
1015 But self-destruction therefore sought, refutes
That excellence thought in thee, and implies,
Not thy contempt, but anguish and regret
For loss of life and pleasure overloved.
Or if thou covet death, as utmost end
1020 Of misery, so thinking to evade
The penalty pronounced, doubt not but God
Hath wiselier armed his vengeful ire than so
To be forestalled; much more I fear lest death
So snatched will not exempt us from the pain
1025 We are by doom to pay: rather such acts
Of contumácy<sup>o</sup> will provoke the Highest
To make death in us live. Then let us seek
Some safer resolution, which methinks
I have in view, calling to mind with heed
1030

Part of our sentence, that thy seed shall bruise
The serpent's head; piteous amends, unless
Be meant, whom I conjecture, our grand foe
Satan, who in the serpent hath contrived
1035 Against us this deceit: to crush his head
Would be revenge indeed; which will be lost
By death brought on ourselves, or childless days
Resolved, as thou proposest; so our foe
Shall scape his punishment ordained, and we 1040 Instead shall double ours upon our heads.
No more be mentioned then of violence
Against ourselves, and willful barrenness,
That cuts us off from hope, and savors only
Rancor and pride, impatience and despite,
Reluctance<sup>o</sup> against God and his just yoke
1045 Laid on our necks. Remember with what mild
And gracious temper he both heard and judged
Without wrath or reviling; we expected
Immediate dissolution, which we thought
Was meant by death that day, when lo, to thee
1050 Pains only in childbearing were foretold,
And bringing forth, soon recompensed with joy,
Fruit of thy womb:<sup>9</sup> on me the curse aslope
Glanced on the ground,<sup>1</sup> with labor I must earn
My bread; what harm? Idleness had been worse;
1055 My labor will sustain me; and lest cold
Or heat should injure us, his timely care
Hath unbesought provided, and his hands
Clothed us unworthy, pitying while he judged;
How much more, if we pray him, will his ear
1060 Be open, and his heart to pity incline,
And teach us further by what means to shun
Th' inclement seasons, rain, ice, hail, and snow,
Which now the sky with various face begins
To show us in this mountain, while the winds
1065

Blow moist and keen, shattering<sup>o</sup> the graceful locks
Of these fair spreading trees; which bids us seek
Some better shroud,<sup>o</sup> some better warmth to cherish
Our limbs benumbed, ere this diurnal star<sup>o</sup>
1070 Leave cold the night, how we his gathered beams
Reflected, may with matter sere<sup>o</sup> foment,
Or by collision of two bodies grind
The air attrite to fire,<sup>2</sup> as late the clouds
Justling or pushed with winds rude in their shock
Tine<sup>o</sup> the slant lightning, whose thwart<sup>o</sup> flame driv'n
1075 down
Kindles the gummy bark of fir or pine,
And sends a comfortable heat from far,
Which might supply<sup>o</sup> the sun: such fire to use,
And what may else be remedy or cure
To evils which our own misdeeds have wrought,
1080 He will instruct us praying, and of grace
Beseeching him, so as we need not fear
To pass commodiously this life, sustained
By him with many comforts, till we end
In dust, our final rest and native home.
1085 What better can we do, than to the place
Repairing where he judged us, prostrate fall
Before him reverent, and there confess
Humbly our faults, and pardon beg, with tears
Watering the ground, and with our sighs the air
1090 Frequenting,<sup>o</sup> sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeigned, and humiliation meek.
Undoubtedly he will relent and turn
From his displeasure; in whose look serene,
When angry most he seemed and most severe,
1095 What else but favor, grace, and mercy shone?"
So spake our father penitent, nor Eve
Felt less remorse: they forthwith to the place
Repairing where he judged them prostrate fell

1100 Before him reverent, and both confessed
Humbly their faults, and pardon begged, with tears
Watering the ground, and with their sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeigned, and humiliation meek.<sup>3</sup>

Endnotes

- Note 1: The angels, “accountable” for guarding Eden, rush to God’s throne to explain that they had exercised “utmost vigilance”; their plea is readily accepted (“easily approved”).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The smallest weight that would tip the scales.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A proverb: “Abstinence from enforcing a debt is not release from it.” Next line: My justice must not be scorned as my generosity has been.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See John 5:22: “For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son.”Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Son’s descent is immediate; Raphael had taken much of the morning to travel from Heaven to earth (8.110–14).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Compare Adam’s speech in Genesis 3:12, and the elements Milton adds of complaint, veiled accusation of God, and self-exculpation; also compare Eve’s answer in Genesis 3:13 and in lines 159–62 below.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: See 1 Corinthians 11:8–9: “For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. / Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.”Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Role and character (persona), as in a drama.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The serpent was “unable to transfer” (line 165) his own guilt in being “polluted” from his proper end and nature onto

Satan, who made him “instrument,” so he was “justly . . . accursed,” but the terms of that judgment have a “mysterious” (line 173) or hidden meaning that applies to Satan.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: This is the so-called protoevangelion or judgment of the Serpent (Satan) that contains at the same time the promise of the Redeemer (“her Seed”); Adam and Eve are led to understand it by degrees.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: See Christ’s comment to his disciples (Luke 10:18: “I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven”), and also Colossians 2:15 and Ephesians 4:8, to the following lines, 185–88.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: See Philippians 2:7: “[Christ] took upon him the form of a servant”; John 13:5: “he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples’ feet.”Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Sin feels an attraction (“sympathy”) drawing two things together, or an innate (“connatural”) force, linking her to Satan.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Arctic Ocean; the “imagined way” (lines 291–93) is the Northeast Passage to North China (“Cathay”) from Pechora (“Petsora”), a river in Siberia, which Henry Hudson could only imagine (in 1608) because it was blocked with ice.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Turning things to stone.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Anything the Gorgon Medusa looked upon turned to stone. Death’s materials are the “cold and dry” elements; his mace is associated with Neptune’s “trident,” which was said to have “fixed” the floating Greek island of Delos.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Persian king Xerxes ordered the sea whipped when it destroyed the bridge of ships he built over the Hellespont (linking Europe and Asia) so as to invade Greece. “Susa” (next line): Xerxes’ winter residence, founded by the mythical prince Memnon.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Bridge-building, with a pun on “papal” (the pope had the title “pontifex maximus”).Return to reference 9

- Note 1: The golden staircase or chain linking the universe to Heaven, the new bridge linking it to Hell, and the passage through the spheres down to earth.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Satan steered between Sagittarius ("the Centaur") and Scorpio, thereby passing through Anguis, the constellation of the Serpent.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: This evidently refers to the complaints and discourse of Adam and Eve (lines 720–1104 below), which therefore precede Satan's return to Hell (lines 345–609).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Objects or persons captured in battle were displayed in the Triumphs accorded Roman generals and emperors who had won a great military victory; the term casts Satan's conquests in Eden in such terms.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Connection of cause and effect.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Revelation 21:16 describes the City of God as "foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth"; Satan's new conquest, earth, is an orb. Sin may imply its superiority (being a sphere).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The name "Satan" means "adversary" or "antagonist."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The repeated word emphasizes that Satan is enacting a Triumph, passing over a triumphal bridge rather than through triumphal arches; the scene would likely evoke the "Roman" Triumph and triumphal arches celebrating the Restoration of Charles II.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Suffering not merely a temporary eclipse but a real loss of light, as from the malign influence of an adverse planet.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Chaos is the instinctive enemy of all order, so hostile to the bridge built over it.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Sin and Death.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Satan before his fall was Lucifer, the Lightbringer, and the morning star is named Lucifer because it is compared ("paragoned") to him.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The "grand infernal peers" who govern (see 2.507).Return to reference 4

- Note 5:
The simile, begun in line 431, compares the fallen angels, withdrawn from other regions of Hell to guard their metropolis, to Tartars retiring before attacking Russians and Persians retreating before the attacking Turks. "Astracan": a region west of the Caspian Sea inhabited by Russia and defended against Turks and Tartars; "Aladule": the region of Armenia, from which the last Persian ruler, called Anadule, a "Bactrian Sophi" (Persian shah), was forced to retreat from the Turks, to Tabriz ("Tauris") and Kazvin ("Casbeen").
Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Pertaining to Pluto, ruler of the classical underworld.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Of the river Styx in Hades, the river of hate.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Turkish Council of State.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, you now have these titles not only by right but by possession (from the conquest on earth).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Having no origin, uncreated.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Protesting both to and against Fate.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Ironically, the final word of Satan's proud, triumphal speech rhymes with and so prepares for the "hiss" (line 508) that will soon greet him, as his would-be triumph is turned by God to abject humiliation.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The scene recalls Dante's vivid description of the thieves metamorphosed to snakes in Inferno 24–25.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The "scorpion" has a venomous sting at the tip of the tail; "asp" is a small Egyptian viper; "amphisbaena" supposedly had a head at each end; "Cerastes" is an asp with horny projections over each eye; "hydrus" and "ellops" were mythical water snakes; "dipsas" was a mythical snake whose bite caused raging thirst.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Drops of blood from the Gorgon Medusa's severed head turned into snakes; "Ophiusa" in Greek means "isle of snakes."Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A gigantic serpent engendered from the slime left by Deucalion's flood; Apollo slew him and appropriated the "Pythian" vale and shrine at Delphi.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, at their posts or on parade.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: One of three Furies with snaky hair.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Sodom apples reputedly grew on the spot where the accursed city once stood, now the Dead Sea ("that bituminous lake"); the apples look good but dissolve into ashes when eaten.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Unlike man who fell once, they try to eat the dissolving apples over and over again.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: God permitted them to regain their "lost shape" as fallen angels; but they are undergoing a slower, natural metamorphosis into grosser substance by their continuing commitment to and choice of evil.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Titan Ophion (whose name means "snake") and his wife Eurynome ("the widereacher") ruled Olympus until driven away by "Saturn" and his wife Ops, who were in turn overthrown by Jove, who lived on the mountain Dicte. Milton suggests that these may represent versions of the story transmitted by the fallen angels to the pagans (lines 578–79).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Sin was present in Eden in the actual sins committed by Adam and Eve; now she will dwell there in her own body and in all other bodies.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: See Revelation 6:8: "behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him."Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Its hide does not cling close to its bones: Death's hunger is such that it can never fill its skin.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Astrological positions. The next line names positions of 60, 90, 120, and 180 degrees, respectively.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The poem offers both a Ptolemaic and a Copernican explanation of the shifts made in the cosmic order so as to change the prelapsarian eternal spring. The Copernican explanation (offered first) proposes that the earth's axis is now tilted (lines 668–71); the Ptolemaic explanation is that the plane of the sun's orbit is tilted (lines 671–78).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Lines 673–78 trace the sun's apparent (Ptolemaic) journey from Aries through Taurus and the rest of the zodiac over the course of the year.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The region of the Straits of Magellan, at the tip of South America. "Estotiland" (line 686): northern Labrador.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: As a revenge, Atreus killed one of the sons of his brother Thyestes and served him in a banquet to that brother; the sun changed course to avoid the sight.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Malevolent stellar influences. "Norumbega" (line 696): northern New England and maritime Canada; "Samoed" Shore: northeastern Siberia.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
Winds (701–6) from the south ("Notus," "Afer") come from Sierra Leone ("Serraliona") on the west coast of Africa; "Boreas," "Caecias," "Argestes," and "Thrascias" are all winds that blow from the north, northeast, and northwest, bursting from the cave ("brazen dungeon") in which Aeolus imprisoned the winds (lines 695–700).
Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Crossing the north and south winds ("thwart," line 703) are the "Levant" (from the east) and "Eurus" (east southeast), from the west "Zephyr," the west wind; "Sirocco" and "Libeccio" come from the southeast and southwest, respectively.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Discord (personified as daughter of Sin) introduced Death among the animals ("th' irrational") by stirring up "antipathy" among them.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Adam's complaint begins with the classical formula for a tragic fall, or peripeteia, the change from happiness to misery.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Handed down from one generation to the next.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, Adam's "own" curse will remain ("bide") with him, and the curse ("execration") of "all" who descend from him will "redound" on him as to their "natural center"; objects so placed ("in their place") were thought to be weightless ("light"), but these curses will be "heavy."Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Adam turns from addressing God to address himself.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: After debating the matter, Adam concludes that the soul dies with the body; Milton in his Christian Doctrine worked out this "mortalist" doctrine, with its corollary, that both soul and body rise at the Last Judgment.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Adam convinces himself that "finite" matter (line 802) cannot suffer "infinite" punishment by an axiom of traditional philosophy, that by "nature's law" (line 805) the actions of agents are limited by the nature of the object they act upon.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: See the Son's offer to accept all humankind's guilt (3.236–41), and Eve's similar offer (10.933–36).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: See their morning hymn (5.153–208).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Adam's bitter, misogynistic outcry begins with reference to the patristic notion that the name Eve, aspirated, means "serpent."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Held in front, as a cover or mask.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: It was supposed that Adam had thirteen ribs on the left side, so he could spare one for the creation of Eve and still retain the proper ("just") number, twelve.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The Miltonic bard indicated that angels can assume at will "either sex . . . or both" (1.424).Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Aristotle had claimed that the female is a defective male.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Close, hard-pressing, binding union: Adam then projects the problems of future marriages.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Eve assumes the posture of the classical suppliant, clasping the knees of the one she begs from.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Eve also echoes the Son's offer (3.236–41). Compare Adam's cry (10.832–34).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, you could hardly bear God's "full wrath" since you are so distraught when you feel only the smallest part of it, and you can "ill" bear my displeasure.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, if concern for our descendants most torment ("perplex") us.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, Eve herself, who then projects her own frustrated desire if they were to forgo sex.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Adam's prophetic echo of Elizabeth's address to Mary, mother of Jesus (Luke 1:41–42), "blessed is the fruit of thy womb," lays the ground for their fuller understanding of the promise about the "seed" of the woman.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, the curse, like a spear that almost missed its target, glanced aside and hit the ground.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Adam projects the invention of fire: they might, by striking two bodies together, rub ("attrite") the air into fire by friction; or else (lines 1070–71) focus reflected sunbeams (through some equivalent of glass) on dry ("sere") matter.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The final six lines repeat, almost word for word, lines 1086–92, as the poet describes Adam's proposed gesture of repentance carried out in every detail.Return to reference 3

Book 11

The Argument

The Son of God presents to his Father the prayers of our first parents now repenting, and intercedes for them: God accepts them, but declares that they must no longer abide in Paradise; sends Michael with a band of Cherubim to dispossess them; but first to reveal to Adam future things: Michael's coming down. Adam shows to Eve certain ominous signs; he discerns Michael's approach, goes out to meet him: the angel denounces their departure. Eve's lamentation. Adam pleads, but submits: the angel leads him up to a high hill, sets before him in vision what shall happen till the Flood.

Thus they in lowliest plight repentant stood<sup>1</sup>
Praying, for from the mercy-seat above
Prevenient grace<sup>2</sup> descending had removed
The stony from their hearts, and made new flesh
5 Regenerate grow instead, that sighs now breathed
Unutterable, which the spirit of prayer
Inspired, and winged for Heav'n with speedier flight
Than loudest oratory: yet their port
Not of mean suitors, nor important less
10 Seemed their petition, than when th' ancient pair
In fables old, less ancient yet than these,
Deucalion and chaste Pyrrha to restore
The race of mankind drowned, before the shrine
Of Themis stood devout.<sup>3</sup> To Heav'n their prayers
15 Flew up, nor missed the way, by envious winds
Blown vagabond or frustrate:<sup>4</sup> in they passed
Dimensionless through heav'nly doors; then clad
With incense, where the golden altar fumed,

By their great Intercessor, came in sight
Before the Father's throne: them the glad<sup>o</sup> Son 20 Presenting, thus to intercede began:
    "See Father, what firstfruits on earth are sprung
From thy implanted grace in man, these sighs
And prayers, which in this golden censer, mixed
With incense, I thy priest before thee bring,
25 Fruits of more pleasing savor from thy seed
Sown with contrition in his heart, than those
Which his own hand manuring<sup>o</sup> all the trees
Of Paradise could have produced, ere fall'n
From innocence. Now therefore bend thine ear
30 To supplication, hear his sighs though mute;
Unskillful with what words to pray, let me
Interpret for him, me his advocate
And propitiation, all his works on me
Good or not good ingraft,<sup>5</sup> my merit those 35 Shall perfect, and for these my death shall pay.
Accept me, and in me from these receive
The smell of peace toward mankind, let him live
Before thee reconciled, at least his days
Numbered, though sad, till death, his doom (which I 40 To mitigate thus plead, not to reverse)
To better life shall yield him, where with me
All my redeemed may dwell in joy and bliss,
Made one with me as I with thee am one."
    To whom the Father, without cloud, serene:
45 "All thy request for man, accepted Son,
Obtain, all thy request was my decree:
But longer in that Paradise to dwell,
The law I gave to nature him forbids:
Those pure immortal elements that know
50 No gross, no unharmonious mixture foul,
Eject him tainted now, and purge him off
As a distemper, gross to air as gross,

And mortal food,<sup>6</sup> as may dispose him best
For dissolution<sup>o</sup> wrought by sin, that first 55 Distempered all things, and of incorrupt
Corrupted. I at first with two fair gifts
Created him endowed, with happiness
And immortality: that fondly<sup>o</sup> lost,
This other served but to eternize woe;
60 Till I provided death; so death becomes
His final remedy, and after life
Tried in sharp tribulation, and refined
By faith and faithful works, to second life,
Waked in the renovation<sup>z</sup> of the just,
65 Resigns him up with Heav'n and earth renewed.
But let us call to synod<sup>o</sup> all the blest
Through Heav'n's wide bounds; from them I will not hide
My judgments, how with mankind I proceed,
As how with peccant<sup>o</sup> angels late they saw;
70 And in their state, though firm, stood more confirmed."

He ended, and the Son gave signal high
To the bright minister that watched, he blew
His trumpet, heard in Oreb<sup>8</sup> since perhaps
When God descended, and perhaps once more
75 To sound at general doom. Th' angelic blast
Filled all the regions: from their blissful bow'rs
Of amarantine<sup>o</sup> shade, fountain or spring,
By the waters of life, where'er they sat
In fellowships of joy, the sons of light
80 Hasted, resorting to the summons high,
And took their seats; till from his throne supreme
Th' Almighty thus pronounced his sov'reign will:
"O sons, like one of us man is become
To know both good and evil, since his taste
85 Of that defended<sup>o</sup> fruit; but let him boast

His knowledge of good lost, and evil got,
Happier, had it sufficed him to have known
Good by itself, and evil not at all.
He sorrows now, repents, and prays contrite,
90 My motions<sup>o</sup> in him; longer than they move,
His heart I know, how variable and vain
Self-left.<sup>9</sup> Lest therefore his now bolder hand
Reach also of the Tree of Life, and eat,
And live forever, dream at least to live
95 Forever,<sup>1</sup> to remove him I decree,
And send him from the garden forth to till
The ground whence he was taken, fitter soil.
"Michael, this my behest have thou in charge,
Take to thee from among the Cherubim
100 Thy choice of flaming warriors, lest the Fiend
Or<sup>o</sup> in behalf of man, or to invade
Vacant possession some new trouble raise:
Haste thee, and from the Paradise of God
Without remorse<sup>o</sup> drive out the sinful pair,
105 From hallowed ground th' unholy, and denounce
To them and to their progeny from thence Perpetual banishment. Yet lest they faint<sup>o</sup>
At the sad sentence rigorously urged,
For I behold them softened and with tears
110 Bewailing their excess,<sup>o</sup> all terror hide.
If patiently thy bidding they obey,
Dismiss them not disconsolate; reveal
To Adam what shall come in future days,
As I shall thee enlighten,<sup>2</sup> intermix
115 My cov'nant in the woman's seed renewed;
So send them forth, though sorrowing, yet in peace:
And on the east side of the garden place,
Where entrance up from Eden easiest climbs,
Cherubic watch, and of a sword the flame
120 Wide-waving, all approach far off to fright,

And guard all passage to the Tree of Life:<sup>3</sup>
 Lest Paradise a receptacle prove
 To spirits foul, and all my trees their prey,
 With whose stol'n fruit man once more to delude."
 125     He ceased; and th' archangelic power prepared
 For swift descent, with him the cohort bright
 Of watchful Cherubim; four faces each<sup>4</sup>
 Had, like a double Janus, all their shape
 Spangled with eyes more numerous than those 130     Of Argus, and more wakeful than to drowse,
 Charmed with Arcadian pipe, the pastoral reed
 Of Hermes, or his opiate rod. Meanwhile
 To resalute the world with sacred light
 Leucóthea<sup>5</sup> waked, and with fresh dewes embalmed
 135     The earth, when Adam and first matron Eve
 Had ended now their orisons, and found
 Strength added from above, new hope to spring
 Out of despair, joy, but with fear yet linked;
 Which thus to Eve his welcome words renewed:
 140     "Eve, easily may faith admit, that all
 The good which we enjoy, from Heav'n descends;
 But that from us aught should ascend to Heav'n
 So prevalent<sup>o</sup> as to concern the mind
 Of God high-blest, or to incline his will,
 145     Hard to belief may seem; yet this will prayer,
 Or one short sigh of human breath, upborne
 Ev'n to the seat of God. For since I sought
 By prayer th' offended Deity to appease,
 Kneeled and before him humbled all my heart,
 150     Methought I saw him placable and mild,
 Bending his ear; persuasion in me grew
 That I was heard with favor; peace returned
 Home to my breast, and to my memory
 His promise, that thy seed shall bruise our foe;
 155     Which then not minded in dismay, yet now

Assures me that the bitterness of death
 Is past, and we shall live. Whence hail to thee,
 Eve rightly called, mother of all mankind,
 Mother of all things living, since by thee
 160 Man is to live, and all things live for man."<sup>6</sup>
 To whom thus Eve with sad demeanor meek:
 "Ill-worthy I such title should belong
 To me transgressor, who for thee ordained
 A help, became thy snare; to me reproach
 165 Rather belongs, distrust and all dispraise:
 But infinite in pardon was my Judge,
 That I who first brought death on all, am graced
 The source of life; next favorable thou,
 Who highly thus to entitle me vouchsaf'st,
 170 Far other name deserving. But the field
 To labor calls us now with sweat imposed,
 Though after sleepless night; for see the morn,
 All unconcerned with our unrest, begins
 Her rosy progress smiling; let us forth,
 175 I never from thy side henceforth to stray,
 Where'er our day's work lies, though now enjoined
 Laborious, till day droop; while here we dwell,
 What can be toilsome in these pleasant walks?
 Here let us live, though in fall'n state, content."
 180 So spake, so wished much-humbled Eve, but fate
 Subscribed not; nature first gave signs,<sup>o</sup> impressed
 On bird, beast, air, air suddenly eclipsed<sup>o</sup>
 After short blush of morn; nigh in her sight
 The bird of Jove, stooped from his airy tow'r,<sup>7</sup>
 185 Two birds of gayest plume before him drove:
 Down from a hill the beast that reigns in woods,<sup>8</sup>
 First hunter then, pursued a gentle brace,<sup>o</sup>
 Goodliest of all the forest, hart and hind;
 Direct to th' eastern gate was bent their flight.
 190 Adam observed, and with his eye the chase

Pursuing, not unmoved to Eve thus spake:
    "O Eve, some further change awaits us nigh,
Which Heaven by these mute signs in nature shows
Forerunners of his purpose, or to warn
195 Us haply too secure<sup>o</sup> of our discharge
From penalty, because from death released
Some days; how long, and what till then our life,
Who knows, or more than this, that we are dust,
And thither must return and be no more.
200 Why else this double object in our sight
Of flight pursued in th' air and o'er the ground
One way the selfsame hour? Why in the east
Darkness ere day's mid-course, and morning light
More orient<sup>o</sup> in yon western cloud that draws 205 O'er the blue firmament a radiant white,
And slow descends, with something heav'nly fraught."<sup>o</sup>
    He erred not, for by this<sup>o</sup> the heav'nly bands
Down from a sky of jasper lighted<sup>o</sup> now
In Paradise, and on a hill made alt,<sup>o</sup>
210 A glorious apparition, had not doubt
And carnal fear that day dimmed Adam's eye.
Not that more glorious, when the angels met
Jacob in Mahanaim,<sup>9</sup> where he saw
The field pavilioned with his guardians bright;
215 Nor that which on the flaming mount appeared
In Dothan, covered with a camp of fire,
Against the Syrian king, who to surprise
One man, assassin-like had levied war,
War unproclaimed.<sup>1</sup> The princely hierarch<sup>2</sup>
220 In their bright stand, there left his powers to seize Possession of the garden; he alone,
To find where Adam sheltered, took his way,
Not unperceived of Adam, who to Eve,
While the great visitant approached, thus spake:
225

“Eve, now expect great tidings, which perhaps
Of us will soon determine,<sup>o</sup> or impose
New laws to be observed; for I descry
From yonder blazing cloud that veils the hill
One of the heav’nly host, and by his gait
230 None of the meanest, some great potentate
Or of the Thrones above, such majesty
Invests him coming; yet not terrible,
That I should fear, nor sociably mild,
As Raphael, that I should much confide,
235 But solemn and sublime, whom not to offend,
With reverence I must meet, and thou retire.”
He ended; and th’ Archangel soon drew nigh,
Not in his shape celestial, but as man
Clad to meet man; over his lucid arms
240 A military vest of purple flowed
Livelier than Meliboean, or the grain
Of Sarra,<sup>3</sup> worn by kings and heroes old
In time of truce; Iris<sup>4</sup> had dipped the woof;
His starry helm unbuckled showed him prime 245 In manhood where youth ended; by his side
As in a glistening zodiac<sup>o</sup> hung the sword,
Satan’s dire dread, and in his hand the spear.
Adam bowed low, he kingly from his state<sup>o</sup>
Inclined not, but his coming thus declared:
250 “Adam, Heav’n’s high behest no preface needs:
Sufficient that thy prayers are heard, and Death,
Then due by sentence when thou didst transgress,
Defeated<sup>o</sup> of his seizure<sup>o</sup> many days
Giv’n thee of grace, wherein thou may’st repent,
255 And one bad act with many deeds well done
May’st cover: well may then thy Lord appeased
Redeem thee quite from Death’s rapacious claim;
But longer in this Paradise to dwell
Permits not; to remove thee I am come,
260

And send thee from the garden forth to till
The ground whence thou wast taken, fitter soil."

He added not, for Adam at the news
Heart-strook with chilling gripe<sup>o</sup> of sorrow stood,
That all his senses bound; Eve, who unseen
265 Yet all had heard, with audible lament
Discovered<sup>o</sup> soon the place of her retire:

"O unexpected stroke, worse than of Death!
Must I thus leave thee Paradise? thus leave
Thee native soil,<sup>5</sup> these happy walks and shades,
270 Fit haunt of gods? where I had hope to spend,
Quiet though sad, the respite<sup>o</sup> of that day
That must be mortal to us both. O flow'rs,
That never will in other climate grow,
My early visitation, and my last
275 At ev'n which I bred up with tender hand
From the first op'ning bud, and gave ye names,<sup>6</sup>
Who now shall rear ye to the sun, or rank
Your tribes,<sup>o</sup> and water from th' ambrosial<sup>o</sup> fount?
Thee lastly nuptial bower, by me adorned
280 With what to sight or smell was sweet; from thee
How shall I part, and whither wander down
Into a lower world, to<sup>o</sup> this obscure
And wild, how shall we breathe in other air
Less pure, accustomed to immortal fruits?"

285 Whom thus the angel interrupted mild:
"Lament not Eve, but patiently resign
What justly thou hast lost; nor set thy heart,
Thus overfond, on that which is not thine;
Thy going is not lonely, with thee goes
290 Thy husband, him to follow thou art bound;
Where he abides, think there thy native soil."

Adam by this from the cold sudden damp<sup>o</sup>
Recovering, and his scattered spirits returned,
To Michael thus his humble words addressed:
295

“Celestial, whether among the Thrones, or named
Of them the highest, for such of shape may seem Prince above princes, gently hast thou told
Thy message, which might else in telling wound,
And in performing end us; what besides
300 Of sorrow and dejection and despair
Our frailty can sustain, thy tidings bring,
Departure from this happy place, our sweet
Recess, and only consolation left
Familiar to our eyes, all places else
305 Inhospitable appear and desolate,
Nor knowing us nor known: and if by prayer
Incessant I could hope to change the will
Of him who all things can, <sup>o</sup> I would not cease
To weary him with my assiduous cries:
310 But prayer against his absolute decree
No more avails than breath against the wind,
Blown stifling back on him that breathes it forth:
Therefore to his great bidding I submit.
This most afflicts me, that departing hence,
315 As from his face I shall be hid, deprived
His blessed count’nance; here I could frequent,
With worship, place by place where he vouchsafed
Presence Divine, and to my sons relate:
‘On this mount he appeared, under this tree
320 Stood visible, among these pines his voice
I heard, here with him at this fountain talked:’
So many grateful altars I would rear
Of grassy turf, and pile up every stone
Of luster from the brook, in memory,
325 Or monument to ages, and thereon
Offer sweet-smelling gums and fruits and flow’rs:
In yonder nether world where shall I seek
His bright appearances, or footstep trace?
For though I fled him angry, yet recalled
330

To life prolonged and promised race,<sup>7</sup> I now
Gladly behold though but his utmost skirts
Of glory, and far off his steps adore."

To whom thus Michael with regard benign:
335 "Adam, thou know'st Heav'n his, and all the earth,
Not this rock only; his omnipresence fills
Land, sea, and air, and every kind that lives,
Fomented<sup>o</sup> by his virtual<sup>o</sup> power and warmed:
All th' earth he gave thee to possess and rule,
No despicable gift; surmise not then
340 His presence to these narrow bounds confined
Of Paradise or Eden: this had been
Perhaps thy capital seat, from whence had spread
All generations, and had hither come
From all the ends of th' earth, to celebrate
345 And reverence thee their great progenitor.
But this preeminence thou hast lost, brought down
To dwell on even ground now with thy sons:
Yet doubt not but in valley and in plain
God is as here, and will be found alike
350 Present, and of his presence many a sign
Still following thee, still compassing thee round
With goodness and paternal love, his face
Express, and of his steps the track divine.
Which that thou may'st believe, and be confirmed,
355 Ere thou from hence depart, know I am sent
To show thee what shall come in future days
To thee and to thy offspring,<sup>8</sup> good with bad
Expect to hear, supernal<sup>o</sup> grace contending
With sinfulness of men; thereby to learn
360 True patience, and to temper joy with fear
And pious sorrow, equally inured<sup>o</sup>
By moderation either state to bare,
Prosperous or adverse: so shalt thou lead
365 Safest thy life, and best prepared endure

Thy mortal passage when it comes. Ascend
This hill; let Eve (for I have drenched her eyes)<sup>9</sup>
Here sleep below while thou to foresight wak'st,
As once thou slept'st while she to life was formed."

370 To whom thus Adam gratefully replied:
"Ascend, I follow thee, safe guide, the path
Thou lead'st me, and to the hand of Heav'n submit,
However chast'ning, to the evil turn
My obvious<sup>o</sup> breast, arming to overcome
By suffering, and earn rest from labor won,
375 If so I may attain." So both ascend
In the visions of God: it was a hill
Of Paradise the highest, from whose top
The hemisphere of earth in clearest ken<sup>o</sup>
Stretched out to amplest reach of prospect lay.
380 Not higher that hill nor wider looking round,
Whereon for different cause the Tempter set
Our second Adam in the wilderness,
To show him all earth's kingdoms and their glory.<sup>1</sup>
His eye might there command wherever stood
385 City of old or modern fame, the seat
Of mightiest empire, from the destined walls
Of Cambalu, seat of Cathaian Can,
And Samarkand by Oxus, Temir's throne,
To Paquin of Sinaean kings, and thence 390 To Agra and Lahore of Great Mogul
Down to the golden Chersonese,<sup>2</sup> or where
The Persian in Ecbatan sat, or since
In Hispahan, or where the Russian czar
In Moscow, or the sultan in Bizance,
395 Turkéstan-born;<sup>3</sup> nor could his eye not ken<sup>o</sup>
Th' empire of Negus to his utmost port
Ercoco and the less maritime kings
Mombaza, and Quiloa, and Melind,
And Sofala thought Ophir, to the realm

400 Of Congo, and Angola farthest south;<sup>4</sup>
Or thence from Niger flood to Atlas mount
The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez and Sus,
Morocco and Algiers, and Tremisen;<sup>5</sup>
405 On Europe thence, and where Rome was to sway
The world: in spirit perhaps he also saw
Rich Mexico the seat of Motezume,
And Cuzco in Peru, the richer seat
Of Atabalipa, and yet unspoiled
410 Guiana, whose great city Geryon's sons
Call El Dorado:<sup>6</sup> but to nobler sights
Michael from Adam's eyes the film removed
Which that false fruit that promised clearer sight
Had bred; then purged with euphrasy and rue<sup>7</sup>
415 The visual nerve, for he had much to see;
And from the well of life three drops instilled.
So deep the power of these ingredients pierced,
Ev'n to the inmost seat of mental sight,
That Adam now enforced to close his eyes,
Sunk down and all his spirits became entranced:
420 But him the gentle angel by the hand
Soon raised, and his attention thus recalled:
"Adam, now ope thine eyes, and first behold
Th' effects which thy original crime hath wrought
In some to spring from thee, who never touched
425 Th' excepted<sup>o</sup> tree, nor with the snake conspired,
Nor sinned thy sin, yet from that sin derive Corruption to bring forth more violent deeds."
His eyes he opened, and beheld a field,
430 Part arable and tilth,<sup>o</sup> whereon were sheaves
New-reaped, the other part sheep-walks and folds;
I' th' midst an altar as the landmark<sup>o</sup> stood
Rustic, of grassy sord;<sup>o</sup> thither anon
A sweaty reaper from his tillage brought
Firstfruits, the green ear, and the yellow sheaf,

Unculled,<sup>o</sup> as came to hand; a shepherd next 435 More meek came with the firstlings of his flock
Choicest and best; then sacrificing, laid
The inwards and their fat, with incense strewed,
On the cleft wood, and all due rites performed.
440 His off'ring soon propitious fire from Heav'n
Consumed with nimble glance, and grateful steam;
The other's not, for his was not sincere;<sup>8</sup>
Whereat he inly raged, and as they talked,
Smote him into the midriff with a stone
445 That beat out life; he fell, and deadly pale
Groaned out his soul with gushing blood effused.
Much at that sight was Adam in his heart
Dismayed, and thus in haste to th' angel cried:
"O teacher, some great mischief hath befall'n
450 To that meek man, who well had sacrificed;
Is piety thus and pure devotion paid?"
T' whom Michael thus, he also moved, replied:
"These two are brethren, Adam, and to come
Out of thy loins;<sup>9</sup> th' unjust the just hath slain,
455 For envy that his brother's offering found
From Heav'n acceptance; but the bloody fact<sup>o</sup>
Will be avenged, and th' other's faith approved
Lose no reward, though here thou see him die,
Rolling in dust and gore." To which our sire:
460 "Alas, both for the deed and for the cause!
But have I now seen death? Is this the way
I must return to native dust? O sight
Of terror, foul and ugly to behold,
Horrid to think, how horrible to feel!"
465 To whom thus Michaël: "Death thou hast seen
In his first shape on man; but many shapes
Of Death, and many are the ways that lead
To his grim cave, all dismal; yet to sense
More terrible at th' entrance than within.
470

Some, as thou saw'st, by violent stroke shall die,
By fire, flood, famine; by intemperance more
In meats and drinks, which on the earth shall bring Diseases dire, of which a monstrous crew
Before thee shall appear; that thou may'st know
475 What misery th' inabstinence of Eve
Shall bring on men." Immediately a place<sup>1</sup>
Before his eyes appeared, sad,<sup>o</sup> noisome, dark,
A lazar-house it seemed, wherein were laid
Numbers of all diseased, all maladies
480 Of ghastly spasm, or racking torture, qualms
Of heartsick agony, all feverous kinds,
Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs,
Intestine stone and ulcer, colic pangs,
Demoniac frenzy, moping melancholy
485 And moonstruck madness,<sup>o</sup> pining atrophy,
Marasmus, and wide-wasting pestilence,<sup>2</sup>
Dropsies, and asthmas, and joint-racking rheums.
Dire was the tossing, deep the groans, Despair
Tended the sick busiest from couch to couch;
490 And over them triumphant Death his dart
Shook, but delayed to strike, though oft invoked
With vows, as their chief good, and final hope.
Sight so deform what heart of rock could long
Dry-eyed behold? Adam could not, but wept,
495 Though not of woman born; compassion quelled
His best of man,<sup>o</sup> and gave him up to tears
A space, till firmer thoughts restrained excess,
And scarce recovering words his plaint renewed:
"O miserable mankind, to what fall
500 Degraded, to what wretched state reserved!
Better end here unborn. Why is life giv'n
To be thus wrested from us? Rather why
Obtruded on us thus? who if we knew
505 What we receive, would either not accept

Life offered, or soon beg to lay it down,
Glad to be so dismissed in peace. Can thus
Th' image of God in man created once
So goodly and erect, though faulty since,
To such unsightly sufferings be debased
510 Under inhuman pains? Why should not man,
Retaining still divine similitude
In part, from such deformities be free,
And for his Maker's image sake exempt?"

"Their Maker's image," answered Michael, "then 515 Forsook them, when themselves they vilified<sup>o</sup>
To serve ungoverned appetite, and took<sup>o</sup>
His image whom they served, a brutish vice,
Inductive<sup>o</sup> mainly to<sup>o</sup> the sin of Eve.
Therefore so abject is their punishment,
520 Disfiguring not God's likeness, but their own,
Or if his likeness, by themselves defaced
While they pervert pure nature's healthful rules
To loathsome sickness, worthily,<sup>o</sup> since they God's image did not reverence in themselves."

525 "I yield it just," said Adam, "and submit.
But is there yet no other way, besides
These painful passages, how we may come
To death, and mix with our connatural dust?"

"There is," said Michael, "if thou well observe 530 The rule of not too much, by temperance taught
In what thou eat'st and drink'st, seeking from thence Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight,
Till many years over thy head return:
So may'st thou live, till like ripe fruit thou drop 535 Into thy mother's<sup>3</sup> lap, or be with ease
Gathered, not harshly plucked, for death mature:
This is old age; but then thou must outlive
Thy youth, thy strength, thy beauty, which will change

540 To withered weak and gray; thy senses then
Obtuse, all taste of pleasure must forgo,
To what thou hast, and for the air of youth
Hopeful and cheerful, in thy blood will reign
A melancholy damp<sup>o</sup> of cold and dry
545 To weigh thy spirits down, and last consume
The balm<sup>o</sup> of life." To whom our ancestor:
"Henceforth I fly not death, nor would prolong
Life much, bent rather how I may be quit
Fairest and easiest of this cumbrous charge,
Which I must keep till my appointed day
550 Of rend'ring up, and patiently attend<sup>o</sup>
My dissolution." Michaël replied:
"Nor love thy life, nor hate; but what thou liv'st
Live well, how long or short permit to Heav'n:
And now prepare thee for another sight."
555 He looked and saw a spacious plain,<sup>4</sup> whereon
Were tents of various hue; by some were herds
Of cattle grazing: others, whence the sound
Of instruments that made melodious chime
Was heard, of harp and organ; and who moved 560 Their stops and chords was seen: his volant touch
Instinct through all proportions low and high
Fled and pursued transverse the resonant fugue.<sup>5</sup>
In other part stood one<sup>6</sup> who at the forge
Laboring, two massy clods of iron and brass
565 Had melted (whether found where casual<sup>o</sup> fire
Had wasted woods on mountain or in vale,
Down to the veins of earth, thence gliding hot
To some cave's mouth, or whether washed by stream
From underground) the liquid ore he drained
570 Into fit molds prepared; from which he formed
First his own tools; then, what might else be wrought

Fusile<sup>o</sup> or grav'n in metal. After these,
 But on the hither side a different sort<sup>7</sup> 575 From the high neighboring hills, which was their seat,
 Down to the plain descended: by their guise
 Just men they seemed, and all their study bent
 To worship God aright, and know his works
 Not hid,<sup>8</sup> nor those things last which might preserve
 580 Freedom and peace to men: they on the plain
 Long had not walked, when from the tents behold
 A bevy of fair women, richly gay
 In gems and wanton dress; to the harp they sung
 Soft amorous ditties, and in dance came on:
 585 The men though grave, eyed them, and let their eyes
 Rove without rein, till in the amorous net
 Fast caught, they liked, and each his liking chose;
 And now of love they treat till th' evening star<sup>9</sup>
 Love's harbinger appeared; then all in heat
 590 They light the nuptial torch, and bid invoke
 Hymen,<sup>1</sup> then first to marriage rites invoked;
 With feast and music all the tents resound.
 Such happy interview and fair event<sup>o</sup>
 Of love and youth not lost, songs, garlands, flow'rs,
 And charming symphonies attached<sup>o</sup> the heart
 595 Of Adam, soon<sup>o</sup> inclined to admit delight,
 The bent of nature; which he thus expressed:
       "True opener of mine eyes, prime angel blest,
 Much better seems this vision, and more hope
 Of peaceful days portends, than those two past;
 600 Those were of hate and death, or pain much worse,
 Here nature seems fulfilled in all her ends."
       To whom thus Michael: "Judge not what is best
 By pleasure, though to nature seeming meet,<sup>o</sup>
 Created, as thou art, to nobler end

Holy and pure, conformity divine.
605 Those tents thou saw'st so pleasant, were the tents
Of wickedness, wherein shall dwell his race
Who slew his brother; studious they appear
Of arts that polish life, inventors rare,
610 Unmindful of their Maker, though his spirit
Taught them, but they his gifts acknowledged none.
Yet they a beauteous offspring shall beget;
For that fair female troop thou saw'st, that seemed
Of goddesses, so blithe, so smooth, so gay,
615 Yet empty of all good wherein consists
Woman's domestic honor and chief praise;
Bred only and completed<sup>o</sup> to the taste
Of lustful appetite,<sup>o</sup> to sing, to dance,
To dress, and troll<sup>o</sup> the tongue, and roll the eye.
620 To these that sober race of men, whose lives
Religious titled them the sons of God,<sup>2</sup>
Shall yield up all their virtue, all their fame
Ignobly, to the trains<sup>o</sup> and to the smiles
Of these fair atheists, and now swim in joy,
625 (Erelong to swim at large) and laugh; for which
The world erelong a world of tears must weep."
To whom thus Adam of short joy bereft:
"O pity and shame, that they who to live well
Entered so fair, should turn aside to tread
630 Paths indirect, or in the mid-way faint!
But still I see the tenor of man's woe
Holds on the same, from woman to begin."
"From man's effeminate slackness it begins,"
Said th' angel, "who should better hold his place
635 By wisdom, and superior gifts received.
But now prepare thee for another scene."
He looked and saw wide territory spread
Before him, towns, and rural works between,
Cities of men with lofty gates and tow'rs,
640

Concourse<sup>o</sup> in arms, fierce faces threat'ning war,
Giants<sup>3</sup> of mighty bone, and bold emprise;<sup>o</sup>
Part wield their arms, part curb the foaming steed,
Single or in array of battle ranged<sup>o</sup>
Both horse and foot, nor idly must'ring stood;
645 One way a band select from forage drives
A herd of beeves, fair oxen and fair kine
From a fat meadow ground; or fleecy flock,
Ewes and their bleating lambs over the plain,
Their booty; scarce with life the shepherds fly,
650 But call in aid, which makes a bloody fray;
With cruel tournament the squadrons join;
Where cattle pastured late, now scattered lies
With carcasses and arms th' ensanguined<sup>o</sup> field
Deserted: others to a city strong
655 Lay siege, encamped; by battery, scale, and mine,<sup>4</sup>
Assaulting; others from the wall defend
With dart and jav'lin, stones and sulphurous fire;
On each hand slaughter and gigantic deeds.
In other part the sceptered heralds call
660 To council in the city gates: anon
Gray-headed men and grave, with warriors mixed,
Assemble, and harangues are heard, but soon
In factious opposition, till at last
Of middle age one<sup>5</sup> rising, eminent 665 In wise deport, spake much of right and wrong,
Of justice, of religion, truth and peace,
And judgment from above: him old and young
Exploded,<sup>o</sup> and had seized with violent hands,
Had not a cloud descending snatched him thence 670 Unseen amid the throng: so violence
Proceeded, and oppression, and sword-law
Through all the plain, and refuge none was found.
Adam was all in tears, and to his guide
Lamenting turned full sad; "O what are these,
675

Death's ministers, not men, who thus deal death
Inhumanly to men, and multiply
Ten-thousandfold the sin of him who slew
His brother; for of whom such massacre
Make they but of their brethren, men of men?
680 But who was that just man, whom had not Heav'n
Rescued, had in his righteousness been lost?"
To whom thus Michael: "These are the product
Of those ill-mated marriages thou saw'st:
Where good with bad were matched, who of 685 themselves
Abhor to join; and by imprudence mixed,
Produce prodigious births of body or mind.
Such were these giants, men of high renown;
For in those days might only shall be admired,
And valor and heroic virtue called;
690 To overcome in battle, and subdue
Nations, and bring home spoils with infinite
Manslaughter, shall be held the highest pitch
Of human glory, and for glory done
Of triumph, to be styled great conquerors,
695 Patrons of mankind, gods, and sons of gods,
Destroyers rightlier called and plagues of men.
Thus fame shall be achieved, renown on earth,
And what most merits fame in silence hid.
But he the sev'nth from thee, <sup>6</sup>whom thou beheld'st
700 The only righteous in a world perverse,
And therefore hated, therefore so beset
With foes for daring single to be just,
And utter odious truth, that God would come
To judge them with his saints: him the Most High 705 Rapt in a balmy cloud with winged steeds
Did, as thou saw'st, receive, to walk with God
High in salvation and the climes of bliss,
Exempt from death; to show thee what reward

710 Awaits the good, the rest what punishment;
Which now direct thine eyes and soon behold.”
He looked, and saw the face of things quite changed;
The brazen throat of war had ceased to roar,
All now was turned to jollity and game,
To luxury<sup>o</sup> and riot,<sup>o</sup> feast and dance,
715 Marrying or prostituting, as befell,
Rape or adultery, where passing fair<sup>o</sup>
Allured them; thence from cups to civil broils.
At length a reverend sire<sup>7</sup> among them came,
And of their doings great dislike declared,
720 And testified against their ways; he oft
Frequented their assemblies, whereso met,
Triumphs or festivals, and to them preached
Conversion and repentance, as to souls
In prison under judgments imminent:
725 But all in vain: which when he saw, he ceased
Contending, and removed his tents far off;
Then from the mountain hewing timber tall,
Began to build a vessel of huge bulk,
Measured by cubit, length, and breadth, and height,
730 Smeared round with pitch, and in the side a door
Contrived, and of provisions laid in large
For man and beast: when lo a wonder strange!
Of every beast, and bird, and insect small
Came sevens and pairs, and entered in, as taught
735 Their order: last the sire and his three sons
With their four wives; and God made fast the door.
Meanwhile the south wind rose, and with black wings
Wide hovering, all the clouds together drove
From under heav’n; the hills to their supply<sup>o</sup>
740 Vapor, and exhalation dusk<sup>o</sup> and moist,
Sent up amain;<sup>o</sup> and now the thickened sky

Like a dark ceiling stood; down rushed the rain
Impetuous, and continued till the earth
No more was seen; the floating vessel swum
745 Uplifted; and secure with beakèd prow
Rode tilting o'er the waves, all dwellings else
Flood overwhelmed, and them with all their pomp
Deep underwater rolled; sea covered sea,
Sea without shore;<sup>8</sup> and in their palaces
750 Where luxury late reigned, sea monsters whelped
And stabled; of mankind, so numerous late,
All left, in one small bottom<sup>o</sup> swum embarked.
How didst thou grieve then, Adam, to behold
The end of all thy offspring, end so sad,
755 Depopulation; thee another flood,
Of tears and sorrow a flood thee also drowned,
And sunk thee as thy sons; till gently reared
By th' angel, on thy feet thou stood'st at last,
Though comfortless, as when a father mourns
760 His children, all in view destroyed at once;
And scarce to th' angel utter'dst thus thy plaint:
    "O visions ill foreseen! Better had I
Lived ignorant of future, so had borne
My part of evil only, each day's lot
765 Enough to bear; those now, that were dispensed
The burd'n of many ages, on me light
At once, by my foreknowledge<sup>9</sup> gaining birth
Abortive, to torment me ere their being,
With thought that they must be. Let no man seek 770 Henceforth to be foretold what shall befall
Him or his children, evil he may be sure,
Which neither his foreknowing can prevent,
And he the future evil shall no less
In apprehension than in substance feel
775 Grievous to bear: but that care now is past,
Man is not whom to warn:<sup>1</sup> those few escaped

Famine and anguish will at last consume
Wand'ring that wat'ry desert: I had hope
When violence was ceased, and war on earth, 780 All would have then gone well, peace would have crowned
With length of happy days the race of man;
But I was far deceived; for now I see
Peace to corrupt no less than war to waste.
How comes it thus? Unfold, celestial guide,
785 And whether here the race of man will end."
To whom thus Michael: "Those whom last thou saw'st
In triumph and luxurious wealth, are they
First seen in acts of prowess eminent
And great exploits, but of true virtue void;
790 Who having spilt much blood, and done much waste
Subduing nations, and achieved thereby
Fame in the world, high titles, and rich prey, Shall change their course to pleasure, ease, and sloth,
Surfeit, and lust, till wantonness and pride
795 Raise out of friendship hostile deeds in peace.
The conquered also, and enslaved by war
Shall with their freedom lost all virtue lose
And fear of God, from whom their piety feigned
In sharp contest of battle found no aid
800 Against invaders; therefore cooled in zeal
Thenceforth shall practice how to live secure,
Worldly or dissolute, on what their lords
Shall leave them to enjoy, for th' earth shall bear
More than enough, that temperance may be tried:
805 So all shall turn degenerate, all depraved,
Justice and temperance, truth and faith forgot;<sup>2</sup>
One man except, the only son of light
In a dark age, against example good,

810 Against allurements, custom, and a world
 Offended; <sup>o</sup> fearless of reproach and scorn,
 Or violence, he of their wicked ways
 Shall them admonish, and before them set
 The paths of righteousness, how much more safe,
 815 And full of peace, denouncing <sup>o</sup> wrath to come
 On their impenitence; and shall return
 Of them derided, but of God observed
 The one just man alive; by his command
 Shall build a wondrous ark, as thou beheld'st,
 To save himself and household from amidst 820 A world devote <sup>o</sup> to universal wrack.
 No sooner he with them of man and beast
 Select for life shall in the ark be lodged,
 And sheltered round, but all the cataracts <sup>o</sup>
 825 Of heav'n set open on the earth shall pour
 Rain day and night, all fountains of the deep
 Broke up, shall heave the ocean to usurp
 Beyond all bounds, till inundation rise
 Above the highest hills: then shall this mount
 Of Paradise by might of waves be moved
 830 Out of his place, pushed by the hornèd flood, <sup>3</sup>
 With all his verdure spoiled, and trees adrift
 Down the great river to the op'ning gulf, <sup>4</sup>
 And there take root an island salt and bare,
 The haunt of seals and ores, <sup>o</sup> and sea mews' <sup>o</sup> clang.
 835 To teach thee that God átttributes to place
 No sanctity, if none be thither brought
 By men who there frequent, or therein dwell.
 And now what further shall ensue, behold."
 He looked, and saw the ark hull <sup>o</sup> on the flood,
 840 Which now abated, for the clouds were fled,
 Driv'n by a keen north wind, that blowing dry
 Wrinkled the face of deluge, as decayed;
 And the clear sun on his wide wat'ry glass

845 Gazed hot, and of the fresh wave largely drew,
As after thirst, which made their flowing shrink
From standing lake to tripping<sup>o</sup> ebb, that stole
With soft foot towards the deep, who now had stopped
His sluices, as the heav'n his windows shut.
The ark no more now floats, but seems on ground
850 Fast on the top of some high mountain fixed.<sup>5</sup>
And now the tops of hills as rocks appear;
With clamor thence the rapid currents drive
Towards the retreating sea their furious tide.
Forthwith from out the ark a raven flies,
855 And after him, the surer messenger,
A dove sent forth once and again to spy
Green tree or ground whereon his foot may light;
The second time returning, in his bill
An olive leaf he brings, pacific sign:
860 Anon dry ground appears, and from his ark
The ancient sire descends with all his train;
Then with uplifted hands, and eyes devout,
Grateful to Heav'n, over his head beholds
A dewy cloud, and in the cloud a bow
865 Conspicuous with three listed colors gay,<sup>6</sup>
Betok'ning peace from God, and covenant new.
Whereat the heart of Adam erst so sad
Greatly rejoiced, and thus his joy broke forth:
"O thou who future things canst represent 870 As present, heav'nly instructor, I revive
At this last sight, assured that man shall live
With all the creatures, and their seed preserve.
Far less I now lament for one whole world
Of wicked sons destroyed, than I rejoice
875 For one man found so perfect and so just,
That God vouchsafes to raise another world
From him, and all his anger to forget.<sup>7</sup>

But say, what mean those colored streaks in heav'n,
 Distended<sup>o</sup> as the brow of God appeased,
 880 Or serve they as a flow'ry verge to bind
 The fluid skirts of that same wat'ry cloud,
 Lest it again dissolve and show'r the earth?"
 To whom th' Archangel: "Dextrously thou aim'st;
 So willingly doth God remit his ire,
 885 Though late repenting him of man depraved,
 Grieved at his heart, when looking down he saw
 The whole earth filled with violence, and all flesh
 Corrupting each their way; yet those removed,
 890 Such grace shall one just man find in his sight,
 That he relents, not to blot out mankind,
 And makes a cov'nant<sup>8</sup> never to destroy
 The earth again by flood, nor let the sea
 Surpass his bounds, nor rain to drown the world
 With man therein or beast; but when he brings 895 Over the earth a cloud, will therein set
 His triple-colored bow, whereon to look
 And call to mind his cov'nant: day and night,
 Seed-time and harvest, heat and hoary frost
 Shall hold their course, till fire purge all things new, 900 Both heav'n and earth, wherein the just shall dwell."<sup>9</sup>

Endnotes

- Note 1: "Stood" may mean "remained," or that, after prostrating themselves (10.1099) they prayed standing upright; their demeanor ("port") was "Not of mean suitors" (11.8–9), and they had stood to pray before (4.720). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Grace given before the human will can turn from sin, enabling it to do so. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Greek myth, when Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha (like Noah's family) alone survived a universal flood, they sought direction from Themis, goddess of justice; she told them to throw stones behind them, which became men and women.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: That is, their prayers were not scattered ("blown vagabond") by spiteful ("envious") winds, or prevented ("frustrate") from reaching their goal. "Dimensionless": without physical extension.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The theological term for Christ's standing in the place of humankind, taking onto himself all their deeds, perfecting the good by his merit, and, by his death, "paying" (see next line) the debt due God's justice for their evil deeds.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The pure elements of the Garden of Eden will themselves "purge" Adam and Eve as an impurity or disorder ("distemper"), ejecting them to a place where the air and food are more gross, like themselves.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The resurrection and renewal of body and soul on the Last Day.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Where God delivered the Ten Commandments to the sound of a trumpet (Exodus 19:19); it will sound again at the Last Judgment ("general doom," line 76).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Left to itself, without my continual promptings ("motions," line 91), I know his heart to be "variable and vain."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Milton adds the phrase "dream at least to live forever" to suggest that parts of God's speech (especially lines 84–85 and 93–95, closely quoted from Genesis 3:22) are ironic.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: God, it seems, has to "enlighten" Michael with knowledge of humankind's future at the same time Michael presents that future to Adam (see 12.128); Michael is told to "intermix" in his account God's "cov'nant in the woman's seed" (lines 115–16), the "mysterious" promise of the redeemer hinted when the Son pronounced judgment on the serpent (10.179–81).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Compare Genesis 3:24: "he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life."Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Ezekiel 1:6 Janus (line 129), the Roman god of doorways, had two faces; in one version he had four, corresponding to the four seasons and the four quarters of the earth. Argus (line 131), a giant with one hundred eyes, was set by Juno to watch Jove's mistress Io, but Hermes (Mercury) put all of his eyes to sleep with his music ("pipe") and his sleep-producing caduceus ("opiate rod").Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Roman goddess of the dawn.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The name Eve is cognate with the Hebrew word meaning "life." In Genesis 3:20 Adam names his wife Eve only after the Fall; Milton's Adam has named her before (4.481) and now affirms that that name is right.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The eagle swooped ("stooped") from his soaring flight ("tow'r").Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The lion.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Jacob gave that name, meaning "armies" or "camps" ("field pavilioned," line 215), to a place where he saw an army of angels (Genesis 32:2).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The Syrian king levied war against "Dothan" (line 217) in order to capture Elisha the prophet ("One man," line 219), but the Lord saved Elisha by sending "horses and chariots of fire" (2 Kings 6:8ff.).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Michael, who left his angelic forces ("powers") in their formation ("stand") to take possession of the garden (lines 221–22).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Both Meliboea and Tyre ("Sarra") in Thessaly were famous for purple dye.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Goddess of the rainbow.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Unlike Adam, Eve was created in the Paradise of Eden.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Departing from Genesis 2:19–20, in which Adam alone gives names, Milton has Eve name the flowers, an action that signifies (like Adam's naming of the beasts, 8.352–54) intuitive knowledge of their nature.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: His descendants, from whom will spring the “promised Seed.” See 10.180–81 and n. 1, and 12.623.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Prophetic visions are a common feature in epic, for example, Aeneas’s vision of his descendants culminating in the Roman Empire (Virgil, Aeneid 6.754–854).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Put a soporific liquid (“drench”) in her eyes.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: When Satan tempted Christ (the subject of Milton’s “brief epic” Paradise Regained), he took him up to “an exceeding high mountain” and showed him “all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them” (Matthew 4:8). The passage that follows details the places “he” (Christ and/or Adam) might see (lines 386–411).Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
His first views are of “destined” (yet to come) great kingdoms in Asia: “Cambalu,” capital of “Cathay,” the region of North China ruled by such khans as Genghis and Kublai; “Samarkand,” ruled by Tamburlaine (“Temir”), near the “Oxus” river near modern Uzbekistan; Beijing (“Paquin,” Peking), ruled by Chinese (“Sinaean”) kings; “Agra” and “Lahore,” capitals in northern India ruled by the “Great Mogul”; “golden Chersonese,” an area sometimes identified with the Malay Peninsula.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Next, Persian and Turkish kingdoms. From Persia (Iran): Ecbatana (“Ecbatan”), a summer residence of Persian kings, and the 16th-century Persian capital Isfahan (“Hispanan”); and Byzantium (“Bizance,” Constantinople, Istanbul), capital of the Ottoman Empire after falling to the Turks in 1453.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: From Africa: Abyssinia (empire of King “Negus”); Arkiko (“Ercoco”) in Ethiopia, a Red Sea port; Mombasa (“Mombaza”) and Malindi (“Melind”) in Kenya; Kilwa (“Quilwa”) in Tanzania; “Sofala,” sometimes identified with the biblical “Ophir” from which Solomon took gold for his Temple (1 Kings 9:28); and “Congo” and “Angola” on the west coast.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: In North Africa: the kingdoms of "Almansor" (the name shared by various Muslim rulers, here referring probably to Abu-Amir al Ma-Ma'afiri, caliph of Cordova) reached from the "Niger" River in northern Morocco to the "Atlas" Mountains in Algeria, taking in Morocco (and its capital, "Fez"), Tunis ("Sus"), and part of Algeria called Tiemecen ("Tremisen").Return to reference 5
- Note 6:
Because they lay on the other side of the spherical earth, Christ and/or Adam could only see places in the New World "in spirit" (line 406): Mexico, the seat of Montezuma ("Motezume"), the last Aztec emperor; "Cuzco in Peru," seat of Atahualpa ("Atabalipa"), the last Incan emperor (murdered by Pizarro); and "Guiana" (a region including Surinam, Guyana, and parts of Venezuela and Brazil). Unlike Mexico and Peru it was "yet unspoiled" by the Spaniards (sons of the evil monster "Geryon," in Spenser an allegory of the great power and oppression of Spain), though they identified its chief city, Manoa, with the fabled city of gold, "El Dorado."
Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Both herbs were thought to sharpen eyesight.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Milton's version of the Cain and Abel story (Genesis 4:1–16) provides a clear reason for God's rejection of Cain's sacrifice.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Adam has to be told that these are his own sons, not simply descendants.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: This is the only nonbiblical sight shown to Adam, a "lazar-house" (line 479)—a hospital for leprosy and infectious diseases, especially syphilis.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The plague. "Marasmus": a wasting disease of the body.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: "Mother" earth.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Adam's third vision is based on Genesis 4:19–22; "tents" (next line) identifies these as the descendants of Cain, described as "such as dwell in tents."Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Genesis 4:21 describes Cain's descendant Jubal as "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." "Volant": nimble; "instinct": instinctive; "proportions": ratios of pitches; "fugue": musical form in which one statement of the theme seems to chase another.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Tubal-cain, "instructor of every artificer in brass and iron" (Genesis 4:22).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The descendants of Seth, Adam's third son (Genesis 5:3); "hither side": away from the "east" (Genesis 4:16), where Cain's sons lived.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: They studied God's visible works, not the "matters hid" that Raphael had warned Adam against.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Venus.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: God of marriage.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Like many exegetes, Milton identifies the "sons of God" as the descendants of Seth, and the "daughters of men" whom they wed (Genesis 6:2) as the descendants of Cain.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Adam's fourth vision, based on Genesis 6:4, is of the "Giant" offspring of the previous marriages (identified at lines 683–84); Milton makes them exemplify false heroism and false glory sought through military might and conquest (lines 689–99).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, by battering, scaling, and tunneling under the walls.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Enoch, who "walked with God: and he was not; for God took him" (Genesis 5:24); Milton elaborates on the story.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Here Enoch is more precisely identified by generation, but neither he nor the other biblical personages in these pageants are named. Apparently, Michael and Adam together see the pageants, and Michael (by God's illumination) can interpret them rightly, but neither of the two knows the names these persons will later bear.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Noah. Milton's account is based on Genesis 6–9.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: The “sea without shore” and some other features of this description are taken from Ovid’s account of Deucalion’s Flood (Metamorphoses 1.292–300, Sandys translation).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The term suggests that Adam is experiencing something akin to God’s foreknowledge, which the poem insists is not predestination. Adam knows what is to happen but can neither cause it nor prevent it.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, there is no man to warn, all will die.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: This passage (lines 797–807) may also allude to the backsliding Puritans who betrayed the Commonwealth in 1660 and have now taken on the vices of the restored royalists.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Classical river gods were often depicted as horned.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, down the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Mount Ararat (Genesis 8:4).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The primary colors, red, yellow, and blue.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The language invites recognition of Noah as a type (foreshadowing) of Christ, the one “perfect” and “just” who will cause God to forget his anger.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The language of covenant makes this promise—that God will not again destroy the earth by flood—a type of the “covenant of grace” through which God will save humankind.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The restoration of the orderly processes of nature after the Flood is identified as a type (foreshadowing) of the final renewal of all things after the final conflagration at the Last Judgment.Return to reference 9

Book 12

The Arguments

The angel Michael continues from the Flood to relate what shall succeed; then, in the mention of Abraham, comes by degrees to explain, who that Seed of the Woman shall be, which was promised Adam and Eve in the Fall; his incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension; the state of the church till his second coming. Adam greatly satisfied and recomforted by these relations and promises descends the hill with Michael; wakens Eve, who all this while had slept, but with gentle dreams composed to quietness of mind and submission. Michael in either hand leads them out of Paradise, the fiery sword waving behind them, and the Cherubim taking their stations to guard the place.

As one who in his journey bates<sup>o</sup> at noon,
Though bent on speed, so here the Archangel paused
Betwixt the world destroyed and world restored,
If Adam aught perhaps might interpose;
5 Then with transition sweet new speech resumes:<sup>1</sup>
    "Thus thou hast seen one world begin and end;
And man as from a second stock proceed.
Much thou hast yet to see, but I perceive
Thy mortal sight to fail; objects divine
Must needs impair and weary human sense:
10 Henceforth what is to come I will relate,<sup>2</sup>
Thou therefore give due audience, and attend.
This second source of men, while yet but few,
And while the dread of judgment past remains
Fresh in their minds, fearing the Deity,
15

With some regard to what is just and right
Shall lead their lives, and multiply apace,
Laboring the soil, and reaping plenteous crop,
Corn, wine, and oil; and from the herd or flock,
Oft sacrificing bullock, lamb, or kid,
20 With large wine-offerings poured, and sacred feast,
Shall spend their days in joy unblamed, and dwell
Long time in peace by families and tribes
Under paternal rule; till one<sup>3</sup> shall rise
Of proud ambitious heart, who not content
25 With fair equality, fraternal state,
Will arrogate dominion undeserved
Over his brethren, and quite dispossess
Concord and law of nature from the earth;
Hunting (and men not beasts shall be his game)
30 With war and hostile snare such as refuse
Subjection to his empire tyrannous:
A mighty hunter thence he shall be styled<sup>o</sup>
Before the Lord, as in despite of Heav'n,
Or from Heav'n claiming second sov'reignty;<sup>4</sup>
35 And from rebellion shall derive his name,
Though of rebellion others he accuse.
He with a crew, whom like ambition joins
With him or under him to tyrannize,
Marching from Eden towards the west, shall find 40 The plain, wherein a black bituminous gurge<sup>o</sup>
Boils out from underground, the mouth of Hell;
Of brick, and of that stuff they cast<sup>o</sup> to build
A city and tow'r,<sup>5</sup> whose top may reach to Heav'n;
And get themselves a name, lest far dispersed
45 In foreign lands their memory be lost,
Regardless whether good or evil fame.
But God who oft descends to visit men
Unseen, and through their habitations walks
To mark their doings, them beholding soon,
50

Comes down to see their city, ere the tower
Obstruct Heav'n tow'rs, and in derision sets
Upon their tongues a various<sup>o</sup> spirit to raze
Quite out their native language, and instead
To sow a jangling noise of words unknown:
55      Forthwith a hideous gabble<sup>6</sup> rises loud
Among the builders; each to other calls
Not understood, till hoarse, and all in rage,
As mocked they storm; great laughter was in Heav'n
And looking down, to see the hubbub strange
60      And hear the din; thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work Confusion<sup>7</sup> named."

    Where to thus Adam fatherly displeased:
"O execrable son so to aspire
Above his brethren, to himself assuming 65      Authority usurped, from God not giv'n:
He gave us only over beast, fish, fowl
Dominion absolute; that right we hold
By his donation; but man over men
He made not lord; such title to himself
70      Reserving, human left from human free.<sup>8</sup>
But this usurper his encroachment proud
Stays not on man; to God his tower intends
Siege and defiance: wretched man! What food
Will he convey up thither to sustain
75      Himself and his rash army, where thin air
Above the clouds will pine<sup>o</sup> his entrails gross,
And famish him of breath, if not of bread?"

    To whom thus Michael: "Justly thou abhorr'st
That son, who on the quiet state of men
80      Such trouble brought, affecting<sup>o</sup> to subdue
Rational liberty; yet know withal,
Since thy original lapse, true liberty
Is lost, which always with right reason dwells
Twinned, and from her hath no dividual<sup>o</sup> being:<sup>9</sup>
85

Reason in man obscured, or not obeyed,
Immediately inordinate desires
And upstart passions catch the government
From reason, and to servitude reduce
Man till then free. Therefore since he permits
90 Within himself unworthy powers to reign
Over free reason, God in judgment just
Subjects him from without to violent lords;
Who oft as undeservedly enthrall
His outward freedom: tyranny must be,
95 Though to the tyrant thereby no excuse.
Yet sometimes nations will decline so low
From virtue, which is reason, that no wrong,
But justice, and some fatal curse annexed
Deprives them of their outward liberty,
100 Their inward lost: witness th' irreverent son<sup>1</sup>
Of him who built the ark, who for the shame
Done to his father, heard this heavy curse,
'Servant of servants,' on his vicious race.<sup>2</sup>
Thus will this latter, as the former world,
105 Still tend from bad to worse, till God at last
Wearied with their iniquities, withdraw
His presence from among them, and avert
His holy eyes; resolving from thenceforth
To leave them to their own polluted ways;
110 And one peculiar<sup>o</sup> nation to select
From all the rest, of whom to be invoked,
A nation from one faithful man<sup>3</sup> to spring:
Him on this side Euphrates yet residing,
Bred up in idol-worship; O that men
115 (Canst thou believe?) should be so stupid grown,
While yet the patriarch<sup>4</sup> lived, who scaped the Flood,
As to forsake the living God, and fall
To worship their own work in wood and stone
For gods! Yet him God the Most High vouchsafes

120 To call by vision from his father's house,
His kindred and false gods, into a land
Which he will show him, and from him will raise
A mighty nation, and upon him show'r
His benediction so, that in his seed
125 All nations shall be blest; he straight<sup>o</sup> obeys,
Not knowing to what land, yet firm believes:
I see him, but thou canst not,<sup>5</sup> with what faith
He leaves his gods, his friends, and native soil
Ur<sup>6</sup> of Chaldaea, passing now the ford
130 To Haran, after him a cumbrous train
Of herds and flocks, and numerous servitude;<sup>o</sup>
Not wand'ring poor, but trusting all his wealth
With God, who called him, in a land unknown.
Canaan he now attains, I see his tents
135 Pitched about Sechem, and the neighboring plain
Of Moreh; there by promise he receives
Gift to his progeny of all that land;
From Hamath northward to the desert south
(Things by their names I call, though yet unnamed)
140 From Hermon east to the great western sea,<sup>7</sup>
Mount Hermon, yonder sea, each place behold
In prospect, as I point them; on the shore
Mount Carmel; here the double-founted stream
Jordan, true limit eastward; but his sons
145 Shall dwell to Senir, that long ridge of hills.<sup>8</sup>
This ponder, that all nations of the earth
Shall in his seed be blessed; by that Seed
Is meant thy great Deliverer,<sup>9</sup> who shall bruise
The Serpent's head; whereof to thee anon
150 Plainlier shall be revealed. This patriarch blest,
Whom 'faithful Abraham'<sup>1</sup> due time shall call,
A son, and of his son a grandchild leaves,
Like him in faith, in wisdom, and renown;
The grandchild with twelve sons increased, departs

155 From Canaan, to a land hereafter called
Egypt, divided by the river Nile;
See where it flows,<sup>2</sup> disgorging at seven mouths
Into the sea: to sojourn in that land
He comes invited by a younger son<sup>3</sup>
160 In time of dearth,<sup>o</sup> a son whose worthy deeds
Raise him to be the second in that realm
Of Pharaoh: there he dies, and leaves his race
Growing into a nation, and now grown
Suspected to<sup>o</sup> a sequent<sup>o</sup> king, who seeks 165 To stop their overgrowth, as inmate<sup>o</sup> guests Too numerous; whence of guests he makes them slaves
Inhospitably, and kills their infant males:
Till by two brethren (those two brethren call Moses and Aaron) sent from God to claim
170 His people from enthrallment, they return
With glory and spoil back to their promised land.<sup>4</sup>
But first the lawless tyrant, who denies<sup>o</sup>
To know their God, or message to regard,
Must be compelled by signs and judgments dire;<sup>5</sup>
175 To blood unshed the rivers must be turned,
Frogs, lice, and flies must all his palace fill
With loathed intrusion, and fill all the land;
His cattle must of rot and murrain<sup>o</sup> die,
Botches and blains must all his flesh emboss,<sup>6</sup>
180 And all his people; thunder mixed with hail,
Hail mixed with fire must rend th' Egyptian sky
And wheel on th' earth, devouring where it rolls;
What it devours not, herb, or fruit, or grain,
A darksome cloud of locusts swarming down
185 Must eat, and on the ground leave nothing green:
Darkness must overshadow all his bounds,
Palpable darkness, and blot out three days;
Last with one midnight stroke all the firstborn

Of Egypt must lie dead. Thus with ten wounds<sup>o</sup>
190 The river-dragon<sup>7</sup> tamed at length submits
To let his sojourners depart, and oft
Humbles his stubborn heart, but still as ice
More hardened after thaw, till in his rage
Pursuing whom he late dismissed, the sea
195 Swallows him with his host, but them lets pass
As on dry land between two crystal walls,
Awed by the rod of Moses so to stand
Divided, till his rescued gain their shore:<sup>8</sup>
Such wondrous power God to his saint will lend,
200 Though present in his angel, who shall go
Before them in a cloud, and pillar of fire,
By day a cloud, by night a pillar of fire,
To guide them in their journey,<sup>9</sup> and remove Behind them, while th' obdurate king pursues:
205 All night he will pursue, but his approach
Darkness defends<sup>o</sup> between till morning watch;
Then through the fiery pillar and the cloud
God looking forth will trouble all his host
And craze<sup>o</sup> their chariot wheels: when by command
210 Moses once more his potent rod extends
Over the sea; the sea his rod obeys;
On their embattled ranks the waves return,
And overwhelm their war:<sup>o</sup> the race elect
Safe towards Canaan from the shore advance
215 Through the wild desert, not the readiest way,
Lest ent'ring on the Canaanite alarmed<sup>o</sup>
War terrify them inexperienced, and fear
Return them back to Egypt, choosing rather Inglorious life with servitude; for life
220 To noble and ignoble is more sweet
Untrained in arms, where rashness leads not on.<sup>1</sup>
This also shall they gain by their delay
In the wide wilderness, there they shall found

225 Their government, and their great senate<sup>2</sup> choose
Through the twelve tribes, to rule by laws ordained:
God from the mount of Sinai, whose gray top
Shall tremble, he descending, will himself
In thunder, lightning, and loud trumpet's sound
Ordain them laws; part such as appertain
230 To civil justice, part religious rites
Of sacrifice,<sup>3</sup> informing them, by types
And shadows, of that destined Seed to bruise
The Serpent, by what means he shall achieve
Mankind's deliverance.<sup>4</sup> But the voice of God
235 To mortal ear is dreadful; they beseech
That Moses might report to them his will,
And terror cease; he grants what they besought
Instructed that to God is no access
Without mediator, whose high office now
240 Moses in figure<sup>5</sup> bears, to introduce
One greater, of whose day he shall foretell,
And all the prophets in their age the times
Of great Messiah shall sing. Thus laws and rites
Established, such delight hath God in men
245 Obedient to his will, that he vouchsafes
Among them to set up his tabernacle,
The Holy One with mortal men to dwell:
By his prescript a sanctuary is framed
Of cedar, overlaid with gold, therein
250 An ark, and in the ark his testimony,
The records of his cov'nant, over these
A mercy-seat of gold between the wings
Of two bright Cherubim, before him burn
Seven lamps as in a zodiac<sup>o</sup> representing 255 The heav'nly fires; over the tent a cloud
Shall rest by day, a fiery gleam by night,
Save when they journey, and at length they come,
Conducted by his angel to the land

260 Promised to Abraham and his seed: the rest
Were long to tell, how many battles fought,
How many kings destroyed, and kingdoms won,
Or how the sun shall in mid-heav'n stand still
A day entire, and night's due course adjourn,
265 Man's voice commanding, 'Sun in Gibeon stand,
And thou moon in the vale of Aialon,
Till Israel overcome';<sup>6</sup> so call the third
From Abraham, son of Isaac, and from him
His whole descent,<sup>7</sup> who thus shall Canaan win."
Here Adam interposed: "O sent from Heav'n,
270 Enlight'ner of my darkness, gracious things
Thou hast revealed, those chiefly which concern
Just Abraham and his seed: now first I find
Mine eyes true op'ning, and my heart much eased,
Erewhile perplexed with thoughts what would 275 become
Of me and all mankind; but now I see
His day, in whom all nations shall be blest,<sup>8</sup>
Favor unmerited by me, who sought
Forbidden knowledge by forbidden means.
This yet I apprehend not, why to those 280 Among whom God will deign to dwell on earth
So many and so various laws are giv'n;
So many laws argue so many sins
Among them; how can God with such reside?"
To whom thus Michael: "Doubt not but that sin
285 Will reign among them, as of thee begot;
And therefore was law given them to evince<sup>o</sup>
Their natural pravity,<sup>o</sup> by stirring up
Sin against law to fight; that when they see
Law can discover sin, but not remove,
290 Save by those shadowy expiations weak,
The blood of bulls and goats, they may conclude
Some blood more precious must be paid for man,

Just for unjust, that in such righteousness
To them by faith imputed, they may find
295 Justification towards God, and peace
Of conscience,<sup>9</sup> which the law by ceremonies
Cannot appease, nor man the moral part
Perform, and not performing cannot live.<sup>1</sup>
So law appears imperfect, and but giv'n
300 With purpose to resign<sup>o</sup> them in full time
Up to a better cov'nant, disciplined
From shadowy types to truth, from flesh to spirit,
From imposition of strict laws, to free
Acceptance of large grace, from servile fear
305 To filial, works of law to works of faith.<sup>2</sup>
And therefore shall not Moses, though of God
Highly beloved, being but the minister
Of law, his people into Canaan lead;
But Joshua whom the Gentiles Jesus call,<sup>3</sup>
310 His name and office bearing, who shall quell
The adversary Serpent, and bring back
Through the world's wilderness long-wandered man
Safe to eternal paradise of rest.
Meanwhile they in their earthly Canaan placed
315 Long time shall dwell and prosper, but when sins
National interrupt their public peace,
Provoking God to raise them enemies:
From whom as oft he saves them penitent<sup>o</sup>
By judges first, then under kings; of whom 320 The second, both for piety renowned
And puissant<sup>o</sup> deeds, a promise shall receive Irrevocable, that his regal throne
Forever shall endure;<sup>4</sup> the like shall sing
All prophecy, that of the royal stock
325 Of David (so I name this king) shall rise
A son, the Woman's Seed to thee foretold,<sup>5</sup>
Foretold to Abraham, as in whom shall trust

All nations, and to kings foretold, of kings
The last, for of his reign shall be no end.
330 But first a long succession must ensue,
And his next son for wealth and wisdom famed,
The clouded ark of God till then in tents
Wand'ring, shall in a glorious temple enshrine.<sup>6</sup>
Such follow him, as shall be registered
335 Part good, part bad, of bad the longer scroll,
Whose foul idolatries and other faults
Heaped<sup>o</sup> to the popular sum, will so incense
God, as to leave them, and expose their land,
Their city, his temple, and his holy ark
340 With all his sacred things, a scorn and prey
To that proud city, whose high walls thou saw'st
Left in confusion, Babylon thence called.
There in captivity he lets them dwell
The space of seventy years,<sup>7</sup> then brings them back, 345 Rememb'ring mercy, and his cov'nant sworn
To David, stablished as the days of Heav'n.
Returned from Babylon by leave of kings<sup>8</sup>
Their lords, whom God disposed,<sup>o</sup> the house of God
They first re-edify, and for a while 350 In mean estate live moderate, till grown
In wealth and multitude, factious they grow;
But first among the priests dissension springs,
Men who attend the altar, and should most Endeavor peace: their strife pollution brings 355 Upon the Temple itself: at last they seize
The scepter, and regard not David's sons,<sup>o</sup>
Then lose it to a stranger,<sup>9</sup> that the true
Anointed King Messiah might be born
Barred of his right; yet at his birth a star
360 Unseen before in heav'n proclaims him come,
And guides the eastern sages,<sup>o</sup> who inquire
His place, to offer incense, myrrh, and gold;

His place of birth a solemn<sup>o</sup> angel tells
 To simple shepherds, keeping watch by night;
 365 They gladly thither haste, and by a choir
 Of squadroned angels hear his carol sung.
 A virgin is his mother, but his sire
 The Power of the Most High; he shall ascend
 The throne hereditary, and bound his reign 370 With earth's wide bounds, his glory with the heav'ns."
 He ceased, discerning Adam with such joy
 Surcharged,<sup>o</sup> as had like grief been dewed in tears,
 Without the vent of words, which these he breathed:
 "O prophet of glad tidings, finisher
 375 Of utmost hope! now clear I understand
 What oft my steadiest thoughts have searched in vain,
 Why our great expectation should be called
 The Seed of Woman: Virgin Mother, hail,
 High in the love of Heav'n, yet from my loins
 380 Thou shalt proceed, and from thy womb the Son
 Of God Most High; so God with man unites.
 Needs must the Serpent now his capital<sup>o</sup> bruise
 Expect with mortal pain: say where and when
 Their fight, what stroke shall bruise the victor's heel."
 385 To whom thus Michael: "Dream not of their fight,
 As of a duel, or the local wounds
 Of head or heel: not therefore joins the Son
 Manhood to Godhead, with more strength to foil
 Thy enemy; nor so is overcome
 390 Satan, whose fall from Heav'n, a deadlier bruise,
 Disabled not to give thee thy death's wound:
 Which he who comes thy Savior, shall recure,<sup>o</sup>
 Not by destroying Satan, but his works
 In thee and in thy seed: nor can this be,
 395 But by fulfilling that which thou didst want,<sup>o</sup>
 Obedience to the law of God, imposed

On penalty of death, and suffering death,
The penalty to thy transgression due,
And due to theirs which out of thine will grow:
400 So only can high justice rest apaid.<sup>o</sup>
The law of God exact he shall fulfill
Both by obedience and by love, though love
Alone fulfill the law; thy punishment
He shall endure by coming in the flesh
405 To a reproachful life and cursèd death,
Proclaiming life to all who shall believe
In his redemption, and that his obedience
Imputed becomes theirs by faith, his merits
410 To save them, not their own, though legal works.<sup>1</sup>
For this he shall live hated, be blasphemed,
Seized on by force, judged, and to death condemned
A shameful and accursed, nailed to the cross
By his own nation, slain for bringing life;
But to the cross he nails thy enemies,
415 The law that is against thee, and the sins
Of all mankind, with him there crucified,
Never to hurt them more who rightly trust
In this his satisfaction; so he dies,
But soon revives, Death over him no power
420 Shall long usurp; ere the third dawning light
Return, the stars of morn shall see him rise
Out of his grave, fresh as the dawning light,
Thy ransom paid, which man from Death redeems,
His death for man, as many as offered life
425 Neglect not,<sup>2</sup> and the benefit embrace
By faith not void of works: this Godlike act
Annuls thy doom, the death thou shouldst have died,
In sin forever lost from life; this act
Shall bruise the head of Satan, crush his strength
430 Defeating Sin and Death, his two main arms,
And fix far deeper in his head their stings

Than temporal death shall bruise the victor's heel,
Or theirs whom he redeems, a death like sleep,
A gentle wafting to immortal life.
435 Nor after resurrection shall he stay
Longer on earth than certain times to appear
To his disciples, men who in his life
Still followed him; to them shall leave in charge
To teach all nations what of him they learned
440 And his salvation, them who shall believe
Baptizing in the profluent<sup>o</sup> stream, the sign
Of washing them from guilt of sin to life
Pure, and in mind prepared, if so befall,
For death, like that which the Redeemer died.
445 All nations they shall teach; for from that day
Not only to the sons of Abraham's loins
Salvation shall be preached, but to the sons
Of Abraham's faith wherever through the world;
So in his seed all nations shall be blest.<sup>3</sup>
450 Then to the Heav'n of Heav'ns he shall ascend
With victory, triumphing through the air
Over his foes and thine; there shall surprise
The Serpent, prince of air, and drag in chains
Through all his realm, and there confounded leave;
455 Then enter into glory, and resume
His seat at God's right hand, exalted high
Above all names in Heav'n; and thence shall come,
When this world's dissolution shall be ripe
With glory and power to judge both quick<sup>o</sup> and 460 dead,
To judge th' unfaithful dead, but to reward
His faithful, and receive them into bliss,
Whether in Heav'n or earth, for then the earth
Shall all be paradise, far happier place
Than this of Eden, and far happier days."
465 So spake th' Archangel Michaël, then paused,

As at the world's great period;<sup>o</sup> and our sire
Replete with joy and wonder thus replied:
"O goodness infinite, goodness immense!
470 That all this good of evil shall produce,
And evil turn to good; more wonderful
Than that which by creation first brought forth
Light out of darkness! Full of doubt I stand,
Whether I should repent me now of sin
475 By me done and occasioned, or rejoice
Much more, that much more good thereof shall spring,
To God more glory, more good will to men
From God, and over wrath grace shall abound.<sup>4</sup>
But say, if our Deliverer up to Heav'n
Must reascend, what will betide the few
480 His faithful, left among th' unfaithful herd,
The enemies of truth; who then shall guide
His people, who defend? Will they not deal
Worse with his followers than with him they dealt?"
"Be sure they will," said th' angel; "but from 485 Heav'n
He to his own a Comforter will send,<sup>5</sup>
The promise of the Father, who shall dwell
His Spirit within them, and the law of faith
Working through love, upon their hearts shall write,
490 To guide them in all truth, and also arm
With spiritual armor, able to resist
Satan's assaults, and quench his fiery darts,<sup>6</sup>
What<sup>o</sup> man can do against them, not afraid,
Though to the death, against such cruelties
495 With inward consolations recompensed,
And oft supported so as shall amaze
Their proudest persecutors: for the Spirit
Poured first on his apostles, whom he sends
To evangelize the nations, then on all

Baptized, shall them with wondrous gifts endue<sup>o</sup>
500 To speak all tongues, and do all miracles,
As did their Lord before them. Thus they win
Great numbers of each nation to receive
With joy the tidings brought from Heav'n: at length
Their ministry performed, and race well run,
505 Their doctrine and their story written left,<sup>7</sup>
They die; but in their room, as they forewarn,
Wolves shall succeed for teachers, grievous wolves,
Who all the sacred mysteries of Heav'n
To their own vile advantages shall turn
510 Of lucre<sup>o</sup> and ambition, and the truth
With superstitions and traditions taint,<sup>8</sup>
Left only in those written records pure,
Though not but by the Spirit understood.
Then shall they seek to avail themselves of names,<sup>o</sup>
515 Places<sup>o</sup> and titles, and with these to join
Secular power, though feigning still to act
By spiritual, to themselves appropriating
The Spirit of God, promised alike and giv'n
To all believers; and from that pretense,
520 Spiritual laws by carnal<sup>o</sup> power shall force
On every conscience;<sup>9</sup> laws which none shall find Left them enrolled, or what the Spirit within Shall on the heart engrave.<sup>1</sup> What will they then
But force the Spirit of Grace itself, and bind
525 His consort Liberty; what, but unbuild
His living temples,<sup>2</sup> built by faith to stand,
Their own faith not another's: for on earth
Who against faith and conscience can be heard
Infallible?<sup>3</sup> Yet many will presume:
530 Whence heavy persecution shall arise
On all who in the worship persevere
Of Spirit and Truth; the rest, far greater part,
Will deem in outward rites and specious forms

535 Religion satisfied; Truth shall retire
Bestuck with sland'rous darts, and works of faith
Rarely be found: so shall the world go on,
To good malignant, to bad men benign,
Under her own weight groaning, till the day
Appear of respiration<sup>o</sup> to the just,
540 And vengeance to the wicked, at return
Of him so lately promised to thy aid,
The Woman's Seed,<sup>4</sup> obscurely then foretold,
Now amplier known thy Savior and thy Lord,
Last in the clouds from Heav'n to be revealed
545 In glory of the Father, to dissolve
Satan with his perverted world, then raise
From the conflagrant mass,<sup>o</sup> purged and refined,
New heav'ns, new earth, ages of endless date
Founded in righteousness and peace of love,
550 To bring forth fruits joy and eternal bliss."
He ended; and thus Adam last replied:
"How soon hath thy prediction, seer blest,
Measured this transient world, the race of time,
Till time stand fixed: beyond is all abyss,
555 Eternity, whose end no eye can reach.
Greatly instructed I shall hence depart,
Greatly in peace of thought, and have my fill
Of knowledge, what<sup>o</sup> this vessel can contain;
Beyond which was my folly to aspire.
560 Henceforth I learn, that to obey is best,
And love with fear the only God, to walk
As in his presence, ever to observe
His providence, and on him sole depend,
Merciful over all his works, with good
565 Still overcoming evil, and by small
Accomplishing great things, by things deemed weak
Subverting worldly strong, and worldly wise
By simply meek; that suffering for truth's sake

Is fortitude to highest victory,
570 And to the faithful death the gate of life;
Taught this by his example whom I now
Acknowledge my Redeemer ever blest.”
To whom thus also th’ angel last replied:
575 “This having learnt, thou hast attained the sum
Of wisdom; hope no higher, though all the stars
Thou knew’st by name,<sup>5</sup> and all th’ ethereal powers,
All secrets of the deep, all nature’s works,
Or works of God in heav’n, air, earth, or sea,
And all the riches of this world enjoy’dst,
580 And all the rule, one empire; only add
Deeds to thy knowledge answerable,<sup>o</sup> add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance, add love,
By name to come called charity, the soul
Of all the rest: then wilt thou not be loath
585 To leave this Paradise, but shalt possess
A paradise within thee, happier far.
Let us descend now therefore from this top
Of speculation;<sup>o</sup> for the hour precise
Exacts<sup>o</sup> our parting hence; and see the guards,
590 By me encamped on yonder hill, expect
Their motion,<sup>o</sup> at whose front a flaming sword,
In signal of remove, waves fiercely round;
We may no longer stay: go, waken Eve;
Her also I with gentle dreams have calmed
595 Portending good, and all her spirits composed
To meek submission: thou at season fit
Let her with thee partake what thou hast heard,
Chiefly what may concern her faith to know,
The great deliverance by her seed to come
600 (For by the Woman’s Seed) on all mankind.
That ye may live, which will be many days,
Both in one faith unanimous though sad,
With cause for evils past, yet much more cheered

With meditation on the happy end.”
605       He ended, and they both descend the hill;
Descended, Adam to the bow’r where Eve
Lay sleeping ran before, but found her waked;
And thus with words not sad she him received:
610       “Whence thou return’st, and whither went’st, I know;
For God is also in sleep, and dreams advise,<sup>6</sup>
Which he hath sent propitious, some great good
Presaging, since with sorrow and heart’s distress
Wearied I fell asleep: but now lead on;
In me is no delay; with thee to go,
615       Is to stay here; without thee here to stay,
Is to go hence unwilling; thou to me
Art all things under heav’n, all places thou,<sup>7</sup>
Who for my willful crime art banished hence.
This further consolation yet secure
620       I carry hence; though all by me is lost,
Such favor I unworthy am vouchsafed,
By me the promised Seed shall all restore.”
      So spake our mother Eve, and Adam heard
Well pleased, but answered not; for now too nigh
625       Th’ Archangel stood, and from the other hill
To their fixed station, all in bright array
The Cherubim descended; on the ground
Gliding metéorous,<sup>8</sup> as evening mist
Ris’n from a river o’er the marish<sup>9</sup> glides,
630       And gathers ground fast at the laborer’s heel
Homeward returning. High in front advanced,
The brandished sword of God before them blazed
Fierce as a comet; which with torrid heat,
And vapor<sup>10</sup> as the Libyan air adust,<sup>11</sup>
635       Began to parch that temperate clime; whereat
In either hand the hast’ning angel caught
Our ling’ring parents, and to th’ eastern gate

Led them direct, and down the cliff as fast
To the subjected<sup>o</sup> plain; then disappeared.
640 They looking back, all th' eastern side beheld
Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,<sup>o</sup>
Waved over by that flaming brand,<sup>o</sup> the gate
With dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms:
Some natural tears they dropped, but wiped them
645 soon;
The world was all before them, where to choose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide:
They hand in hand with wand'ring steps and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way.

Endnotes

- Note 1: The first five lines were added when Book 10 of the 1667 edition was divided to make Books 11 and 12 of the 1674 edition.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Adam no longer sees visions or pageants, as before, but simply listens to Michael's narration.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Nimrod (Genesis 10:8–10) is described as the first king, in terms that equate kingship itself with tyranny (lines 25–29).Return to reference 3
- Note 4:
Milton offers two explanations of the biblical phrase "Before the Lord": either he openly defied God ("despite") or he claimed divine right ("second sov'reignty") like the Stuart kings. Drawing on the (false) etymology linking the name Nimrod with the Hebrew word meaning "to rebel," Milton implies that the paradox developed in the next two lines (that he accuses others of rebellion but is himself a rebel against God) extends to other kings, especially Charles I, who accused his opponents in the civil war of rebellion.
Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Babylon is the city, Babel the tower.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Genesis 11:1–9 recounts the building of the Tower of Babel reaching to Heaven; God punished this presumption by confounding the builders' original language into multiple languages.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: "Confusion" was taken to be the meaning of "Babel."Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Adam states the assumption Milton often invokes to support republicanism.Return to reference 8
- Note 9:
As Milton (following classical theorists) often did, and as Abdiel did earlier (6.178–81), Michael links political to psychological servitude, and political liberty to inner freedom, that is, the exercise of "right reason" and the control of passion. Loss of liberty is often (though not always) God's just punishment for national decline (lines 81–100). The long passage alludes to the "baseness" of the English in restoring monarchy in 1660.
Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Ham, son of Noah, who looked on the nakedness of his father and brought down the curse that his descendants would be "servant of servants" to their brethren (Genesis 9:22–25).Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
Noah's curse provided scriptural authorization for ancient Hebrew enslavement of the native Canaanites after the conquest of the Promised Land. Some early modern thinkers expanded the scope of the curse beyond the people of Canaan to include Ham and his son Cush, who was thought to be the progenitor of Black Africans, in order to justify the enslavement of Africans. Milton's use of the term "vicious race" allows for a wide range of possible interpretations.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Abraham, whose name means "father of many nations"; the passage is based on Genesis 11:27 to 25.10.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Noah, who lived for 350 years after the Flood.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Michael evidently continues to see the stories he recounts as visionary scenes or pageants; Adam must accept the story of Abraham “by faith,” analogous to the faith Abraham himself displays.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Ur was on one bank of the Euphrates, Haran (line 131) on the other, to the northwest.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Promised Land was bounded on the north by Hamath, a city on the Orontes River in west Syria; on the south by the wilderness “desert” of Zin; on the east by Mount Hermon; and on the west by the Mediterranean, the “great western sea.”Return to reference 7

1707: Act of Union unites Scotland, England, and Wales, creating the nation of "Great Britain"

1714: Queen Anne's death marks the end of Stuart rule and George I becomes the first Hanoverian king

1757: Victory in the Battle of Plassey consolidates British East India Company control in parts of India

1775–83: American Revolution

The period between 1660 and 1785 brought important changes to the island of Great Britain, which became a single nation after 1707, when the Act of Union joined Scotland to England and Wales. Across these years, Britain's national population nearly doubled to ten million and literacy rose to include most of the middle classes and many among the poor. Britain became a central actor in international commerce and the transatlantic trade in enslaved people, and it increasingly extended its imperial power globally. New ideas about science, reason, liberty, rights, politeness, sentiment, and sympathy transformed the intellectual scene.

This same period brought important changes to English literature. In 1660, the playhouses—closed since the beginning of the Civil War in 1642—sprang back to life with witty, bawdy comedies written and acted by women as well as men. An expanding assortment of increasingly affordable printed works—including newspapers and magazines—was available to the reading public, who debated the ideas in coffeehouses and quoted their favorite lines of poetry at pleasure gardens and concert halls. Poets aimed to intervene in social, political, and philosophical discussions, but also experimented with more private or personal ways of expressing intense emotion. Novelistic forms flourished, as prose romances and travel narratives were joined by more domestic and psychologically detailed fictions.

This period, moreover, brought important changes to the very idea of “English literature.” You are reading The Norton Anthology of English Literature—in a real way, eighteenth-century debates about literature and the canon made this anthology possible, even shaping the academic course that likely prompted you to purchase it. When Samuel Johnson defined the word literature in his 1755 Dictionary, he offered the older meaning, “Learning; skill in letters.” Literature in today's sense—creative or imaginative writing—was associated with the larger category of belles lettres, which could also include rhetoric, history, philosophy, and essays. Over the course of this period, however, our modern meanings of literature began to consolidate, as writers were praised for their “originality” and “imagination.” Eighteenth-century writers, moreover, self-consciously forged a canon of English literature. As they created new editions of old works, wrote histories of English poetry, and narrated biographies of influential past writers, these canon-makers patriotically celebrated an English-speaking tradition stretching from Chaucer, Spenser, and Shakespeare to Milton and the best poets writing in their moment.

The eighteenth century also saw the first university courses featuring English literature (as opposed to Greek or Latin literature, staples of elite education). Since much canon-making was a patriotic English project, it is striking that the first universities to teach English literature were not in England but in Scotland, which had formally joined Britain with the Act of Union but had a complicated relation with the dominating center of British power in England. While some Scots embraced Scottish patriotism against the English, others—self-conscious modernizers, anxious about their provincial accents and their physical and cultural distance from metropolitan London—wanted to forge a new “British” identity. These Scots began offering lectures on “Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres” that used English literature to teach a “correct,” “polite” writerly style (free of Scottish words and idioms that were sometimes described as relics of a “primitive” or “barbarous” past). In an ideologically fraught way, English literature was used for a project of “polite” refinement, for educating especially those among the lower classes and in the colonies. At the same time, however, English literature was being written by people across the social spectrum and was also used as a tool for challenging existing power structures—as it was during the early days of the movement to abolish slavery. Literature in English was written not only in England but all over the globe—including in Scotland, Ireland, Wales, India, North America, Jamaica, and Turkey. In all these places, “English literature” allowed for self-assertion, satire, experimentation, and even play—and such play could have its own world-shaping implications.

This Norton volume contains some of the richest, most fascinating literary texts from the Restoration and eighteenth century—written by a more diverse and representative selection of writers than the few White male poets central to the eighteenth century's own canon-making projects. The texts included here are works of art, but they are also often focused on political, moral, and philosophical questions: this is a literature oriented toward and participating in the bustling social world of the period. The canonical literature collected in this anthology thus constitutes a rich site for understanding the changes that helped create our modern world.

RELIGION, POLITICS, AND BRITAIN IN THE WORLD

The Restoration of 1660—the return of Charles Stuart (son of the beheaded King Charles I) and, with him, the monarchy to England—brought hope to a divided nation, exhausted by years of civil war and political turmoil. Many of Charles's subjects welcomed him home from his exile. After the abdication of Richard Cromwell in 1659 and the end of the Commonwealth, the country had seemed at the brink of chaos, and Britons were eager to believe that their king would bring order and law and a spirit of mildness back into the national life. But no political settlement could be stable until the religious issues had been resolved. The restoration of the monarchy meant that the Church of England would also be restored, and though Charles was willing to pardon or ignore many former enemies (such as John Milton), some of the Anglican clergy were less tolerant of dissent. When Parliament reimposed the Book of Common Prayer in 1662 and then in 1664 barred Nonconformists from religious meetings outside the established church, thousands of clergymen resigned their livings, and the jails were filled with preachers like John Bunyan who refused to be silenced. In 1673 the Test Act required all holders of civil and military offices to take the sacrament in an Anglican church and to deny belief in transubstantiation. Thus Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics were largely excluded from public life; for instance, Alexander Pope, a Catholic, could not attend a university, own land, or vote. Some Anglicans showed scorn for Protestant Nonconformist zeal, or “enthusiasm” (a belief in private revelation), and English Catholics were widely regarded as potential traitors and (wrongly) thought to have set the Great Fire that destroyed much of London in 1666.

Yet the triumph of the established church did not resolve the constitutional issues that had divided Charles I and Parliament. Charles II promised to govern through Parliament but slyly tried to consolidate royal power. Steering away from crises, he hid his Catholic sympathies and avoided a test of strength with Parliament—except on one occasion. In 1678 the report of the Popish Plot, in which Catholics would rise and murder their Protestant foes, terrified London; and though the charge turned out to be a fraud, the House of Commons exploited the fear by trying to force Charles to exclude his Catholic brother, James, Duke of York, from succession to the throne. The turmoil of this period is captured brilliantly by John Dryden's poem Absalom and Achitophel (1681). Finally, Charles defeated this attempt to prevent James from becoming king by dissolving Parliament. But the crisis resulted in a basic division of the country between two new political parties: the Tories, who supported the king, and the Whigs, the king's opponents.

Neither party was thrilled with James II. After he came to the throne in 1685, he claimed the right to make his own laws, suspended the Test Act, and began to fill the army and government with fellow Catholics. The birth of James's son in 1688 brought matters to a head, confronting the nation with the prospect of a Catholic dynasty. Secret negotiations paved the way for the Dutchman William of Orange, a champion of Protestantism and the husband of James's Protestant daughter Mary. William landed with a small army in southwestern England and marched toward London. As he advanced, the king's allies melted away, and James fled to a permanent exile in France. But the house of Stuart would be heard from again. For more than half a century some loyal Jacobites (from the Latin Jacobus, "James"), especially in Scotland, supported James, his son ("the Old Pretender"), and his grandson ("the Young Pretender" or "Bonnie Prince Charlie") as the legitimate rulers of Britain. Moreover, a good many writers, from Aphra Behn and Dryden (and arguably Pope and Johnson) to Robert Burns, privately sympathized with Jacobitism. But after the failure of one last rising in 1745–46, the cause would dwindle gradually into a wistful sentiment. In retrospect, the accession of William and Mary in 1688—the Glorious, or Bloodless, Revolution—came to be seen as the beginning of a stabilized, unified Great Britain.

A number of innovations made this stability possible. In 1689 a Bill of Rights revoked James's actions; the bill limited the powers of the Crown, reaffirmed the supremacy of Parliament, and guaranteed some individual rights. The same year the Toleration Act relaxed the strain of religious conflict by granting a limited freedom of worship to Dissenters (although not to Catholics or Jews) so long as they swore allegiance to the Crown. This proved to be a workable compromise. The passage of the Act of Settlement in 1701 seemed finally to resolve the difficult problem of succession that had bedeviled the monarchy. Anne, James II's Protestant younger daughter, was next in line after William. Though Anne was pregnant seventeen times, including many stillbirths, her last surviving child died young in 1700, leaving her without a successor. In the wake of this, the Act of Settlement put Anne's nearest Protestant relative—Sophia, the electress of Hanover in Germany, who was James I's granddaughter—and her descendants in line for the throne. Queen Anne reigned from 1702 to 1714, and upon her death George I, Sophia's son, came to Britain to become the first king of the Hanoverian line that would rule until 1901.

But the succession being settled did not eliminate the political rancor that often animates contests for power. During the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–14) in Queen Anne's reign, Britain and its allies weakened the power of commercial rivals France and Spain, and the Whig lords and London merchants supporting the war grew rich and held enormous power in the government. But the Whigs pushed their luck too hard: powerful Whig leader John Churchill, the Duke of Marlborough, with his wife made requests that angered the Queen, and others were working to defend Dissenters and their practice of occasional conformity (which offered a way around the Test Act). Anne fought back, dismissing her Whig ministers and calling in Robert Harley and Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke, to form a Tory ministry. When Whigs returned to power after Anne's death and the accession of George I, Harley was imprisoned in the Tower of London for several years and Bolingbroke, charged with being a Jacobite traitor, fled to France. The great architect of Whig policy in the following decades was Sir Robert Walpole, who came to power as a result of the "South Sea Bubble" (1720), a stock market crash. Walpole had an ability to restore confidence and keep the country running smoothly, as well as to juggle money. Coming to be known as Britain's first "prime" minister, Walpole consolidated his power during the reign of George II (1727–60). George II, more involved in British affairs than his essentially German father, came to appreciate the efficient administration of the patronage system under Walpole, who installed dependents in government offices and controlled the House of Commons by financially rewarding its members.

The political principles of the Whig and Tory parties, which bring so much fire to eighteenth-century public debate, evolved through the period to address changing circumstances. Now we tend to think of Tories as conservative and Whigs as liberal. (Members of today's Conservative Party in the United Kingdom are sometimes called Tories.) During the Exclusion Crisis of the 1680s the Whigs asserted the liberties of the English subject against the royal prerogatives of Charles II, whom Tories such as Dryden supported. After both parties survived the 1688 Glorious Revolution, the Tories guarded the preeminence of the established church, while Whigs tended to support toleration of Dissenters. Economically, too, Tories defined themselves as traditionalists, affirming landownership as the proper basis of wealth, power, and privilege (though most thought trade honorable), whereas the Whigs came to be seen as supporting a new "moneyed interest" (as Jonathan Swift called it): managers of the Bank of England (founded 1694), contrivers of the system of public credit, and investors in the stock market. But conservatism and liberalism did not exist as ideological labels in the period, and the vicissitudes of party dispute offer many surprises. When Bolingbroke returned to England in 1724 after being pardoned, he led a Tory opposition that decried the "ministerial tyranny" of Walpole's Whig government. This opposition patriotically hailed liberty in a manner recalling the Whig rhetoric of earlier decades, appealed to both landed gentry and urban merchants, and anticipated the antigovernment radicalism of the end of the eighteenth century. Many writers embraced Bolingbroke's Tory rhetoric extolling fierce independence from the corrupting power of centralized government and concentrations of wealth: for instance, John Gay's The Beggar's Opera (1728) drew parallels between great criminals and great politicians. Conversely, the Whigs sought to secure a centralized fiscal and military state machine and a web of financial interdependence controlled by the wealthiest aristocrats.

As this machine was built and maintained through the century, Britain's place in the world changed dramatically. In the early 1660s, when the events described in Behn's Oroonoko are supposed to have taken place, England was just beginning to ramp up its involvement in the transatlantic trade in enslaved people. Charles helped found the Company of Royal Adventurers Trading into Africa in 1660, which was later reconstituted as the Royal African Company. English, then British, ships forcibly took people from the west coast of Africa, across the Atlantic to the Americas, often to the brutally productive colonies in the Caribbean that farmed sugar cane. The ships then returned to England with money and sugar, a profitable colonial commodity. Britain's involvement in slaving would increase dramatically across the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, and by the time of abolition in the early nineteenth century, British enslavers would have taken over three million African people from their homes. This terrible trade was immensely lucrative for Britain. Bristol and then Liverpool developed into prosperous ports, and by the 1780s the British national economy depended on the trade. The human cost was terrible. Torn from their homes, enslaved people were often packed into ships in spaces too small to allow them to turn, with barely enough food and drink and air to keep them alive. It is estimated that 15 percent, on average, died on each crossing; on a bad voyage the death toll would be much worse. Nor did those who survived the Middle Passage, as it came to be called, feel fortunate for long, given the terrible conditions of labor in Britain's Caribbean sugar colonies. It was only at the end of the period this volume covers, in the 1780s, that the movement for the abolition of slavery began to exert popular influence in Britain, though these years were also marked by parliamentary setbacks. While abolition would not be achieved until the nineteenth century, in the meantime many writers took up their pens to write arguments and poems, both for and against slavery. (See “Britain and Transatlantic Slavery,” p. 926.)

Slavery was a crucial part of the British Empire, which also expanded dramatically in this period. In 1660, England had control over Ireland and Wales in the British Isles and had established colonies in North America and the Caribbean. It also had trade relations across the globe. In the following decades, commerce motivated more and more territorial claims. Indeed, increasingly across the period Britain deployed its powerful navy to secure a series of military victories that consolidated and extended its colonial power. For instance, William Pitt the elder, a powerful prime minister after Walpole, appealed to a spirit of patriotism and called for the expansion of British power and commerce overseas. Pitt helped orchestrate the defeat of the French in the Seven Years’ War (1756–63), especially in North America, and the 1763 Peace of Paris consolidated British rule in Canada and India. British power worked very differently in these different places, however, and it was never without controversy. Eventually, American colonists revolted against what they described as the tyranny of King George III (who reigned in Britain from 1760 to 1820). Not even the loss of the American colonies in the American Revolution (1775–83), though, could slow British imperial ambitions. Asia, Africa, and the Pacific increasingly became central sites for British imperial—and commercial—ambition. Britain in the eighteenth century was no isolated island but a nation with conflicts, investments, and subjects around the world. (See “Global Commerce and Empire,” p. 323.)

At home, however, there was discontent. Though London—a bustling multiracial city (in 1768, at least 15,000 Black people lived there)—was becoming a center of global commerce, the wealth brought to England by industrialism and foreign trade had not spread to the great mass of the poor. Only White male property owners could vote in parliamentary elections, and, for much of the century, rich families' alliances and rivalries, national and local, dominated politics. But the practice of enclosure—private landowners “enclosing” with fences what had been common areas supporting a larger community—had displaced many to the cities, and the urban poor were increasingly subject to intense criminalization: even some minor crimes like pickpocketing were punishable with the death penalty. Other common punishments included the pillory and forced transportation to the colonies. As the century progressed, it seemed to many that the bonds of custom that once held people together had finally broken, and now money alone was respected. Protestants turned violently against Catholics; in 1780 the Gordon Riots put London temporarily under mob rule. Around the same time, radical reformers such as John Wilkes, Richard Price, and Catharine Macaulay called for a new, more just and equitable political republic. Fear of their radicalism would contribute to the conservative British reaction against the French Revolution. In the last decades of the century British authors would be torn between two opposing attitudes: loyalty to the old traditions of hierarchy, mutual obligations, and local self-sufficiency, and yearning for a new dispensation founded on principles of liberty, the rule of reason, and human rights.

THE CONTEXT OF IDEAS

Much of the most powerful writing after 1660 exposed divisions in the nation's thinking inherited from the tumult of earlier decades. As the possibility of a Christian commonwealth receded, the great republican John Milton published Paradise Lost (final version, 1674), and John Bunyan's immensely popular masterwork The Pilgrim's Progress (1678) expressed the conscience of a Nonconformist. Conversely, an aristocratic culture, led by Charles II himself, aggressively celebrated pleasure and the right of the elite to behave as they wished. Members of the court scandalized respectable London citizens and considered their wives and daughters fair game. The court's hero, John Wilmot, second Earl of Rochester, became a celebrity for enacting the sexually exuberant creed of a libertine and rake.

In the Restoration, too, Charles II gave official approval to science by chartering the Royal Society of London for the Improving of Natural Knowledge in 1662. New features of the world were disclosed to everyone who had the chance to look. Two wonderful inventions, the microscope and telescope, had begun to reveal that nature is more extravagant—teeming with tiny creatures and boundless galaxies—than anyone had ever imagined. One book that stayed popular for more than a century, Bernard de Fontenelle's Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds (1686; translated from French by Behn), suggested that an infinite number of alternate worlds and living creatures might exist, not only in outer space but under our feet, invisibly small. Travels to unfamiliar regions of the globe enlarged understandings of what nature could do, and appetites for wondrous facts and curious objects kept pace with the economic motives of world exploration and colonization. (See "Science, Society, and God," p. 93.)

Excited by new developments in science and philosophy, some people began to argue that the achievements of modern inquiry had eclipsed those of the ancients (and the fathers of the Church), who had not known about the solar system, the Americas, microscopic organisms, or the circulation of the blood. Yet, the school curriculum still began with years of Latin and Greek and focused on the long-established humanistic tradition. A “Battle of the Books” erupted in the late seventeenth century between champions of ancient and of modern learning—in Jonathan Swift’s satire of that title, tomes of Aristotle battled Cartesian philosophy, and editions of modern poets looked insignificant next to Virgil’s volumes. But as stark as the contrasts were during the Restoration between ancients and moderns, religious and libertine intellectuals, royalists and republicans, High Churchmen and Nonconformists, the court and the rest of the country, a spirit of compromise was brewing.

Perhaps the most widely shared intellectual impulse of the age was a distrust of dogmatism. Nearly everybody blamed it for the civil strife through which the nation had recently passed. Opinions varied widely about which dogma was most dangerous—Puritan enthusiasm, papal infallibility, the divine right of kings, medieval scholastic or modern Cartesian philosophy—but these were denounced in remarkably similar terms. Though this might seem surprising in an age often described today as the “Enlightenment,” writers from across the political and social spectrum portrayed overconfidence in human reasoning as the supreme disaster. Many philosophers, divines, and advocates of science began to embrace a mitigated skepticism, which argued that human beings could readily achieve a sufficient degree of necessary knowledge (sometimes called “moral certainty”), but also contended that the pursuit of absolute certainty was vain, mad, and socially calamitous. Perhaps John Locke best expresses the temper of the times in An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690):

If by this inquiry into the nature of the understanding, I can discover the powers thereof; how far they reach; to what things they are in any degree proportionate; and where they fail us, I suppose it may be of use, to prevail with the busy mind of man to be more cautious in meddling with things exceeding its comprehension; to stop when it is at the utmost extent of its tether; and to sit down in a quiet ignorance of those things which, upon examination, are found to be beyond the reach of our capacities. . . . Our business here is not to know all things, but those which concern our conduct.

Such a position is Pope's, when he warns against human presumption in An Essay on Man and Johnson's, when he talks of "the business of living."

Clearly, these ideas had important implications for religion. They led to some Anglican clergy's dislike of emotion and "enthusiasm" in religion and their emphasis on good works, rather than faith, as the way to salvation. If, as the commentator Martin Clifford put it in A Treatise of Humane Reason (1675), "in this vast latitude of probabilities," a person thinks "there is none can lead one to salvation, but the path wherein he treads himself, we may see the evident and necessary consequence of eternal troubles and confusions." Such writers insist that a distrust of human capacities is fully compatible with religious faith: for them the inability of reason and sensory evidence to settle important questions reveals our need to accept Christian mysteries as our intellectual foundation. At the same time, scientific discovery also opened up the possibility of "natural religion" (the study of nature as a book written by God). Newly discovered natural laws, such as Newton's celestial mechanics, seemed evidence of a universal order in creation, which implied God's hand in the design of the universe, as a watch implies a watchmaker. Some intellectuals embraced Deism, the doctrine that religion need not depend on mystery or biblical truths and could rely on reason alone, which recognized the goodness and wisdom of natural law and its creator. However, other Christians shuddered at the idea of an impersonal clockwork universe without God's active participation. Instead, they rested their faith on the revelation of Scripture, the scheme of salvation in which Christ died to redeem their sins.

Religious ideas about souls and minds in the period could also bolster powerful arguments by women and the disenfranchised. The groundbreaking intellectual Mary Astell, in A Serious Proposal to the Ladies (1694) and Some Reflections upon Marriage (1700, 1706), initiated a strain of modern feminism, arguing for the establishment of women's educational institutions and decrying the tyranny that husbands legally exercised over their wives. She nonetheless mocked the calls for political rights and liberty by Locke and other Whig theorists, rights that pointedly did not extend to women. Instead, she and other early feminists, including Sarah Fyge Egerton and Mary, Lady Chudleigh, embraced the Tory principle of obedience to royal and church authority. Astell feared the doctrines of male revolutionaries could produce civil chaos and so jeopardize the best that women could hope for in her day: the freedom to become fully educated, practice their religion, and marry (or not) according to their own judgment. Richard Steele's periodical the Tatler satirized Astell as "Madonella" because she seemed to recommend women to a nunlike, "recluse life." But at the same time thinkers, both male and female, began to advocate improving women's education as part of a wider commitment to enhancing and extending sociability. Periodicals like the Tatler, the Spectator, and Eliza Haywood's Female Spectator sought to teach as large a readership as possible to think and behave politely. All the while, women had to navigate a world structured by both what Egerton called "tyrant Custom" and these new ideas, by marriage laws that took away their agency but also by a certain freedom of movement enabled by a commercialized urban society: some women experimented with gender identities, and many cultivated intense friendships with other women. (See "Women, Gender, Power," p. 743.)

Understandings of individuality—and human fellowship—were made all the more pressing as encounters with hitherto little-known societies in Asia, Africa, and the Americas enlarged Europeans' understanding of human norms as well. In Gulliver's Travels, Swift shows the comical, painful ways in which the discovery of new cultures forces one average Briton to reexamine his own. Across the period's literature, writers imagined themselves into personas from far-away places as they critiqued British behavior at home and abroad. Human difference also became a pressing philosophical problem. Scottish Enlightenment thinkers like Adam Smith worked to develop an understanding of the stages of civilization: according to these writers, all cultures move from more “primitive” stages involving hunting and pasturage toward agriculture and eventually the kind of cultural and technological refinement eighteenth-century writers imagined their own commercial societies to possess. British thinkers thus treated geographical differences as temporal ones: people elsewhere were imagined as stuck in an earlier, less developed or more primitive stage of civilization. These ideas were debated alongside various climate theories and biological understandings of race, as British thinkers tried to understand how to make sense of human differences. At the same time, British readers were fascinated by these differences and eager to read travelogues and translations that gave them a glimpse into the minds of people from other cultures. (See “Global Commerce and Empire,” p. 323.)

Britons also pursued their fascination with the material world. Scientific discoveries increasingly found practical applications in industry, the arts, and even entertainment. By the late 1740s, as knowledge of electricity advanced, public experiments offered fashionable British crowds the opportunity to shock themselves. Birmingham became famous as a center where science and manufacturing were combining to change the world: in the early 1760s Matthew Boulton (1728–1809) established the most impressive factory of the age just outside town, producing vast quantities of pins, buckles, and buttons; in subsequent decades, his applications and manufacture of the new steam engine invented by Scotsman James Watt (1736–1819) helped build an industry to drive all others. Practical chemistry also led to industrial improvements: domestic porcelain production became established in the 1750s; and from the 1760s Josiah Wedgwood (1730–1795) developed glazing, manufacturing, and marketing techniques that enabled British ceramics to compete with China for fashionable taste. Wedgwood and others answered an ever-increasing demand in Britain for beautiful objects. Artist William Hogarth satirized this appetite for finery: a chaotic collection of china figurines crowds the mantel in Plate 2 of Marriage A-la-Mode (1743–45). Yet the images that made Hogarth famous would soon decorate English ceramic teapots and plates and be turned into porcelain figurines themselves.

An obsession with getting and spending coexisted in this moment with a fascination with feeling. Midcentury, the popularity of the “sentimental” located the bases of social conduct in instinctual feeling rather than divinely sanctioned moral codes. Religion itself, according to Laurence Sterne, might be a “Great Sensorium,” a sort of central nervous system that connects the feelings of all living creatures in one great benevolent soul. And people began to feel pleasure in the exercise of charity. The cult of sensibility fostered a philanthropy that led to social reforms seldom envisioned in earlier times—to the improvement of jails, the relief of imprisoned debtors, the establishment of foundling hospitals and of homes for penitent sex workers, and ultimately the abolition of the slave trade. It loosed a ready flow of sympathetic responses to the joys and sorrows of fellow human beings, but also an intense, sometimes limiting fixation on the feeling self. (See “Sentiment,” p. 997.)

New forms of religious devotion sprang up. The evangelical revival known as Methodism began in the 1730s, led by three Oxford graduates: John Wesley, his brother Charles, and George Whitefield. The Methodists took their gospel to the common people, warning that all were sinners and damned unless they accepted “amazing grace,” salvation through faith. Often denied the privilege of preaching in village churches, evangelicals preached to thousands in barns or the open fields. The emotionalism of such revival meetings repelled the Anglican Church and the upper classes, who feared that the fury and zeal of the Puritan sects were returning. Methodism was sometimes related to madness; convinced that he was damned forever, the poet William Cowper broke down and became a recluse. But the religious awakening persisted and affected many clergymen and laymen within the establishment, who reanimated the church and promoted unworldliness and piety. Nor did the insistence of Methodists on faith over works as the way to salvation prevent them or their Anglican allies from fighting for social reforms like abolition.

Sentimentalism, Evangelicalism, and the pursuits of wealth and luxury in different ways all placed a new importance on individuals—the gratification of their tastes and ambitions or their yearning for personal encounters with each other or a personal God. Diary-keeping, elaborate letter-writing, and the novel also testified to the growing importance of the private, individual life. Few histories of kings or nations could rival Samuel Richardson’s novel Clarissa (1747–48) in length, popularity, or documentary detail: it was subtitled “The History of a Young Lady.” The older hierarchical system had tended to subordinate individuals to their social rank or station. In the eighteenth century that fixed system began to break down, and people’s sense of themselves began to change. By the end of the century many issues of politics and the law revolved around rights, not traditions. The modern individual had been invented; no product of the age is more enduring.

CONDITIONS OF LITERARY PRODUCTION

Publishing boomed in eighteenth-century Britain, as the number of titles appearing annually and the periodicals printed in London and provincial towns dramatically increased. This expansion in part resulted from a loosening of legal restraints on printing. Through much of the previous three centuries, the government had licensed the texts deemed suitable for publication and refused to license those it wanted suppressed (a practice called “prior restraint”). After the Restoration, the Printing Act (1662) tightened licensing controls, though unlike his Stuart predecessors Charles II now shared this power with Parliament. But in 1695, during the reign of William III, the last in a series of printing acts was not renewed. Debate in Parliament on the matter was more practical than idealistic: it was argued that licensing hampered the printing trades and was ineffective at preventing obnoxious publications anyway, which could be better constrained after publication by enforcing laws against seditious libel, obscenity, and treason. As the two-party system consolidated, both Whigs and Tories seemed to realize that prepublication censorship could bite them when their own side happened to be out of power. Various governments attempted to revive licensing during political crises throughout the eighteenth century, but it was gone for good.

This did not end the legal liabilities, and the prosecutions, of authors. Daniel Defoe, for instance, was convicted of seditious libel and faced the pillory and jail for his satirical pamphlet “The Shortest Way with the Dissenters” (1702), which imitated High Church zeal so extravagantly that it provoked both the Tories and the Dissenters he had set about to defend. And licensing of the stage returned: irritated especially by Henry Fielding’s antigovernment play The Historical Register for the Year 1736, Robert Walpole pushed the Stage Licensing Act through Parliament in 1737, which authorized the Lord Chamberlain to license all plays and reduced the number of London theaters to two (Drury Lane and Covent Garden), closing Fielding's New Theatre in the Haymarket and driving him to become a novelist. But despite such constraints, philosopher David Hume could begin his essay "Of the Liberty of the Press" (1741) by citing "the extreme liberty we enjoy in this country of communicating whatever we please to the public" as an internationally recognized commonplace. This freedom allowed eighteenth-century Britain to build an exemplary version of what historians have called "the public sphere": a cultural arena, free of direct government control, consisting of not just published comment on matters of national interest but also the public venues—coffeehouses, clubs, taverns—where readers circulated, discussed, and conceived responses to it. The first regular daily London newspaper, the Daily Courant, appeared in 1702; in 1731, the first magazine, the Gentleman's Magazine. The latter was followed both by imitations and by successful literary journals like the Monthly Review (1749) and the Critical Review (1756). Each audience attracted some periodical tailored to it, as with the Female Tatler (1709) and Haywood's the Female Spectator (1744–46).

After 1695, the legal status of printed matter became ambiguous, and in 1710 Parliament enacted the Statute of Anne—"An Act for the Encouragement of Learning by Vesting the Copies of Printed Books in the Authors or Purchasers of Such Copies"—the first copyright law in British history not tied to government approval of works' contents. Typically, these copyrights were held by booksellers, who operated much as publishers do today (in the eighteenth century, publisher referred to one who distributed books). A bookseller paid an author for a work's copyright and, after registering the work with the Stationers' Company for a fee, had the exclusive right for fourteen years to publish it; if alive when this term expired, he owned it another fourteen years. Payments to authors for copyright varied. Pope got £15 for the 1714 version of The Rape of the Lock, while Samuel Johnson's Rasselas earned him £100. The Statute of Anne spurred the book trade by enhancing booksellers' control over works and hence their chance to profit by them. But the government soon introduced a new constraint. In 1712, the first Stamp Act put a tax on all newspapers, advertisements, paper, and pamphlets (effectively any work under a hundred pages or so): all printed matter had to carry the stamp indicating the taxes had been paid. Stamp Acts were in effect throughout the century, and duties tended to increase when the government needed to raise money and rein in the press, as during the Seven Years' War in 1757.

But such constraints were not enough to hold back the publishing market, which began to sustain the first true professional class of authors in British literary history. The lower echelon of the profession was called "Grub Street," which was, as Johnson's Dictionary explains, "originally the name of a street in Moorfields in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems." The market increasingly motivated the literary elite too, and Johnson himself came to remark that "no man but a blockhead ever wrote, except for money." As a young writer, he sold articles to the Gentleman's Magazine, and many other men and women struggled to survive doing piecework for periodicals. The enhanced opportunity to sell their works on the open market meant that fewer authors needed to look to aristocratic patrons for support. But a new practice, publication by subscription, blended elements of patronage and literary capitalism and created the century's most spectacular authorial fortunes. Wealthy readers could subscribe to a work in progress, usually by agreeing to pay the author half in advance and half upon receipt of the book. Subscribers were rewarded with an edition more sumptuous than the common run and the appearance of their names in a list in the book's front pages. Major works by famous authors, such as Dryden's translation of Virgil (1697), generated the most subscription sales; the grandest success was Pope's translation of Homer's Iliad (1715–20), which gained him about £5000; his Odyssey (1725–26) raised nearly that much. But smaller projects deemed to need special encouragement also sold by subscription, including many books of poetry by women, such as Mary Leapor's poems (1751).

Not all entered the literary market with equal advantages; and social class played a role in preparing authors for success. The better educated were better placed to be taken seriously: many eminent male writers, including Dryden, Locke, Addison, Swift, Hume,

Johnson, Burke—the list could go on and on—had at least some university education, either at Oxford or Cambridge or at Scottish or Irish universities, where attendance by members of the laboring classes was virtually nil. Also universities were officially closed to non-Anglican men. Some important writers attended the Dissenting academies that sprang up to fulfill Nonconformists' educational aspirations: Defoe went to an excellent one at Newington Green. A few celebrated authors such as Rochester and Fielding had aristocratic backgrounds, but many came from the "middle class," though those in this category show how heterogeneous it was. Pope, a Catholic, obtained his education privately, and his father was a linen wholesaler, but he eventually became intimate with earls and viscounts, whereas Richardson, who had a family background in trade and (as he said) "only common school-learning," was a successful printer before he became a novelist. Both were middle-class in a sense and made their own fortunes in eighteenth-century print culture, yet they inhabited vastly different social worlds.

Despite the general exclusion of the poor from education and other means of social advancement, some self-educated writers of the laboring classes fought their way into print. A few became celebrities, aided by the increasing popularity of the idea, famously expressed by Thomas Gray in his "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," that there must be unknown geniuses among the poor. Stephen Duck, an agricultural worker from Wiltshire, published his popular Poems on Several Subjects in 1730, which included "The Thresher's Labor"—he became known as the "Thresher Poet." Queen Caroline herself retained him to be keeper of her library in Richmond. Several authors of the "common sort" followed in Duck's wake, including Mary Collier, whose poem "The Woman's Labor: An Epistle to Mr. Duck" (1739) defended country women against charges of idleness. Apart from such visible successes, eighteenth-century print culture afforded work for many from lower socioeconomic levels, if not as authors, then as hawkers of newspapers on city streets and singers of political ballads (often illiterate women), bookbinders, papermakers, and printing-press workers. The vigor of the literary market demanded the labor of all classes.

As all women were barred from universities and faced innumerable other disadvantages and varieties of repression, the story of virtually every woman author in the period is one of self-education, courage, and extraordinary initiative. Yet women did publish widely for the first time in the period, and the examples that can be assembled are as diverse as they are impressive. During the Restoration and early eighteenth century, a few aristocratic women poets were hailed as marvelous exceptions: the poems of Katherine Philips, "the matchless Orinda," were published posthumously in 1667; and others, including Anne Finch, Anne Killigrew, and later Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, printed poems or circulated them in manuscript among fashionable circles. A more public sort of female authorship was more ambivalently received. Though Aphra Behn built a successful career in the theater and in print, her sexually frank works were sometimes denounced as unbecoming a woman. Many women writers of popular literature after her in the early eighteenth century assumed "scandalous" public roles. Delarivier Manley published transparent fictionalizations of the doings of the Whig nobility, including The New Atalantis (1709), while Eliza Haywood produced stories about seduction and sex (though her late works, including The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless, 1751, courted a rising taste for morality). Defenders of high culture found it easy to denounce these women and their works as affronts to sexual decency and good literary taste: Pope's Dunciad (1728) awards Haywood as the prize in a pissing contest between scurrilous male booksellers. But still these women found enormous success—Haywood's salacious Love in Excess was as popular as Defoe's Robinson Crusoe.

Many women writers after midcentury were determined to be perceived as more moral than their predecessors. Around 1750, intellectual women established clubs of their own under the leadership of Elizabeth Vesey and Elizabeth Montagu, cousin to Lady Mary. Proclaiming a high religious and intellectual standard, these women came to be called "bluestockings" (after the inelegant worsted hose of an early member). The literary accomplishments of bluestockings ranged widely: in 1758 Elizabeth Carter published her translation of the Greek philosopher Epictetus, while Hannah More won fame as a poet, abolitionist, and educational theorist. Some of the most considerable literary achievements of women after midcentury came in the novel, a form increasingly associated with women readers (though men read them too), often exploring the moral difficulties of young women approaching marriage. The satirical novel The Female Quixote (1752) by Charlotte Lennox describes one such heroine deluded by the extravagant romances she reads, while Frances Burney's Evelina (1778) unfolds the sexual and other dangers besetting its naive but good-hearted heroine.

Readers' abilities and inclinations to consume literature helped determine the volume and variety of published works. While historians disagree about exactly how the literacy rate changed in Britain through the early modern period, there is widespread consensus that by 1800 between 60 and 70 percent of adult men could read, in contrast to 25 percent in 1600. Because historians use the ability to sign one's name as an indicator of literacy, the evidence is even sketchier for women, who were less often parties to legal contracts: perhaps a third of women could read by the mid-eighteenth century. Reading was commoner among the relatively well-off than among the very poor, and among the latter, more prevalent in urban centers than the countryside. Cultural commentators throughout the century portrayed literacy as a good in itself: everyone in a Protestant country such as Britain, many thought, would benefit from direct access to the Bible and devotional works, and increasingly employers found literacy among servants and other laborers useful, especially those working in cities. Moral commentators did their best to steer inexperienced readers away from the frivolous and idle realm of popular imaginative literature, though literacy could not but give its new possessors freedom to explore their own tastes and inclinations.

Cost placed another limit on readership: few of the laboring classes would have disposable income to buy a cheap edition of Milton (around two shillings at midcentury) or even a copy of the Gentleman's Magazine (sixpence), let alone the spare time or sense of entitlement to peruse such things. Nonetheless, reading material was widely shared (Addison optimistically calculated "twenty readers to every paper" of the Spectator), and occasionally servants were given access to the libraries of their employers or the rich family of the neighborhood. In the 1740s, circulating libraries began to emerge in cities and towns throughout Britain. Though the yearly fee they usually charged put them beyond the reach of the poor, these libraries gave the middle classes access to a wider array of books than they could afford to assemble on their own. Records of such libraries indicate that travels, histories, letters, and novels were most popular, though patrons borrowed many specialized, technical works as well. One fascinating index of change in the character of the reading public was the very look of words on the page. In the past, printers had rather capriciously capitalized many nouns—words as common as Wood or Happiness—and frequently italicized various words for emphasis. But around the middle of the eighteenth century, new conventions arose: initial capitals were increasingly reserved for proper names, and the use of italics was reduced. The modern, eighteenth-century reader had come to expect that all English writing, no matter how old or new, on any topic, in any genre, would be printed in the same consistent, uncluttered style. This is an innovation of the eighteenth-century culture of reading that immediately demonstrates its linkage to our own.

POETIC PRINCIPLES

Eighteenth-century poetry is often described as “neoclassical,” sometimes “Augustan”—after classical writers like Virgil and Ovid who flourished during the reign of the first Roman emperor, Augustus Caesar (63 B.C.E.–14 C.E.). But calling eighteenth-century poems “Augustan” seems to accept as fact the highly strategic and self-conscious way that some period poets embraced a political analogy between post–Civil War England and Augustan Rome, hoping that Charles II would be a better Augustus or that the British Empire would flourish like the Roman one. The relation between classical models and the modern world was never taken for granted: it was precisely the thing many poets wanted to explore, often quite playfully. Indeed, “neoclassical” English literature aimed to be not only classical but new. Rochester and Dryden infused fresh life into Greek, Latin, and French models by drawing on the English literary traditions of variety, humor, and freewheeling fancy represented by Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Jonson, and Milton. Pope, John Gay, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu wrote in forms like the mock-epic and mock-pastoral, where satire was pointed both at the values encoded in the classical form and at a contemporary world that did not share those values. Enslaved poet Phillis Wheatley self-consciously placed herself in a long learned tradition that stretched back to Virgil, but also to the Roman playwright Terence, from North Africa.

Poets also aimed to give pleasure to readers—to express passions that everyone could recognize in language that everyone could understand. Dryden, for instance, values poetry according to its power to move an audience. Thus Timotheus, in Dryden’s “Alexander’s Feast,” is not only a musician but an archetypal poet who can make Alexander tearful or loving or angry at will. Readers, in turn, were supposed to cooperate with authors through the exercise of their own imaginations, creating pictures in the mind. A phrase from Horace’s Art of Poetry, ut pictura poesis (“as in painting, so in poetry”), was interpreted to mean that poetry ought to be a visual as well as verbal art. Pope’s “Eloisa to Abelard,” for instance, begins by picturing two rival female personifications: “heavenly-pensive Contemplation” and “ever-musing Melancholy” (in the older typographical style, the nouns were capitalized to indicate the personification). Readers were expected to see these figures: Contemplation, in the habit of a nun, whose eyes roll upward toward heaven; and the goddess Melancholy, in wings and drapery, who broods upon the darkness. These two competing visions fight for Eloisa’s soul throughout the poem, which we see entirely through her perspective. Eighteenth-century poetry asks readers to translate even abstract words into moving images in the mind’s eye.

What many poets tried to see and represent was Nature—a word of many meanings. For eighteenth-century poets, these meanings included Nature as the universal and permanent elements in human experience. External nature, the landscape, also attracted attention throughout the eighteenth century as a source of pleasure and an object of inquiry. But as Anne Finch muses on the landscape, in “A Nocturnal Reverie,” it is her own soul she discovers. Pope’s injunction to the critic, “First follow Nature,” has primarily human nature in view. Nature consists of the enduring, general truths that have been, are, and will be true for everyone in all times, everywhere. Hence the business of the poet, according to Johnson’s Rasselas, is “to examine, not the individual, but the species; to remark general properties and large appearances . . . to exhibit in his portraits of nature such prominent and striking features as recall the original to every mind.” Yet if human nature was held to be uniform, human beings were known to be infinitely varied. Pope praises Shakespeare’s characters as “Nature herself,” but continues that “every single character in Shakespeare is as much an individual as those in life itself; it is . . . impossible to find any two alike.” This indicates a characteristic eighteenth-century state of mind in which life assumes the form of a perpetual allegory and some abiding truth shines through each circumstance as it passes. The particular is already the general, in much eighteenth-century literature.

To study Nature was also to study the ancients. Nature and Homer, according to Pope, were the same; and both Pope and his readers applied Horace's satires on Rome to their own world, because Horace had expressed the perennial forms of life. Moreover, modern writers could learn from the ancients how to practice their craft. If a poem is an object to be made, the poet (a word derived from the Greek for "maker") must make the object to proper specifications. Thus poets were taught to plan their works in one of the classical "kinds" or genres—epic, tragedy, comedy, pastoral, satire, or ode—to choose a language appropriate to that genre, and to select the right style and tone and rhetorical figures. The rules of art, as Pope said, "are Nature methodized." At the same time, however, writers needed wit: quickness of mind, inventiveness, a knack for conceiving images and metaphors and for perceiving resemblances between things apparently unlike. Shakespeare had surpassed the ancients themselves in wit, and no one could deny that Pope was witty. Hence a major project of the age was to combine good method with wit, or judgment with fancy. Nature intended them to be one, and the role of judgment was not to suppress passion, energy, and originality but to make them more effective through discipline: "The winged courser, like a generous horse, / Shows most true mettle when you check his course."

The test of a poet's true mettle, or spirit, is language. William Wordsworth, in the preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800), declared that he wrote "in a selection of the language really used by men," and he went on to attack eighteenth-century poets for their use of an artificial and stock "poetic diction." Many poets did employ a special language. It is characterized by personification, representing a thing or abstraction in human form, as when an "Ace of Hearts steps forth" or "Melancholy frowns"; by periphrasis (a roundabout way of avoiding homely words: "finny tribes" for fish, or "household feathery people" for chickens); by stock phrases such as "shining sword," "verdant mead," "bounding main," and "checkered shade"; by words used in their original Latin sense, such as "genial" and "horrid"; and by English sentences forced into Latin syntax ("Here rests his head upon the lap of Earth / A youth to Fortune and to Fame unknown," where youth is the subject of the verb rests). This language originated in the attempt of early modern poets to rival the elegant diction of Roman writers, and Milton depended on it to help him match his lofty theme in Paradise Lost. When used mechanically it could become a mannerism. But Thomas Gray contrives subtle, expressive effects from this diction and syntax, as in the ironic inflation of "Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat" or a famous stanza from "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard":

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Awaits alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

It is easy to misread the first sentence. What is the subject of awaits? The answer must be hour (the only available singular noun), which lurks at the end of the sentence, ready to spring a trap not only on the reader but on all those aristocratic, powerful, beautiful, wealthy people who forget that their hour will come. Moreover, the intricacy of that sentence sets off the simplicity of the next, which says the same thing with deadly directness. The artful mix in the "Elegy" of a special poetic language—a language that nobody speaks but that calls attention to the lush resources of language itself—with sentiments that everybody feels helps account for the poem's enduring popularity.

Versification also tests a poet's skill. The heroic couplet was brought to such perfection by Pope, Johnson thought, that "to attempt any further improvement of versification will be dangerous." Pope's couplets, in rhymed iambic pentameter, typically present a complete statement, closed by a punctuation mark. Within the binary system of these two lines, a world of distinctions can be compressed. The second line of the couplet might closely parallel the first in structure and meaning, for instance, or the two lines might antithetically play against each other. Similarly, because a slight pause called a “caesura” often divides the typical pentameter line (“Know then thyself, presume not God to scan”), one part of the line can be made parallel with or antithetical to the other, or even to one part of the following line. An often quoted and parodied passage of Sir John Denham’s “Cooper’s Hill” (1642) illustrates these effects. The poem addresses the Thames and builds up a witty comparison between the flow of a river and the flow of verse (italics are added to highlight the terms compared):

O could I flow like thee, | and make thy stream

Parallelism: My great example, | as it is my theme!

Double balance: Though deep, yet clear, | though gentle, yet not dull,

Double balance: Strong without rage, | without o’erflowing, full.

Once Dryden and Pope had bound such passages more tightly together with alliteration and assonance, the typical metrical-rhetorical wit of the new age had been perfected. For most of the eighteenth century its only metrical rival was blank verse: iambic pentameter that does not rhyme and is not closed in couplets. Milton’s blank verse in Paradise Lost provided one model, and the dramatic blank verse of Shakespeare and Dryden provided another. This more expansive form appealed to poets who cared less for wit than for stories and thoughts with plenty of room to develop. Blank verse was favored as the best medium for descriptive and meditative poems, from James Thomson’s The Seasons (1726–30) to Cowper’s The Task (1785).

Ordinary people also wrote and read verse, and many of them did not know the classics. Only a minority of men, and very few women, had the chance to study Latin and Greek, but that did not keep a good many from playing with verse as a pastime or writing about their own lives. While the heroic couplet was being perfected, doggerel also thrived, and Milton’s blank verse was sometimes used to describe a drunk or an oyster. Burlesque and broad humor characterize much of the common run of eighteenth-century verse. As the audience for poetry became more diversified, so did the subject matter. No readership was too small to address; Isaac Watts, and later Anna Laetitia Barbauld and William Blake, wrote songs for children. The rise of unconventional forms and topics of verse subverted an older poetic ideal: the Olympian art that only a handful of the elect could possibly master. The eighteenth century brought poetry down to earth. In the future, art that claimed to be high would have to find ways to distinguish itself from the low.

RESTORATION LITERATURE, 1660–1700

Dryden brought England a modern literature between 1660 and 1700. He combined a cosmopolitan outlook on the latest European trends with some of the richness and variety he admired in Chaucer and Shakespeare. In most of the important contemporary forms—occasional verse, comedy, tragedy, heroic play, ode, satire, translation, and critical essay—both his example and his rules influenced others. As a critic, he spread the word that English literature, particularly his own, could vie with the best of the past. As a translator, he made such classics as Ovid and Virgil available to a wide public; for the first time, a large number of women and men without a formal education could feel included in the high literary world.

Restoration prose clearly indicated the desire to reach a new audience. The styles of John Donne's sermons, Milton's pamphlets, or Thomas Browne's treatises now seemed too elaborate and rhetorical for simple communication. By contrast, Samuel Pepys and Aphra Behn head straight to the point, informally and unself-consciously. The Royal Society asked its members to employ a plain, utilitarian prose style that spelled out scientific truths; according to this theory (which did not always correspond with practice), rhetorical flourishes and striking metaphors might be acceptable in poetry, which engaged the emotions, but had no place in rational discourse. The impact of scientific stylistic ideals can be felt in Behn's Oroonoko (1688). In other literature, the ideal prose style had the ease and poise of well-bred urbane conversation. This is a social prose for a sociable age.

Yet despite its broad appeal to the public, Restoration literature kept its ties to an aristocratic heroic ideal. The "fierce wars and faithful loves" of epic poems were expected to offer patterns of virtue for noble emulation. These ideals lived on in popular French prose romances and in Behn's Oroonoko. They were also expressed in heroic plays like those written by Dryden, which push to extremes the conflict between love and honor in the hearts of impossibly valiant heroes and impossibly high-minded and attractive heroines.

But comedy was the real distinction of Restoration drama. The best plays of Sir George Etherege (The Man of Mode, 1676), William Wycherley (The Country Wife, 1675), Aphra Behn (The Rover, 1677), and William Congreve (Love for Love, 1695; The Way of the World, 1700) can still hold the stage today. These "comedies of manners" pick social behavior apart, exposing the nasty struggles for power among the upper classes, who use wit and manners as weapons. Human nature in these plays often conforms to the worst fears of Thomas Hobbes's pessimism: sensual, false-hearted, selfish characters prey on each other. The male hero lives for pleasure and for the money and women that he can conquer. The object of his game of sexual intrigue is a beautiful, witty, pleasure-loving, and emancipated lady, every bit his equal in the strategies of love. What makes the favored couple stand out is the true wit and well-bred grace with which they step through the minefield of the plot. But during the 1690s, "Societies for the Reformation of Manners" began to attack the blasphemy and obscenity they detected in such plays, and they sometimes brought offenders to trial. When Dryden died in 1700, new ideas about politeness and respectability were coming into being.

EARLY EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY LITERATURE, 1700–1745

At the beginning of the eighteenth century a brilliant new group of writers emerged, many with a taste for satire: Swift, in A Tale of a Tub (1704); Pope, in An Essay on Criticism (1711); Montagu, in Town Eclogues (written 1715); and Addison and Steele, in the Tatler (1709–11) and Spectator (1711–12, 1714). Addison and Steele refined the form of the elegant periodical essay to comment on up-to-the-minute fashions and fads. And the period's finest poetic works often cast a strange light on modern times by viewing them through the screen of classical myths and classical forms. Thus Pope exposes the frivolity of fashionable London, in The Rape of the Lock (1714–17), through the incongruity of verse that casts the idle rich as epic heroes. Similarly, Montagu takes up the pastoral form, meant for the countryside, to deal with fashionable people in the cities, where values of "natural" and "pure" get refracted richly. Such incongruities are not entirely negative. They also provide a fresh perspective on things that had once seemed too low for poetry to notice—for instance, in The Rape of the Lock, a girl putting on her makeup. In this way a parallel with classical literature could show not only how far the modern world has fallen but also how fascinating and magical it is when seen with "quick, poetic eyes."

At the same time, a new mass and multiplicity of writings responded to the expanding commercial possibilities of print. An array of popular prose genres—news, thinly disguised political allegories, biographies of notorious criminals, travelogues, gossip, romantic tales—often blended facts and patently fictional elements, cemented by a rich lode of exaggeration, misrepresentations, and outright lies. Out of this matrix the modern novel would come to be born. Two early masters of such works were Eliza Haywood—who centered stories of women and desire in texts like Love in Excess (1719) and Fantomina; or, Love in a Maze (1725)—and Daniel Defoe, producing first-person accounts such as Robinson Crusoe (1719), the famous castaway, and Moll Flanders (1722), mistress of lowlife crime. Claims that such works present (as the “editor” of Crusoe says) “a just history of fact,” believed or not, sharpened the public’s eagerness for them. These writers show readers a world plausibly like the one they know, where ordinary people negotiate familiar, entangled problems of financial, emotional, or spiritual existence. Jane Barker, Mary Davys, and many others brought women’s work and daily lives as well as love affairs to fiction. Such stories were not only amusing but also served as models of conduct. Readers also eagerly embraced less probable and realistic kinds of fiction. The Arabian Nights Entertainments—which was first published in English in this period—proved wildly popular, firing its readers’ imaginations with its magical and fantastic tales.

The theater also began to change to appeal to a wider audience. The clergyman Jeremy Collier had taken Dryden, Wycherley, and Congreve to task in A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698), which spoke for the moral outrage of the pious middle classes. The comedy of manners was replaced by a new kind, later called “sentimental” not only because goodness triumphs over vice but also because it deals in high moral sentiments rather than witty dialogue and because the embarrassments of its heroines and heroes move the audience not to laughter but to tears. Virtue refuses to bow to aristocratic codes. In one crucial scene of Steele’s play The Conscious Lovers (1722), the hero would rather accept dishonor than fight a duel with a friend. Piety and middle-class values typify tragedies such as George Lillo’s London Merchant (1731). Later in the century the comedies of Oliver Goldsmith and Richard Brinsley Sheridan proved that sentiment is not necessarily an enemy to wit and laughter. Larger and larger audiences responded to spectacles and special effects, and the emerging star system produced idolized actors and actresses, such as David Garrick and Sarah Siddons.

Despite the sociable impulses of much of the period’s writing, readers also craved less crowded, more meditative works. Since the seventeenth century, a common poetic theme had been the pleasures of retirement, poems that invited the reader to dream about a retreat in the country or to meditate, like Finch, on scenery and the soul. But after 1726, when Thomson published Winter, the first of his cycle on the seasons, the poetry of natural description came into its own. A taste for nature's beauty found expression not only in verse but in the elaborate, cultivated art of landscape gardening, and finally in the cherished art of landscape painting in watercolor or oils (often illustrating Thomson's The Seasons). Many readers also learned to enjoy a thrilling pleasure or fear in the presence of the "sublime" in nature: rushing waters, wild prospects, and mountains shrouded in mist. Whether enthusiasts went to the landscape in search of God or merely of heightened sensations, they came back feeling that they had been touched by something beyond the life they knew, by something that could hardly be expressed. Tourists as well as poets roamed the countryside, frequently quoting verse as they gazed at some evocative scene.

THE EMERGENCE OF NEW LITERARY THEMES AND MODES, 1740–85

When Matthew Arnold called the eighteenth century an “age of prose,” he meant to belittle its poetry, but he also stated a significant fact: great prose does dominate the age. Until the 1740s, poetry tended to set the standards of literature, but over the course of the century prose—and the novel especially—became increasingly powerful. Intellectual prose flourished, with the achievements of Johnson in the essay and literary criticism, of James Boswell in biography, of Hume in philosophy, of Burke in politics, of Edward Gibbon in history, of Sir Joshua Reynolds in aesthetics, of Gilbert White in natural history, and of Adam Smith in economics. Each of these authors is a master stylist, whose effort to express himself clearly and fully demands an art as carefully wrought as poetry. Forms of life writing also became important and exciting. Frances Burney’s novels were written in the form of personal letters, but she also kept a diary that glitteringly captured the rhythms of everyday life in London. Formerly enslaved writers like Olaudah Equiano and Ottobah Cugoana wrote autobiographies that recounted what was horrifying and what was redemptive in their life stories, and these first-person accounts became powerful forces in the movement to end slavery.

Johnson helped codify that language, not only with his writings but with the first great English Dictionary (1755). This work established him as a national man of letters, but his dominance also involved service to others. The Dictionary illustrates its definitions with more than 114,000 quotations from the best English writers, thus building a bridge from past to present usage; and Johnson’s essays, poems, and criticism also reflect his desire to preserve the lessons of the past. Yet he looks to the future as well, trying both to reach and to mold a nation of readers. If Johnson speaks for his age, one reason is his faith in common sense and the common reader. “By the common sense of readers uncorrupted with literary prejudices,”

he wrote in the last of his Lives of the Poets (1781), "must be finally decided all claim to poetical honors."

No prose form better united availability to the common reader and seriousness of artistic purpose than the emerging novel. Like many writers of fiction earlier in the century, Samuel Richardson did not set out to entertain the public with an avowedly invented tale: he conceived Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740) while compiling a little book of model letters. The letters grew into a story about a young servant who resists her master's base designs on her virtue until he gives up and marries her. The combination of a high moral tone with sexual titillation and a minute analysis of the heroine's emotions and state of mind proved irresistible to readers, in Britain and in Europe at large. Richardson topped Pamela's success with Clarissa (1747–48), another epistolary novel, which explored the conflict between the libertine Lovelace, an attractive and diabolical aristocrat, and the angelic Clarissa, a middle-class paragon who struggles to stay pure. The sympathy that readers felt for Clarissa was magnified by a host of sentimental novels, including Frances Sheridan's Memoirs of Miss Sidney Bidulph (1761), Jean-Jacques Rousseau's Julie, or The New Heloise (1761), and Henry Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling (1771). Henry Fielding made his entrance into the novel by turning Pamela farcically upside down, offering instead the stories of the hypocritical Shamela (1741) and Pamela's brother Joseph Andrews (1742). Fielding's true model, however, is Cervantes' Don Quixote (1605–15), from which Joseph Andrews borrowed an ironic, antiromantic style; a plot of wandering around the countryside; and an idealistic central character (Parson Adams) who keeps mistaking appearances for reality. The ambition of writing what Fielding called "a comic epic-poem in prose" went still further in The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749). Crowded with incidents and comments on the state of England, the novel contrasts a good-natured, generous, wayward hero (who needs to learn prudence) with cold-hearted people who use moral codes and the law for their own selfish interests. This emphasis on instinctive virtue and vice, instead of Richardson's devotion to good principles, put off some respectable readers like Johnson. But Samuel Taylor Coleridge thought that Tom

Jones (along with Oedipus Rex and Jonson's Alchemist) was one of "the three most perfect plots ever planned." (See "The Rise of the Novel," p. 669.)

Some poets continued in the tradition of the earlier eighteenth century, taking on the guise of the learned commentator as they engaged social and political issues. Other poets seemed interested in withdrawing from the public arena. To Gray, Collins, Mark Akenside, and the brothers Joseph and Thomas Warton, it seemed that the spirit of poetry might be dying, driven out by the spirit of prose, by uninspiring truth, by the end of superstitions that had once peopled the land with poetic fairies and demons. In an age barren of magic, they ask, where has poetry gone? That question haunts many poems, suffusing them with melancholy. Poets who muse in silence are never far from thoughts of death, and a morbid fascination with the grave preoccupies many at midcentury. Such an attitude has little in common with that of poets like Dryden and Pope, social beings who live in a crowded world and seldom confess their private feelings in public. Pope's An Essay on Man had taken a sunny view of providence; Edward Young's The Complaint: or Night Thoughts on Life, Death, and Immortality (1742–46), an immensely long poem in blank verse, is darkened by Christian fear of the life to come.

Often the melancholy poet, set apart from the world, yearns to be living in some other time and place. In his "Ode to Fancy" (1746), Joseph Warton associated "fancy" with visions in the wilderness and spontaneous passions; the true poet was no longer defined as a craftsman or maker but as a seer or nature's priest. "The public has seen all that art can do," William Shenstone wrote in 1761, welcoming James Macpherson's Ossian, "and they want the more striking efforts of wild, original, enthusiastic genius." Macpherson filled the bill. His sentimental epics, supposedly translated from an ancient Gaelic warrior-bard, won the hearts of readers around the world; Napoleon and Thomas Jefferson, for instance, both thought that Ossian was greater than Homer. Poets began to cultivate archaic language and antique forms.

A medieval revival spurred, also, the invention of the Gothic novel. Horace Walpole set The Castle of Otranto (1765), a dreamlike tale of terror, in a simulacrum of Strawberry Hill, his own tiny, pseudo-medieval castle, which helped revive a taste for Gothic architecture. Walpole created a mode of fiction that retains its popularity to the present day. In a typical Gothic romance, amid the glooms and secret passages of some remote castle, the laws of nightmare replace the laws of probability. Forbidden themes—incest, murder, necrophilia, atheism, and the torments of sexual desire—are allowed free play. Most such romances, like William Beckford's Vathek (1786) and Matthew Lewis's The Monk (1796), revel in sensationalism and the grotesque. The Gothic vogue suggested that classical canons of taste—simplicity and harmonious balance—might count for less than the pleasures of fancy—intricate puzzles and a willful excess. But Gothicism also resulted in works, like Ann Radcliffe's, that temper romance with reality, as well as in serious novels of social purpose, like William Godwin's Caleb Williams (1794) and Mary Wollstonecraft's Maria, or The Wrongs of Woman (1798); and Mary Shelley, the daughter of Wollstonecraft and Godwin, eventually composed a romantic nightmare, Frankenstein (1818), that continues to haunt our dreams.

The century abounded in other remarkable experiments in fiction, anticipating many of the forms that novelists still use today. Tobias Smollett's picaresque Roderick Random (1748) and Humphry Clinker (1771) delight in coarse practical jokes, the freaks and strong odors of life. But the most novel novelist of the age was Laurence Sterne, a humorous, sentimental clergyman who loves to play tricks on his readers. The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1760–67) abandons clock time for psychological time, whimsically follows chance associations, interrupts its own stories, violates the conventions of print by putting Chapters 18 and 19 after Chapter 25, sneaks in double entendres, and seems ready to go on forever. Sterne's second masterpiece, A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768), gives us a narrator, Yorick, who cultivates his feelings so self-consciously and renders them in such convincing detail that we are unsure whether to laugh at or weep along with him. Such uncertainty helps us recognize that our sympathies are as volatile and ambiguous as those of Sterne's characters. As unique as Sterne's fictional world is, his interest in private life matched the concerns of the novel toward the end of the century: depictions of characters' intimate feelings dominated the tradition of domestic fiction that included Burney, Radcliffe, and, later, Maria Edgeworth, culminating in the masterworks of Jane Austen. The copious, acute, often ironic attention to details of private life by Richardson, Sterne, and Austen have continued to influence the novel profoundly through its subsequent history.

This period brought important changes to ideas about what literature is how it works, and what it should do. If the debates in eighteenth-century Britain helped shape our understanding of "English literature," however, in their own moment these ideas were profoundly in flux, contested. The new modes of meditative feeling explored by eighteenth-century poets like Thomas Gray and Charlotte Smith were developed by poets at the beginning of the nineteenth century into a Romantic poetics. We today have inherited a set of post-Romantic assumptions about poetry and emotional expressivity that make other aspects of eighteenth-century poetry feel surprising: its willingness to engage big philosophical or political questions, its play with personifications, its exuberant and sometimes vicious satire. The novel as a form was developing in the eighteenth century too, but it developed through a series of daring experiments undertaken without knowledge of the conventions that now seem obvious to us: writers tried out fake travelogues, faux-oriental tales, sentimental scenes designed to make readers weep, even stories narrated from the point of view of objects (as in The Adventures of a Black Coat . . . As Related by Itself, 1750). In an era of flourishing ideas about individualism, writers forged individualistic literary genres like the autobiography, but also cultivated aesthetic effects like sublimity that made the individual feel small. These texts might not always conform to our expectations today about what literature is and does, but they are all the more illuminating and compelling for that.

JOHN DRYDEN

1631–1700

Although John Dryden's parents seem to have sided with Parliament against the king, there is no evidence that the poet grew up in a strict Puritan family. His father, a country gentleman of moderate fortune, gave his son a gentleman's education at Westminster School, under the renowned Dr. Richard Busby, who used the rod as a pedagogical aid in imparting a sound knowledge of the learned languages and literatures to his charges (among others John Locke and Matthew Prior). From Westminster, Dryden went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his A.B. in 1654. His first important poem, "Heroic Stanzas" (1659), was written to commemorate the death of Cromwell. The next year, however, in "Astraea Redux," Dryden joined his countrymen in celebrating the return of Charles II to his throne. During the rest of his life Dryden was to remain entirely loyal to Charles and to his successor, James II.

Dryden is a commanding literary figure of the last four decades of the seventeenth century. An impressive range of aspects of the life of his times—political, religious, philosophical, artistic—finds expression somewhere in his writings. Dryden is the least personal of poets. He is not at all the solitary, subjective poet listening to the murmur of his own voice and preoccupied with his own feelings but rather a citizen of the world commenting publicly on matters of public concern.

From the beginning to the end of his literary career, Dryden's nondramatic poems are most typically occasional poems, which commemorate particular events of a public character—a coronation, a military victory, a death, or a political crisis. Such poems are social and often ceremonial, written not for the self but for the nation. Dryden's principal achievements in this form are the two poems on the king's return and his coronation; Annus Mirabilis (1667), which celebrates the English naval victory over the Dutch and the fortitude of the people of London and the king during the Great Fire, both events of that "year of wonder," 1666; the political poems; and poems celebrating holidays, such as "A Song for St. Cecilia's Day."

Between 1664 and 1681, however, Dryden was mainly a playwright. The newly chartered theaters needed a modern repertory, and he set out to supply one. Dryden wrote his plays, as he frankly confessed, to please his audiences, which were not heterogeneous like Shakespeare's but were largely drawn from the court and from people of fashion. In the style of the time, he produced rhymed heroic plays, in which noble heroes and heroines face incredibly difficult choices between love and honor; comedies, in which fashionable men and women engage in intrigue and bright repartee; and later, libretti for the newly introduced dramatic form, the opera. His one great tragedy, All for Love (produced 1677), in blank verse, adapts Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra to the unities of time, place, and action. As his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) shows, Dryden had studied the works of the great playwrights of Greece and Rome, of the English Renaissance, and of contemporary France, seeking sound theoretical principles on which to construct the new drama that the age demanded. Indeed, his fine critical intelligence always supported his creative powers. His abilities as both poet and dramatist brought him to the attention of the king, who in 1668 made him poet laureate. Two years later the post of historiographer royal was added to the laureateship at a combined stipend of £200, enough money to live comfortably on.

Between 1678 and 1681, when he was nearing fifty, Dryden discovered his great gift for writing formal verse satire. A quarrel with the playwright Thomas Shadwell prompted the mock-heroic "Mac Flecknoe," probably written in 1678 or 1679 but not published until 1682. Out of the stresses occasioned by the Popish Plot (1678) and its political aftermath came his major political satires, Absalom and Achitophel (1681–82), and "The Medal" (1682), his final attack on the villain of Absalom and Achitophel, the Earl of Shaftesbury.

The consideration of religious and political questions that the events of 1678–81 forced on Dryden brought a new seriousness to his mind and works. In 1682 he published Religio Laici, a poem in which he examined the grounds of his religious faith and defended the middle way of the Anglican Church against the rationalism of Deism on the one hand and the authoritarianism of Rome on the other. But he had moved closer to Rome than he perhaps realized when he wrote the poem. Charles II died in 1685 and was succeeded by his Catholic brother, James II. Within a year Dryden and his two sons converted to Catholicism. Though his enemies accused him of opportunism, he proved his sincerity by his steadfast loyalty to the Roman Church after James abdicated and the Protestant William and Mary came in; as a result he was to lose his offices and their much-needed stipends.

With a family to support, Dryden resumed writing plays and turned to translations to enhance his much-diminished income. In 1693 appeared his versions of Juvenal and Persius, with a long dedicatory epistle on satire; and in 1697, his greatest achievement in this mode, the works of Virgil. At the very end, two months before his death, came the Fables Ancient and Modern, prefaced by one of the finest of his critical essays and made up of translations from Ovid, Boccaccio, and Chaucer.

Dryden's foremost achievement was to bring the pleasures of literature to the ever-increasing reading public of Britain. As a critic and translator, he made many classics available to men and women who lacked a classical education. His canons of taste and theoretical principles would set the standard for the next generation. As a writer of prose, he helped establish a popular new style, shaped to the cadences of good conversation. Johnson praised its apparent artlessness: "every word seems to drop by chance, though it falls into its proper place. Nothing is cold or languid; the whole is airy, animated, and vigorous . . . though all is easy, nothing is feeble; though all seems careless, there is nothing harsh." Although Dryden's plays went out of fashion, his poems did not. His satire inspired the most brilliant verse satirist of the next century, Alexander Pope, and the energy and variety of his metrics launched the long-standing vogue of heroic couplets. Dryden fashioned the couplet form into an instrument suitable for every sort of discourse, from the thrust and parry of quick logical argument to expressive feelings, rapid narrative, or forensic declamation. Dryden crafted his verse into a style that was lively, dignified, precise, and always musical—a flexible instrument of public speech. "By him we were taught sapere et fari, to think naturally and express forcibly," Johnson concluded. "What was said of Rome, adorned by Augustus, may be applied by an easy metaphor to English poetry embellished by Dryden, lateritiam invenit, marmoream reliquit, he found it brick, and he left it marble."

[LONDON REBORN]

845 Yet London, empress of the northern clime,
By an high fate thou greatly didst expire;
Great as the world's, which at the death of time
Must fall, and rise a nobler frame by fire.<sup>2</sup>

850 As when some dire usurper Heaven provides,
To scourge his country with a lawless sway:<sup>3</sup>
His birth, perhaps, some petty village hides,
And sets his cradle out of fortune's way:

Till fully ripe his swelling fate breaks out,
And hurries him to mighty mischiefs on:
855 His Prince, surprised at first, no ill could doubt,<sup>o</sup>
And wants the power to meet it when 'tis known:

Such was the rise of this prodigious fire,
Which in mean buildings first obscurely bred,
From thence did soon to open streets aspire,
860 And straight to palaces and temples spread.

* * *

Me-thinks already, from this chymic<sup>o</sup> flame,
I see a city of more precious mold:
1170 Rich as the town which gives the Indies name,<sup>o</sup>
With silver paved, and all divine with gold.

Already, laboring with a mighty fate,
She shakes the rubbish from her mounting brow,
And seems to have renewed her charter's date,
1175 Which Heaven will to the death of time allow.

More great than human, now, and more August,<sup>4</sup>
New deified she from her fires does rise:
Her widening streets on new foundations trust,
And, opening, into larger parts she flies.
1180

Before, she like some shepherdess did show,
Who sat to bathe her by a river's side:
Not answering to her fame, but rude and low,
Nor taught the beauteous arts of modern pride.

Now, like a Maiden Queen, she will behold,
1185 From her high turrets, hourly suitors come:
The East with incense, and the West with gold,
Will stand, like suppliants, to receive her doom.<sup>o</sup>

The silver Thames, her own domestic flood,
Shall bear her vessels like a sweeping train;
1190 And often wind (as of his mistress proud)
With longing eyes to meet her face again.

The wealthy Tagus,<sup>5</sup> and the wealthier Rhine,
The glory of their towns no more shall boast;
And Seine, that would with Belgian rivers join,<sup>6</sup>
1195 Shall find her luster stained, and traffic lost.

The venturous merchant, who designed<sup>o</sup> more far,
And touches on our hospitable shore,
Charmed with the splendor of this northern star,
1200 Shall here unlade him, and depart no more.

Our powerful navy shall no longer meet,
The wealth of France or Holland to invade;
The beauty of this Town, without a fleet,
From all the world shall vindicate<sup>o</sup> her trade.

1205 And while this famed emporium we prepare,
The British ocean shall such triumphs boast,
That those who now disdain our trade to share,
Shall rob like pirates on our wealthy coast.

1210 Already we have conquered half the war,
And the less dangerous part is left behind:
Our trouble now is but to make them dare,
And not so great to vanquish as to find.

Thus to the eastern wealth through storms we go,
But now, the Cape once doubled,<sup>o</sup> fear no
more;
1215 A constant trade-wind will securely blow,
And gently lay us on the spicy shore.

1666 Endnotes

1667

- Note 1:

The year 1666 was a “year of wonders” (annus mirabilis; Latin): war, plague, and the Great Fire of London. According to the enemies of Charles II, God was visiting His wrath on the English people to signify that the reign of an unholy king would soon come to an end. Dryden’s long “historical poem” Annus Mirabilis, written the same year, interprets the wonders differently: as trials sent by God to punish rebellious spirits and to bind the king and his people together. “Never had prince or people more mutual reason to love each other,” Dryden wrote, “if suffering for each other can endear affection.” Charles had endured rejection and exile, England had been torn by civil wars. Dryden views these sufferings as a covenant, a pledge of better times to come. Out of Charles's troubles, he predicts in heroic stanzas modeled on Virgil, the king shall arise like a new Augustus, the ruler of a great empire, and out of fire, London shall arise like the phoenix, ready to take its place as trade center for the world, in the glory of a new Augustan age.

- Note 2: Dryden's footnote cites Ovid, Metamorphoses I, which foretells that the world will be purged by fire. The Fire of London, which utterly consumed the central city, burned for four days, September 2–6. By September 10, Christopher Wren had already submitted a plan, much of it later adopted, for rebuilding the city on a grander scale. For a dramatic contemporary depiction of the event, see The Great Fire of London, 1666, in the color insert in this volume. Return to reference 2

Absalom and Achanitophel

In 1678 a dangerous crisis, both religious and political, threatened to undo the Restoration settlement and to precipitate England once again into civil war. The Popish Plot and its aftermath not only whipped up extreme anti-Catholic passions, but led between 1679 and 1681 to a bitter political struggle between Charles II (whose adherents came to be called Tories) and the Earl of Shaftesbury (whose followers were termed Whigs). The issues were nothing less than the prerogatives of the Crown and the possible exclusion of the king's Catholic brother, James, Duke of York, from his position as heir-presumptive to the throne. Charles's cool courage and brilliant, if unscrupulous, political genius saved the throne for his brother and gave at least temporary peace to his people.

Charles was a Catholic at heart—he received the last rites of that church on his deathbed—and was eager to do what he could do discreetly for the relief of his Catholic subjects, who suffered severe civil and religious disabilities imposed by their numerically superior Protestant compatriots. James openly professed the Catholic religion, an awkward fact politically, for he was next in line of succession because Charles had no legitimate children. The household of the duke, as well as that of Charles's neglected queen, Catherine of Braganza, inevitably became the center of Catholic life and intrigue at court and consequently of Protestant prejudice and suspicion.

No one understood, however, that the situation was explosive until 1678, when Titus Oates (a renegade Catholic convert of infamous character) offered sworn testimony of the existence of a Jesuit plot to assassinate the king, burn London, massacre Protestants, and reestablish the Roman Church.

The country might have kept its head and come to realize (what no historian has doubted) that Oates and his confederates were perjured rascals, as Charles himself quickly perceived. But panic was created by the discovery of the body of a prominent London justice of the peace, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, who a few days before had received for safekeeping a copy of Oates's testimony. The murder, immediately ascribed to the Catholics, has never been solved. Fear and indignation reached a hysterical pitch when the seizure of the papers of the Duke of York's secretary revealed that he had been in correspondence with the confessor of Louis XIV regarding the reestablishment of the Roman Church in England. Before the terror subsided many innocent men were executed on the increasingly bold and always false evidence of Oates and his accomplices.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, the Duke of Buckingham, and others quickly took advantage of the situation. With the support of the Commons and the City of London, they moved to exclude the Duke of York from the succession. Between 1679 and 1681 Charles and Shaftesbury were engaged in a mighty struggle. The Whigs found a candidate of their own in the king's favorite illegitimate son, the handsome and engaging Duke of Monmouth, whom they advanced as a proper successor to his father. They urged Charles to legitimize him, and when he refused, they whispered that there was proof that the king had secretly married Monmouth's mother. The young man allowed himself to be used against his father. He was sent on a triumphant progress through western England, where he was enthusiastically received. Twice an Exclusion Bill nearly passed both houses. But by early 1681 Charles had secured his own position by secretly accepting from Louis XIV a three-year subsidy that made him independent of Parliament, which had tried to force his hand by refusing to vote him funds. He summoned Parliament to meet at Oxford in the spring of 1681, and a few moments after the Commons had passed the Exclusion Bill, in a bold stroke he abruptly dissolved Parliament, which never met again during his reign. Already, as Charles was aware, a reaction had set in against the violence of the Whigs. In midsummer, when he felt it safe to move against his enemies, Shaftesbury was sent to the Tower of London, charged with high treason. In November, the grand jury, packed with Whigs, threw out the indictment, and the earl was free, but his power was broken, and he lived only two more years.

Shortly before the grand jury acted, Dryden published anonymously the first part of Absalom and Achitophel, apparently hoping to influence their verdict. The issues in question were grave; the chief actors, the most important men in the realm. Dryden, therefore, could not use burlesque and caricature as had Butler, or the mock heroic, as he himself had done in "Mac Flecknoe." Only a heroic style and manner were appropriate to his weighty material, and the poem is most original in its blending of the heroic and the satiric. Dryden's task called for all his tact and literary skill; he had to mention, but to gloss over, the king's faults: his indolence and love of pleasure; his neglect of his wife; and his devotion to his mistresses—conduct that had left him with many children, but no heir except his Catholic brother. He had to deal gently with Monmouth, whom Charles still loved. And he had to present, or appear to present, the king's case objectively.

The remarkable parallels between the rebellion of Absalom against his father, King David (2 Samuel 13–18), had already been noticed in sermons, satires, and pamphlets. Dryden took the hint and gave contemporary events a due distance and additional dignity by approaching them indirectly through their biblical analogues. The poem is famous for its brilliant portraits of the king's enemies and friends, but equally admirable are the temptation scene (which, like other passages, is indebted to Milton's Paradise Lost) and the exceptionally astute analysis of the Popish Plot itself.

A second part of Absalom and Achitophel (not included here) appeared in 1682. Most of it is the work of Nahum Tate, but lines 310–509, which include the devastating portraits of Doeg and Og (two Whig poets, Elkanah Settle and Thomas Shadwell), are certainly by Dryden.

Absalom and Achitophel: A Poem

In pious times, ere priestcraft<sup>1</sup> did begin,
Before polygamy was made a sin;
When man on many multiplied his kind,
Ere one to one was cursedly confined;
5 When nature prompted and no law denied
Promiscuous use of concubine and bride;
Then Israel's monarch after Heaven's own heart,<sup>2</sup>
His vigorous warmth did variously impart
To wives and slaves; and, wide as his command,
Scattered his Maker's image through the land.
10 Michal,<sup>3</sup> of royal blood, the crown did wear,
A soil ungrateful to the tiller's care:
Not so the rest; for several mothers bore
To godlike David several sons before.
But since like slaves his bed they did ascend,
15 No true succession could their seed attend.
Of all this numerous progeny was none
So beautiful, so brave, as Absalom:<sup>4</sup>
Whether, inspired by some diviner lust,
His father got him with a greater gust,<sup>o</sup>
20 Or that his conscious destiny made way,
By manly beauty, to imperial sway.
Early in foreign fields he won renown,
With kings and states allied to Israel's crown:<sup>5</sup>
In peace the thoughts of war he could remove,
25 And seemed as he were only born for love.
Whate'er he did, was done with so much ease,
In him alone 'twas natural to please;
His motions all accompanied with grace;
And paradise was opened in his face.
30

With secret joy indulgent David viewed
His youthful image in his son renewed:
To all his wishes nothing he denied;
And made the charming Annabel<sup>6</sup> his bride.
What faults he had (for who from faults is free?)
35 His father could not, or he would not see.
Some warm excesses which the law forbore,
Were construed youth that purged by boiling o'er:
And Amnon's murder,<sup>7</sup> by a specious name,
Was called a just revenge for injured fame.
40 Thus praised and loved the noble youth remained,
While David, undisturbed, in Sion<sup>8</sup> reigned.
But life can never be sincerely<sup>9</sup> blest;
Heaven punishes the bad, and proves<sup>10</sup> the best.
The Jews,<sup>11</sup> a headstrong, moody, murmuring race,
45 As ever tried the extent and stretch of grace;
God's pampered people, whom, debauched with ease,
No king could govern, nor no God could please (Gods they had tried of every shape and size
That god-smiths could produce, or priests devise);<sup>12</sup>
50 These Adam-wits, too fortunately free,
Began to dream they wanted liberty;<sup>13</sup>
And when no rule, no precedent was found,
Of men by laws less circumscribed and bound,
They led their wild desires to woods and caves,
55 And thought that all but savages were slaves.
They who, when Saul<sup>14</sup> was dead, without a blow,
Made foolish Ishbosheth<sup>15</sup> the crown forgo;
Who banished David did from Hebron<sup>16</sup> bring,
And with a general shout proclaimed him king:
60 Those very Jews, who, at their very best,
Their humor<sup>17</sup> more than loyalty expressed,
Now wondered why so long they had obeyed
An idol monarch, which their hands had made;

65 Thought they might ruin him they could create,
Or melt him to that golden calf,<sup>4</sup> a state.<sub>o</sub>
But these were random bolts;<sub>o</sub> no formed design
Nor interest made the factious crowd to join:
The sober part of Israel, free from stain,
Well knew the value of a peaceful reign;
70 And, looking backward with a wise affright,
Saw seams of wounds, dishonest<sub>o</sub> to the sight:
In contemplation of whose ugly scars
They cursed the memory of civil wars.
The moderate sort of men, thus qualified,<sub>o</sub>
75 Inclined the balance to the better side;
And David's mildness managed it so well,
The bad found no occasion to rebel.
But when to sin our biased<sup>5</sup> nature leans,
The careful Devil is still at hand with means;
80 And providently pimps for ill desires:
The Good Old Cause<sup>6</sup> revived, a plot requires.
Plots, true or false, are necessary things,
To raise up commonwealths and ruin kings.
The inhabitants of old Jerusalem
85 Were Jebusites;<sup>7</sup> the town so called from them;
And theirs the native right.
But when the chosen people<sub>o</sub> grew more strong,
The rightful cause at length became the wrong;
And every loss the men of Jebus bore,
90 They still were thought God's enemies the more.
Thus worn and weakened, well or ill content,
Submit they must to David's government:
Impoverished and deprived of all command,
Their taxes doubled as they lost their land;
95 And, what was harder yet to flesh and blood,
Their gods disgraced, and burnt like common wood.<sup>8</sup>
This set the heathen priesthood<sub>o</sub> in a flame;
For priests of all religions are the same:

100 Of whatsoe'er descent their godhead be,
Stock, stone, or other homely pedigree,
In his defense his servants are as bold,
As if he had been born of beaten gold.
The Jewish rabbins,<sup>o</sup> though their enemies,
105 In this conclude them honest men and wise:
For 'twas their duty, all the learned think,
To espouse his cause, by whom they eat and drink.
From hence began that Plot, the nation's curse,
Bad in itself, but represented worse;
110 Raised in extremes, and in extremes decried;
With oaths affirmed, with dying vows denied;
Not weighed or winnowed by the multitude;
But swallowed in the mass, unchewed and crude.
Some truth there was, but dashed<sup>o</sup> and brewed with lies,
115 To please the fools, and puzzle all the wise.
Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.
The Egyptian<sup>9</sup> rites the Jebusites embraced,
Where gods were recommended by their taste.<sup>1</sup>
Such savory deities must needs be good,
120 As served at once for worship and for food.
By force they could not introduce these gods,
For ten to one in former days was odds;
So fraud was used (the sacrificer's trade):
Fools are more hard to conquer than persuade.
125 Their busy teachers mingled with the Jews,
And raked for converts even the court and stews:<sup>o</sup>
Which Hebrew priests the more unkindly took,
Because the fleece accompanies the flock.<sup>2</sup>
Some thought they God's anointed<sup>o</sup> meant to slay
130 By guns, invented since full many a day:
Our author swears it not; but who can know
How far the Devil and Jebusites may go?

This Plot, which failed for want of common sense,
 Had yet a deep and dangerous consequence:
 135 For, as when raging fevers boil the blood,
 The standing lake soon floats into a flood,
 And every hostile humor,<sup>3</sup> which before
 Slept quiet in its channels, bubbles o'er;
 So several factions from this first ferment
 140 Work up to foam, and threat the government.
 Some by their friends, more by themselves thought wise,
 Opposed the power to which they could not rise.
 Some had in courts been great, and thrown from thence,
 Like fiends were hardened in impenitence;
 145 Some, by their monarch's fatal mercy, grown
 From pardoned rebels kinsmen to the throne,
 Were raised in power and public office high;
 Strong bands, if bands ungrateful men could tie.
 Of these the false Achitophel<sup>4</sup> was first;
 150 A name to all succeeding ages cursed:
 For close designs, and crooked counsels fit;
 Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;<sup>o</sup>
 Restless, unfixed in principles and place;
 In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace:
 155 A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
 Fretted the pygmy body to decay,
 And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.<sup>5</sup> }
 A daring pilot in extremity;
 Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high,
 160 He sought the storms; but, for a calm unfit,
 Would steer too nigh the sands, to boast his wit.
 Great wits<sup>o</sup> are sure to madness near allied,<sup>6</sup>
 And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
 Else why should he, with wealth and honor blest,
 165 Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?

Punish a body which he could not please;
 Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
 And all to leave what with his toil he won,
 To that unfeathered two-legged thing,<sup>7</sup> a son;
 170 Got, while his soul did huddled<sup>o</sup> notions try;
 And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.
 In friendship false, implacable in hate,
 Resolved to ruin or to rule the state.
 To compass this the triple bond<sup>8</sup> he broke, } 175 The pillars of the public safety shook,
 And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke;
 Then seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
 Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.
 So easy still it proves in factious times,
 180 With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
 How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
 Where none can sin against the people's will!
 Where crowds can wink, and no offense be known,
 Since in another's guilt they find their own!
 185 Yet fame deserved, no enemy can grudge;
 The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
 In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbethdin<sup>9</sup>
 With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean;
 Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress;
 190 Swift of dispatch, and easy of access.
 Oh, had he been content to serve the crown,
 With virtues only proper to the gown<sup>o</sup>
 Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
 From cockle,<sup>o</sup> that oppressed the noble seed;
 195 David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
 And Heaven had wanted one immortal song.<sup>1</sup>
 But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand,
 And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land.
 Achitophel, grown weary to possess

200 A lawful fame, and lazy happiness,
Disdained the golden fruit to gather free,
And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.
Now, manifest of<sup>o</sup> crimes contrived long since,
He stood at bold defiance with his prince;
205 Held up the buckler of the people's cause
Against the crown, and skulked behind the laws.
The wished occasion of the Plot he takes;
Some circumstances finds, but more he makes.
By buzzing emissaries fills the ears
210 Of listening crowds with jealousies<sup>o</sup> and fears
Of arbitrary counsels brought to light,
And proves the king himself a Jebusite.
Weak arguments! which yet he knew full well
Were strong with people easy to rebel.
215 For, governed by the moon, the giddy Jews
Tread the same track when she the prime renews;
And once in twenty years, their scribes record,<sup>2</sup>
By natural instinct they change their lord.
Achitophel still wants a chief, and none
220 Was found so fit as warlike Absalom:
Not that he wished his greatness to create
(For politicians neither love nor hate),
But, for he knew his title not allowed,
Would keep him still depending on the crowd,
225 That<sup>o</sup> kingly power, thus ebbing out, might be Drawn to the dregs of a democracy.<sup>3</sup>
Him he attempts with studied arts to please,
And sheds his venom in such words as these:
"Auspicious prince, at whose nativity
230 Some royal planet<sup>4</sup> ruled the southern sky;
Thy longing country's darling and desire;
Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire:
Their second Moses, whose extended wand
Divides the seas, and shows the promised land;<sup>5</sup>
235

Whose dawning day in every distant age
Has exercised the sacred prophet's rage:
The people's prayer, the glad diviners' theme,
The young men's vision, and the old men's dream!<sup>6</sup>
Thee, savior, thee, the nation's vows<sup>7</sup> confess,
240 And, never satisfied with seeing, bless:
Swift unbespoken<sup>8</sup> pomps thy steps proclaim,
And stammering babes are taught to lisp thy name.
How long wilt thou the general joy detain,
Starve and defraud the people of thy reign?
245 Content ingloriously to pass thy days
Like one of Virtue's fools that feeds on praise;
Till thy fresh glories, which now shine so bright,
Grow stale and tarnish with our daily sight.
Believe me, royal youth, thy fruit must be 250 Or gathered ripe, or rot upon the tree.
Heaven has to all allotted, soon or late,
Some lucky revolution of their fate;
Whose motions if we watch and guide with skill
(For human good depends on human will),
255 Our Fortune rolls as from a smooth descent,
And from the first impression takes the bent;
But, if unseized, she glides away like wind,
And leaves repenting Folly far behind.
Now, now she meets you with a glorious prize,
260 And spreads her locks before her as she flies.<sup>8</sup>
Had thus old David, from whose loins you spring,
Not dared, when Fortune called him, to be king,
At Gath<sup>9</sup> an exile he might still remain,
And heaven's anointing<sup>1</sup> oil had been in vain.
265 Let his successful youth your hopes engage;
But shun the example of declining age;
Behold him setting in his western skies,
The shadows lengthening as the vapors rise.
He is not now, as when on Jordan's sand<sup>2</sup>

270 The joyful people thronged to see him land, Covering the beach, and blackening all the strand;
 But, like the Prince of Angels, from his height
 Comes tumbling downward with diminished light;<sup>3</sup>
 Betrayed by one poor plot to public scorn
 275 (Our only blessing since his cursed return),
 Those heaps of people which one sheaf did bind,
 Blown off and scattered by a puff of wind.
 What strength can he to your designs oppose,
 Naked of friends, and round beset with foes?
 280 If Pharaoh's<sup>4</sup> doubtful succor he should use,
 A foreign aid would more incense the Jews:
 Proud Egypt would dissembled friendship bring;
 Foment the war, but not support the king:
 Nor would the royal party e'er unite
 285 With Pharaoh's arms to assist the Jebusite;
 Or if they should, their interest soon would break,
 And with such odious aid make David weak.
 All sorts of men by my successful arts,
 Abhorring kings, estrange their altered hearts
 290 From David's rule: and 'tis the general cry,
 'Religion, commonwealth, and liberty.'<sup>5</sup>
 If you, as champion of the public good,
 Add to their arms a chief of royal blood,
 What may not Israel hope, and what applause
 295 Might such a general gain by such a cause?
 Not barren praise alone, that gaudy flower
 Fair only to the sight, but solid power;
 And nobler is a limited command,
 Given by the love of all your native land,
 300 Than a successive title,<sup>6</sup> long and dark,
 Drawn from the moldy rolls of Noah's ark."
 What cannot praise effect in mighty minds,

When flattery soothes, and when ambition blinds!
Desire of power, on earth a vicious weed,
305 Yet, sprung from high, is of celestial seed:
In God 'tis glory; and when men aspire,
'Tis but a spark too much of heavenly fire.
The ambitious youth, too covetous of fame,
310 Too full of angels' metal<sup>7</sup> in his frame,
Unwarily was led from virtue's ways,
Made drunk with honor, and debauched with praise.
Half loath, and half consenting to the ill
(For loyal blood within him struggled still),
He thus replied: "And what pretense have I
315 To take up arms for public liberty?
My father governs with unquestioned right;
The faith's defender, and mankind's delight,
Good, gracious, just, observant of the laws:
And heaven by wonders has espoused his cause.
320 Whom has he wronged in all his peaceful reign?
Who sues for justice to his throne in vain?
What millions has he pardoned of his foes,
Whom just revenge did to his wrath expose?
Mild, easy, humble, studious of our good,
325 Inclined to mercy, and averse from blood;
If mildness ill with stubborn Israel suit,
His crime is God's beloved attribute.
What could he gain, his people to betray,
Or change his right for arbitrary sway?
330 Let haughty Pharaoh curse, with such a reign
His fruitful Nile, and yoke a servile train.
If David's rule Jerusalem displease,
The Dog Star<sup>8</sup> heats their brains to this disease.
Why then should I, encouraging the bad,
335 Turn rebel and run popularly mad?
Were he a tyrant, who, by lawless might
Oppressed the Jews, and raised the Jebusite,

Well might I mourn; but nature's holy bands
Would curb my spirits and restrain my hands:
340 The people might assert<sup>o</sup> their liberty,
But what was right in them were crime in me.
His favor leaves me nothing to require;
Prevents my wishes, and outruns desire.
What more can I expect while David lives?
345 All but his kingly diadem he gives:
And that"—But there he paused; then sighing, said—
"Is justly destined for a worthier head.
For when my father from his toils shall rest
And late augment the number of the blest,
350 His lawful issue shall the throne ascend,
Or the collateral line,<sup>9</sup> where that shall end.
His brother, though oppressed with vulgar spite,<sup>1</sup>
Yet dauntless, and secure of native right,
Of every royal virtue stands possessed;
355 Still dear to all the bravest and the best.
His courage foes, his friends his truth proclaim;
His loyalty the king, the world his fame.
His mercy even the offending crowd will find,
For sure he comes of a forgiving kind.<sup>2</sup>
360 Why should I then repine at heaven's decree,
Which gives me no pretense to royalty?
Yet O that fate, propitiously inclined,
Had raised my birth, or had debased my mind;
To my large soul not all her treasure lent,
365 And then betrayed it to a mean descent!
I find, I find my mounting spirits bold,
And David's part disdains my mother's mold.
Why am I scanted by a niggard birth?<sup>3</sup>
My soul disclaims the kindred of her earth;
370 And, made for empire, whispers me within,
'Desire of greatness is a godlike sin.' "
Him staggering so when hell's dire agent found,

While fainting Virtue scarce maintained her ground,
He pours fresh forces in, and thus replies:
375       “The eternal god, supremely good and wise,
Imparts not these prodigious gifts in vain:
What wonders are reserved to bless your reign!
Against your will, your arguments have shown,
Such virtue’s only given to guide a throne.
380       Not that your father’s mildness I contemn,
But manly force becomes the diadem.
’Tis true he grants the people all they crave;
And more, perhaps, than subjects ought to have:
For lavish grants suppose a monarch tame,
385       And more his goodness than his wit<sup>o</sup> proclaim.
But when should people strive their bonds to break,
If not when kings are negligent or weak?
Let him give on till he can give no more,
The thrifty Sanhedrin<sup>4</sup> shall keep him poor;
390       And every shekel which he can receive,
Shall cost a limb of his prerogative.<sup>5</sup>
To ply him with new plots shall be my care;
Or plunge him deep in some expensive war;
Which when his treasure can no more supply,
395       He must, with the remains of kingship, buy.
His faithful friends our jealousies and fears
Call Jebusites, and Pharaoh’s pensioners;
Whom when our fury from his aid has torn,
He shall be naked left to public scorn.
400       The next successor, whom I fear and hate,
My arts have made obnoxious to the state;
Turned all his virtues to his overthrow,
And gained our elders<sup>6</sup> to pronounce a foe.
His right, for sums of necessary gold,
405       Shall first be pawned, and afterward be sold;
Till time shall ever-wanting David draw,
To pass your doubtful title into law:

If not, the people have a right supreme
To make their kings; for kings are made for them.
410 All empire is no more than power in trust,
Which, when resumed,<sup>o</sup> can be no longer just.
Succession, for the general good designed,
In its own wrong a nation cannot bind;
If altering that the people can relieve,
415 Better one suffer than a nation grieve.
The Jews well know their power: ere Saul they chose,<sup>7</sup>
God was their king, and God they durst depose.
Urge now your piety,<sup>8</sup> your filial name,
A father's right and fear of future fame;
420 The public good, that universal call,
To which even heaven submitted, answers all.
Nor let his love enchant your generous mind;
'Tis Nature's trick to propagate her kind.
Our fond begetters, who would never die,
425 Love but themselves in their posterity.
Or let his kindness by the effects be tried,
Or let him lay his vain pretense aside.
God said he loved your father; could he bring
A better proof than to anoint him king?
430 It surely showed he loved the shepherd well,
Who gave so fair a flock as Israel.
Would David have you thought his darling son?
What means he then, to alienate<sup>9</sup> the crown?
The name of godly he may blush to bear:
435 'Tis after God's own heart<sup>1</sup> to cheat his heir.
He to his brother gives supreme command;
To you a legacy of barren land,<sup>2</sup>
Perhaps the old harp, on which he thrums his lays,
Or some dull Hebrew ballad in your praise.
440 Then the next heir, a prince severe and wise,
Already looks on you with jealous eyes;

Sees through the thin disguises of your arts,
And marks your progress in the people's hearts.
Though now his mighty soul its grief contains,
445 He meditates revenge who least complains;
And, like a lion, slumbering in the way,
Or sleep dissembling, while he waits his prey,
His fearless foes within his distance draws,
Constrains his roaring, and contracts his paws;
450 Till at the last, his time for fury found,
He shoots with sudden vengeance from the ground;
The prostrate vulgar<sup>o</sup> passes o'er and spares,
But with a lordly rage his hunters tears.
Your case no tame expedients will afford:
455 Resolve on death, or conquest by the sword,
Which for no less a stake than life you draw;
And self-defense is nature's eldest law.
Leave the warm people no considering time;
For then rebellion may be thought a crime.
460 Prevail yourself of what occasion gives,
But try your title while your father lives;
And that your arms may have a fair pretense,<sup>o</sup>
Proclaim you take them in the king's defense;
Whose sacred life each minute would expose
465 To plots, from seeming friends, and secret foes.
And who can sound the depth of David's soul?
Perhaps his fear his kindness may control.
He fears his brother, though he loves his son,
For plighted vows too late to be undone.
470 If so, by force he wishes to be gained,
Like women's lechery, to seem constrained.<sup>o</sup>
Doubt not; but when he most affects the frown,
Commit a pleasing rape upon the crown.
Secure his person to secure your cause:
475 They who possess the prince, possess the laws."
He said, and this advice above the rest
With Absalom's mild nature suited best:

Unblamed of life (ambition set aside),
Not stained with cruelty, nor puffed with pride,
480 How happy had he been, if destiny
Had higher placed his birth, or not so high!
His kingly virtues might have claimed a throne,
And blest all other countries but his own.
But charming greatness since so few refuse,
485 'Tis juster to lament him than accuse.
Strong were his hopes a rival to remove,
With blandishments to gain the public love;
To head the faction while their zeal was hot,
And popularly prosecute the Plot.
490 To further this, Achitophel unites
The malcontents of all the Israelites;
Whose differing parties he could wisely join,
For several ends, to serve the same design:
The best (and of the princes some were such),
495 Who thought the power of monarchy too much;
Mistaken men, and patriots in their hearts;
Not wicked, but seduced by impious arts.
By these the springs of property were bent,
And wound so high, they cracked the government.
500 The next for interest sought to embroil the state,
To sell their duty at a dearer rate;
And make their Jewish markets of the throne,
Pretending public good, to serve their own.
Others thought kings an useless heavy load,
505 Who cost too much, and did too little good.
These were for laying honest David by,
On principles of pure good husbandry.<sup>o</sup>
With them joined all the haranguers of the throng,
That thought to get preferment by the tongue.
510 Who follow next, a double danger bring,
Not only hating David, but the king:
The Solymaeen rout,<sup>3</sup> well-versed of old

In godly faction, and in treason bold;
Cowering and quaking at a conqueror's sword,
515 But lofty to a lawful prince restored;
Saw with disdain an ethnic<sup>4</sup> plot begun,
And scorned by Jebusites to be outdone.
Hot Levites<sup>5</sup> headed these; who, pulled before
From the ark, which in the Judges' days they bore,
520 Resumed their cant, and with a zealous cry
Pursued their old beloved theocracy:
Where Sanhedrin and priest enslaved the nation,
And justified their spoils by inspiration:
For who so fit for reign as Aaron's race,<sup>6</sup>
525 If once dominion they could found in grace?
These led the pack; though not of surest scent,
Yet deepest-mouthed<sup>7</sup> against the government.
A numerous host of dreaming saints<sup>8</sup> succeed,
Of the true old enthusiastic breed:
530 'Gainst form and order they their power employ,
Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.
But far more numerous was the herd of such,
Who think too little, and who talk too much.
These out of mere instinct, they knew not why,
535 Adored their fathers' God and property;
And, by the same blind benefit of fate,
The Devil and the Jebusite did hate:
Born to be saved, even in their own despite,
Because they could not help believing right.
540 Such were the tools; but a whole Hydra more
Remains, of sprouting heads too long to score.<sup>9</sup>
Some of their chiefs were princes of the land:
In the first rank of these did Zimri<sup>9</sup> stand;
A man so various, that he seemed to be 545 Not one, but all mankind's epitome:
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong;
Was everything by starts, and nothing long;

But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chymist,<sup>o</sup> fiddler, statesman, and buffoon:
550 Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking,
Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
Blest madman, who could every hour employ,
With something new to wish, or to enjoy!
Railing<sup>o</sup> and praising were his usual themes;
555 And both (to show his judgment) in extremes:
So over-violent, or over-civil,
That every man, with him, was God or Devil.
In squandering wealth was his peculiar art:
Nothing went unrewarded but desert.
560 Beggared by fools, whom still<sup>o</sup> he found<sup>o</sup> too late,
He had his jest, and they had his estate.
He laughed himself from court; then sought relief
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief;
For, spite of him, the weight of business fell
565 On Absalom and wise Achitophel:
Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left.
Titles and names 'twere tedious to rehearse
Of lords, below the dignity of verse.
570 Wits, warriors, Commonwealth's men, were the best;
Kind husbands, and mere nobles, all the rest.
And therefore, in the name of dullness, be
The well-hung Balaam and cold Caleb,<sup>1</sup> free;
And canting Nadab<sup>2</sup> let oblivion damn,
575 Who made new porridge for the paschal lamb.<sup>3</sup>
Let friendship's holy band some names assure;
Some their own worth, and some let scorn secure.
Nor shall the rascal rabble here have place,
Whom kings no titles gave, and God no grace:
580 Not bull-faced Jonas,<sup>4</sup> who could statutes draw
To mean rebellion, and make treason law.
But he, though bad, is followed by a worse,

The wretch who heaven's anointed dared to curse:
 Shimei,<sup>5</sup> whose youth did early promise bring 585 Of zeal to God and hatred to his king,
 Did wisely from expensive sins refrain,
 And never broke the Sabbath, but for gain;
 Nor ever was he known an oath to vent,
 Or curse, unless against the government.
 590 Thus heaping wealth, by the most ready way
 Among the Jews, which was to cheat and pray,
 The city, to reward his pious hate
 Against his master, chose him magistrate.
 His hand a vane<sup>o</sup> of justice did uphold;
 595 His neck was loaded with a chain of gold.
 During his office, treason was no crime;
 The sons of Belial<sup>6</sup> had a glorious time;
 For Shimei, though not prodigal of pelf,<sup>o</sup>
 Yet loved his wicked neighbor as himself.
 600 When two or three were gathered to declaim
 Against the monarch of Jerusalem,
 Shimei was always in the midst of them;
 And if they cursed the king when he was by,
 Would rather curse than break good company.
 605 If any durst his factious friends accuse,
 He packed a jury of dissenting Jews;
 Whose fellow-feeling in the godly cause
 Would free the suffering saint from human laws.
 For laws are only made to punish those 610 Who serve the king, and to protect his foes.
 If any leisure time he had from power
 (Because 'tis sin to misemploy an hour),
 His business was, by writing, to persuade
 That kings were useless, and a clog to trade;
 615 And, that his noble style he might refine,
 No Rechabite<sup>7</sup> more shunned the fumes of wine.
 Chaste were his cellars, and his shrival board<sup>8</sup>

The grossness of a city feast abhorred:
His cooks, with long disuse, their trade forgot;
620 Cool was his kitchen, though his brains were hot,
Such frugal virtue malice may accuse,
But sure 'twas necessary to the Jews:
For towns once burnt<sup>9</sup> such magistrates require
As dare not tempt God's providence by fire.
625 With spiritual food he fed his servants well,
But free from flesh that made the Jews rebel;
And Moses' laws he held in more account,
For forty days of fasting in the mount.<sup>1</sup>
To speak the rest, who better are forgot,
630 Would tire a well-breathed witness of the Plot.
Yet, Corah,<sup>2</sup> thou shalt from oblivion pass:
Erect thyself, thou monumental brass,
High as the serpent of thy metal made,<sup>3</sup>
While nations stand secure beneath thy shade.
635 What though his birth were base, yet comets rise
From earthy vapors, ere they shine in skies.
Prodigious actions may as well be done
By weaver's issue,<sup>4</sup> as by prince's son.
This arch-attestor for the public good
640 By that one deed ennobles all his blood.
Who ever asked the witnesses' high race
Whose oath with martyrdom did Stephen<sup>5</sup> grace?
Ours was a Levite, and as times went then,
His tribe were God Almighty's gentlemen.
645 Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud,
Sure signs he neither choleric<sup>o</sup> was nor proud:
His long chin proved his wit; his saintlike grace
A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.<sup>6</sup>
His memory, miraculously great,
650 Could plots, exceeding man's belief, repeat;
Which therefore cannot be accounted lies,
For human wit could never such devise.

Some future truths are mingled in his book;
But where the witness failed, the prophet spoke:
655 Some things like visionary flights appear;
The spirit caught him up, the Lord knows where,
And gave him his rabbinical degree,
Unknown to foreign university.<sup>7</sup>
His judgment yet his memory did excel;
660 Which pieced his wondrous evidence so well,
And suited to the temper of the times,
Then groaning under Jebusitic crimes.
Let Israel's foes suspect his heavenly call,
And rashly judge his writ apocryphal;<sup>8</sup>
665 Our laws for such affronts have forfeits made:
He takes his life, who takes away his trade.
Were I myself in witness Corah's place,
The wretch who did me such a dire disgrace
Should whet my memory, though once forgot,
670 To make him an appendix of my plot.
His zeal to heaven made him his prince despise,
And load his person with indignities;
But zeal peculiar privilege affords,
Indulging latitude to deeds and words;
675 And Corah might for Agag's<sup>9</sup> murder call,
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.<sup>1</sup>
What others in his evidence did join
(The best that could be had for love or coin),
In Corah's own predicament will fall;
680 For witness is a common name to all.
Surrounded thus with friends of every sort,
Deluded Absalom forsakes the court:
Impatient of high hopes, urged with renown,
And fired with near possession of a crown.
685 The admiring crowd are dazzled with surprise,
And on his goodly person feed their eyes:
His joy concealed, he sets himself to show,

On each side bowing popularly<sup>2</sup> low;
 His looks, his gestures, and his words he frames,
 690 And with familiar ease repeats their names.
 Thus formed by nature, furnished out with arts,
 He glides unfelt into their secret hearts.
 Then, with a kind compassionating look,
 And sighs, bespeaking pity ere he spoke,
 695 Few words he said; but easy those and fit,
 More slow than Hybla-drops,<sup>3</sup> and far more sweet.
 "I mourn, my countrymen, your lost estate;
 Though far unable to prevent your fate:
 Behold a banished man, for your dear cause
 700 Exposed a prey to arbitrary laws!
 Yet oh! that I alone could be undone,
 Cut off from empire, and no more a son!
 Now all your liberties a spoil are made;
 Egypt<sup>o</sup> and Tyrus<sup>o</sup> intercept your trade,
 705 And Jebusites your sacred rites invade.
 My father, whom with reverence yet I name,
 Charmed into ease, is careless of his fame;
 And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold,
 Is grown in Bathsheba's<sup>4</sup> embraces old;
 710 Exalts his enemies, his friends destroys;
 And all his power against himself employs.
 He gives, and let him give, my right away;
 But why should he his own, and yours betray?
 He only, he can make the nation bleed,
 715 And he alone from my revenge is freed.
 Take then my tears (with that he wiped his eyes),
 'Tis all the aid my present power supplies:
 No court-informer can these arms accuse;
 These arms may sons against their fathers use:
 720 And 'tis my wish, the next successor's reign
 May make no other Israelite complain."
 Youth, beauty, graceful action seldom fail;

But common interest always will prevail;
And pity never ceases to be shown
725 To him who makes the people's wrongs his own.
The crowd (that still believe their kings oppress)
With lifted hands their young Messiah bless:
Who now begins his progress to ordain
With chariots, horsemen, and a numerous train;
730 From east to west his glories he displays,<sup>5</sup>
And, like the sun, the promised land surveys.
Fame runs before him as the morning star,
And shouts of joy salute him from afar:
Each house receives him as a guardian god,
735 And consecrates the place of his abode:
But hospitable treats did most commend
Wise Issachar,<sup>6</sup> his wealthy western friend.
This moving court, that caught the people's eyes,
And seemed but pomp, did other ends disguise:
740 Achitophel had formed it, with intent
To sound the depths, and fathom, where it went,
The people's hearts; distinguish friends from foes,
And try their strength, before they came to blows.
Yet all was colored with a smooth pretense
745 Of specious love, and duty to their prince.
Religion, and redress of grievances,
Two names that always cheat and always please,
Are often urged; and good King David's life
Endangered by a brother and a wife.<sup>7</sup>
750 Thus, in a pageant show, a plot is made,
And peace itself is war in masquerade.
O foolish Israel! never warned by ill,
Still the same bait, and circumvented still!
Did ever men forsake their present ease,
755 In midst of health imagine a disease;
Take pains contingent mischiefs to foresee,
Make heirs for monarchs, and for God decree?

What shall we think! Can people give away
Both for themselves and sons, their native sway?
760 Then they are left defenseless to the sword
Of each unbounded, arbitrary lord:
And laws are vain, by which we right enjoy,
If kings unquestioned can those laws destroy.
Yet if the crowd be judge of fit and just,
765 And kings are only officers in trust,
Then this resuming covenant was declared
When kings were made, or is forever barred.
If those who gave the scepter could not tie
By their own deed their own posterity,
770 How then could Adam bind his future race?
How could his forfeit on mankind take place?
Or how could heavenly justice damn us all,
Who ne'er consented to our father's fall?
Then kings are slaves to those whom they 775       command,
And tenants to their people's pleasure stand.
Add, that the power for property allowed
Is mischievously seated in the crowd;
For who can be secure of private right,
If sovereign sway may be dissolved by might?
780 Nor is the people's judgment always true:
The most may err as grossly as the few;
And faultless kings run down, by common cry,
For vice, oppression, and for tyranny.
What standard is there in a fickle rout,
785 Which, flowing to the mark,<sup>o</sup> runs faster out?
Nor only crowds, but Sanhedrins may be Infected with this public lunacy,<sup>8</sup>
And share the madness of rebellious times,
To murder monarchs for imagined crimes.<sup>9</sup>
790 If they may give and take whene'er they please,
Not kings alone (the Godhead's images),

But government itself at length must fall
To nature's state, where all have right to all.
Yet, grant our lords the people kings can make,
795 What prudent men a settled throne would shake?
For whatsoe'er their sufferings were before,
That change they covet makes them suffer more.
All other errors but disturb a state,
But innovation is the blow of fate.
800 If ancient fabrics nod, and threat to fall,
To patch the flaws, and buttress up the wall,
Thus far 'tis duty; but here fix the mark;
For all beyond it is to touch our ark.<sup>1</sup>
To change foundations, cast the frame anew,
805 Is work for rebels, who base ends pursue,
At once divine and human laws control,
And mend the parts by ruin of the whole.
The tampering world is subject to this curse,
To physic their disease into a worse.
810 Now what relief can righteous David bring?
How fatal 'tis to be too good a king!
Friends he has few, so high the madness grows:
Who dare be such, must be the people's foes:
Yet some there were, even in the worst of days;
815 Some let me name, and naming is to praise.
In this short file Barzillai<sup>2</sup> first appears;
Barzillai, crowned with honor and with years:
Long since, the rising rebels he withstood
In regions waste, beyond the Jordan's flood:
820 Unfortunately brave to buoy the State;
But sinking underneath his master's fate:
In exile with his godlike prince he mourned;
For him he suffered, and with him returned.
The court he practiced, not the courtier's art:
825 Large was his wealth, but larger was his heart:
Which well the noblest objects knew to choose,

The fighting warrior, and recording Muse.
 His bed could once a fruitful issue boast;
 Now more than half a father's name is lost.
 830 His eldest hope, <sup>3</sup> with every grace adorned,
 By me (so Heaven will have it) always mourned,
 And always honored, snatched in manhood's prime
 By unequal fates, and Providence's crime:
 835 Yet not before the goal of honor won,
 All parts fulfilled of subject and of son;
 Swift was the race, but short the time to run. }
 O narrow circle, but of power divine,
 Scanted in space, but perfect in thy line!
 By sea, by land, thy matchless worth was known,
 840 Arms thy delight, and war was all thy own:
 Thy force, infused, the fainting Tyrians<sup>o</sup> propped;
 And haughty Pharaoh found his fortune stopped.
 Oh ancient honor! Oh unconquered hand,
 Whom foes unpunished never could withstand!
 845 But Israel was unworthy of thy name:
 Short is the date of all immoderate fame.
 It looks as Heaven our ruin had designed,
 And durst not trust thy fortune and thy mind.
 Now, free from earth, thy disencumbered soul
 850 Mounts up, and leaves behind the clouds and starry pole:
 From thence thy kindred legions mayst thou bring,
 To aid the guardian angel of thy king.
 Here stop my Muse, here cease thy painful flight;
 No pinions can pursue immortal height:
 855 Tell good Barzillai thou canst sing no more,
 And tell thy soul she should have fled before:
 Or fled she with his life, and left this verse
 To hang on her departed patron's hearse?
 Now take thy steepy flight from heaven, and see 860

If thou canst find on earth another he:
Another he would be too hard to find;
See then whom thou canst see not far behind.
Zadoc<sup>4</sup> the priest, whom, shunning power and place,
His lowly mind advanced to David's grace:
865 With him the Sagan<sup>5</sup> of Jerusalem,
Of hospitable soul, and noble stem;
Him of the western dome,<sup>6</sup> whose weighty sense
Flows in fit words and heavenly eloquence.
The prophets' sons,<sup>7</sup> by such example led,
870 To learning and to loyalty were bred:
For colleges on bounteous kinds depend,
And never rebel was to arts a friend.
To these succeed the pillars of the laws,
Who best could plead, and best can judge a cause.
875 Next them a train of loyal peers ascend;
Sharp-judging Adriel,<sup>8</sup> the Muses' friend,
Himself a Muse—in Sanhedrin's debate
True to his prince, but not a slave of state:
Whom David's love with honors did adorn,
880 That from his disobedient son were torn.
Jotham<sup>9</sup> of piercing wit, and pregnant thought,
Indued by nature, and by learning taught
To move assemblies, who but only tried
The worse a while, then chose the better side;
885 Nor chose alone, but turned the balance too;
So much the weight of one brave man can do.
Hushar,<sup>1</sup> the friend of David in distress,
In public storms, of manly steadfastness:
By foreign treaties he informed his youth,
890 And joined experience to his native truth.
His frugal care supplied the wanting throne,
Frugal for that, but bounteous of his own:
'Tis easy conduct when exchequers flow,
But hard the task to manage well the low;

895 For sovereign power is too depressed or high,
 When kings are forced to sell, or crowds to buy.
 Indulge one labor more, my weary Muse,
 For Amiel:<sup>2</sup> who can Amiel's praise refuse?
 Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet
 900 In his own worth, and without title great:
 The Sanhedrin long time as chief he ruled,
 Their reason guided, and their passion cooled:
 So dexterous was he in the crown's defense,
 So formed to speak a loyal nation's sense,
 905 That, as their band was Israel's tribes in small,
 So fit was he to represent them all.
 Now rasher charioteers the seat ascend,
 Whose loose careers his steady skill commend:<sup>o</sup>
 They like the unequal ruler of the day,
 910 Misguide the seasons, and mistake the way;
 While he withdrawn at their mad labor smiles,
 And safe enjoys the sabbath of his toils.
 These were the chief, a small but faithful band
 Of worthies, in the breach who dared to 915 stand, }
 And tempt the united fury of the land. }
 With grief they viewed such powerful engines bent,
 To batter down the lawful government:
 A numerous faction, with pretended frights,
 In Sanhedrins to plume<sup>o</sup> the regal rights;
 920 The true successor from the court removed:<sup>3</sup>
 The Plot, by hireling witnesses, improved.
 These ills they saw, and, as their duty bound,
 They showed the king the danger of the wound:
 That no concessions from the throne would please,
 925 But lenitives<sup>o</sup> fomented the disease;
 That Absalom, ambitious of the crown,
 Was made the lure to draw the people down;

That false Achitophel's pernicious hate
Had turned the Plot to ruin Church and State:
930 The council violent, the rabble worse;
That Shimei taught Jerusalem to curse.
With all these loads of injuries oppressed,
And long revolving, in his careful breast,
The event of things, at last, his patience tired,
935 Thus from his royal throne, by Heaven inspired,
The godlike David spoke: with awful fear
His train their Maker in their master hear.
"Thus long have I, by native mercy swayed,
My wrongs dissembled, my revenge delayed:
940 So willing to forgive the offending age,
So much the father did the king assuage.
But now so far my clemency they slight,
The offenders question my forgiving right.
That one was made for many, they contend;
945 But 'tis to rule; for that's a monarch's end.
They call my tenderness of blood, my fear;
Though manly tempers can the longest bear.
Yet, since they will divert my native course,
'Tis time to show I am not good by force.
950 Those heaped affronts that haughty subjects bring,
Are burdens for a camel, not a king:
Kings are the public pillars of the State,
Born to sustain and prop the nation's weight:
If my young Samson will pretend a call
955 To shake the column, let him share the fall:<sup>4</sup>
But, oh, that yet he would repent and live!
How easy 'tis for parents to forgive!
With how few tears a pardon might be won
From nature, pleading for a darling son!
960 Poor pitied youth, by my paternal care
Raised up to all the height his frame could bear:
Had God ordained his fate for empire born,

He would have given his soul another turn:
Gulled<sup>o</sup> with a patriot's name, whose modern sense
965 Is one that would by law supplant his prince:
The people's brave,<sup>o</sup> the politician's tool;
Never was patriot yet, but was a fool.
Whence comes it that religion and the laws
Should more be Absalom's than David's cause?
970 His old instructor,<sup>5</sup> ere he lost his place,
Was never thought indued with so much grace.
Good heavens, how faction can a patriot paint!
My rebel ever proves my people's saint:
Would they impose an heir upon the throne?
975 Let Sanhedrins be taught to give their own.<sup>o</sup>
A king's at least a part of government,
And mine as requisite as their consent;
Without my leave a future king to choose,
Infers a right the present to depose:
980 True, they petition me to approve their choice;
But Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice.<sup>6</sup>
My pious subjects for my safety pray,
Which to secure, they take my power away.
From plots and treasons Heaven preserve my years,
985 But save me most from my petitioners.
Unsatiate as the barren womb or grave;
God cannot grant so much as they can crave.
What then is left but with a jealous eye
To guard the small remains of royalty?
990 The law shall still direct my peaceful sway,
And the same law teach rebels to obey:
Votes shall no more established power control—
Such votes as make a part exceed the whole:
No groundless clamors shall my friends remove,
995 Nor crowds have power to punish ere they prove:
For gods and godlike kings, their care express,
Still to defend their servants in distress.

1000 O that my power to saving were confined:
 Why am I forced, like Heaven, against my mind,
 To make examples of another kind?
 Must I at length the sword of justice draw?
 O curst effects of necessary law!
 How ill my fear they by my mercy scan!<sup>o</sup>
 Beware the fury of a patient man.
 1005 Law they require, let Law then show her face;
 They could not be content to look on Grace,
 Her hinder parts, but with a daring eye
 To tempt the terror of her front and die.<sup>7</sup>
 By their own arts, 'tis righteously decreed,
 1010 Those dire artificers of death shall bleed.
 Against themselves their witnesses will swear,
 Till viper-like their mother Plot they tear:
 And suck for nutriment that bloody gore,
 Which was their principle of life before.
 1015 Their Belial with their Belzebub<sup>8</sup> will fight;
 Thus on my foes, my foes shall do me right:
 Nor doubt the event; for factious crowds engage,
 In their first onset, all their brutal rage.
 Then let 'em take an unresisted course,
 1020 Retire and traverse,<sup>o</sup> and delude their force:
 But when they stand all breathless, urge the fight,
 And rise upon 'em with redoubled might:
 For lawful power is still superior found,
 When long driven back, at length it stands the 1025 ground."
 He said. The Almighty, nodding, gave consent;
 And peals of thunder shook the firmament.
 Henceforth a series of new time began,
 The mighty years in long procession ran:
 Once more the godlike David was restored,
 1030 And willing nations knew their lawful lord.

- Note 4:
Anthony Ashley Cooper, first Earl of Shaftesbury (1621–1683). He had served in the parliamentary army and been a member of Cromwell’s council of state. He later helped bring back Charles and, in 1670, was made a member of the notorious Cabal Ministry, which formed an alliance with Louis XIV in which England betrayed her ally, Holland, and joined France in war against that country. In 1672 he became lord chancellor, but with the dissolution of the cabal in 1673, he was removed from office. Lines 146–49 apply perfectly to him.
Return to reference 4

That is, Presbyterian clergymen. The tribe of Levi, assigned to duties in the tabernacle, carried the Ark of the Covenant during the forty-year sojourn in the wilderness (Numbers 4). Under the Commonwealth ("in the Judges' days") Presbyterianism became the state religion, and its clergy, therefore, "bore the ark." The Act of Uniformity (1662) forced the Presbyterian clergy out of their livings: in short, before the Popish Plot, they had been "pulled from the ark." They are represented here as joining the Whigs in the hope of restoring the Commonwealth, "their old beloved theocracy."

- Note 8: Term used by certain Dissenters for those elected to salvation. The extreme fanaticism of the "saints" and their claims to inspiration are characterized as a form of religious madness ("enthusiastic," line 530).Return to reference 8

- Note 9:

George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham (1628–1687), wealthy, brilliant, dissolute, and unstable. He had been an influential member of the cabal, but after 1673 had joined Shaftesbury in opposition to the court party. This is the least political of the satirical portraits in the poem. Buckingham had been the chief author of The Rehearsal (1671), the play that satirized heroic tragedy and ridiculed Dryden in the character of Mr. Bayes. Politics gave Dryden an opportunity to retaliate. He comments on this portrait in his "A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire." Dryden had two biblical Zimris in mind: the Zimri destroyed for his lustfulness and blasphemy (Numbers 25) and the conspirator and regicide of 1 Kings 16:8–20 and 2 Kings 9:31.

Return to reference 9

- Note 1: See Numbers 13–14. "Well-hung": fluent of speech or sexually potent or both. For Balaam, see Numbers 22–24. "Cold": contrasts with the second meaning of well-hung.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: See Leviticus 10:1–2. "Canting": points to a Nonconformist, as does "new porridge," for Dissenters referred to the Book of Common Prayer contemptuously as "porridge," a hodgepodge, unsubstantial stuff.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The lamb slain during Passover; here, Christ. The identities of Balaam, Caleb, and Nadab have not been certainly established, although various Whig nobles have been suggested.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Sir William Jones, attorney general, had been largely responsible for the passage of the first Exclusion Bill by the House of Commons. He prosecuted the accused in the Popish Plot.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
He cursed and stoned David when he fled into the wilderness during Absalom's revolt (2 Samuel 16:5–14). His name is used here for one of the two sheriffs of London: Slingsby Bethel, a Whig, former republican, and virulent enemy of Charles. He packed juries with Whigs and so secured the acquittal of enemies of the court, among them Shaftesbury himself.

Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Sons of wickedness (see Milton, Paradise Lost 1.490–505). Dryden probably intended a pun on Balliol, the Oxford college in which leading Whigs stayed during the brief and fateful meeting of Parliament at Oxford in 1681.Return to reference 6

- Note 8: Not inspired and hence excluded from Holy Writ.Return to reference 8
- Note 9:
Agag is probably one of the five Catholic peers executed for the Popish Plot in 1680, most likely Lord Stafford, against whom Oates fabricated testimony. He is almost certainly not, as is usually suggested, Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey (see headnote, p. 34).
Return to reference 9

James Butler, Duke of Ormond (1610–1688), who was famous for his loyalty to the Stuart cause. He fought for Charles I in Ireland, and when that cause was hopeless, he joined Charles II in his exile abroad. He spent a large fortune on behalf of the king and continued to serve him loyally after the Restoration. Six of his ten children were dead (see line 830). See 2 Samuel 19:31–39.

Mac Flecknoe The target of this superb satire, which is cast in the form of a mock-heroic episode, is Thomas Shadwell (1640–1692), the playwright, with whom Dryden had been on good terms for a number of years, certainly as late as March 1678. Shadwell considered himself the successor of Ben Jonson and the champion of the type of comedy that Jonson had written, the “comedy of humors,” in which each character is presented under the domination of a single psychological trait or eccentricity, his humor. His plays are not without merit, but they are often clumsy and prolix and certainly much inferior to Jonson’s. For many years he had conducted a public argument with Dryden on the merits of Jonson’s comedies, which he thought Dryden undervalued. Exactly what moved Dryden to attack him is a matter of conjecture: he may simply have grown progressively bored and irritated by Shadwell and his tedious argument. The poem seems to have been written in late 1678 or 1679 and to have circulated only in manuscript until it was printed in 1682 in a pirated edition by an obscure publisher. By that time, the two playwrights were alienated by politics as well as by literary quarrels. Shadwell was a violent Whig and the reputed author of a sharp attack on Dryden as the Tory author of Absalom and Achitophel and “The Medal.” It was probably for this reason that the printer added the subtitle referring to Shadwell’s Whiggism in the phrase “true-blue-Protestant poet.” Political passions were running high, and sales would be helped if the poem seemed to refer to the events of the day.

Dryden exposes Shadwell to ridicule by using the devices of mock epic, which treats the low, mean, or absurd in the grand language, lofty style, and solemn tone of epic poetry. The obvious disparity between subject and style makes the satiric point. In 1678, a prolific, untalented writer, Richard Flecknoe, died. Dryden conceived the idea of presenting Shadwell (the self-proclaimed heir of Ben Jonson, the laureate) as the son and successor of Flecknoe (an irony also because Flecknoe was a Catholic priest)—hence Mac (son of) Flecknoe—from whom he inherits the throne of dullness. Flecknoe in the triple role of king, priest, and poet hails his successor, pronounces a panegyric on his perfect fitness for the throne, anoints and crowns him, foretells his glorious reign, and as he sinks (leaden dullness cannot soar), leaves his mantle to fall symbolically on Shadwell's shoulders. The poem abounds in literary allusions—to Roman legend and history and to the Aeneid, to Abraham Cowley's fragmentary epic The Davideis (1656), to Paradise Lost, and to Shadwell's own plays. Biblical allusions add an unexpected dimension of incongruous dignity to the low scene. The coronation takes place in the City, to the plaudits of the citizens, who are fit to admire only what is dull.

Or a Satire upon the True-Blue-Protestant Poet, T. S.

All human things are subject to decay,
And when fate summons, monarchs must obey.
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus,<sup>1</sup> young
Was called to empire, and had governed long;
In prose and verse, was owned, without dispute,
5 Through all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.
This aged prince, now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,
Worn out with business, did at length debate
To settle the succession of the state;
10 And, pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit,
Cried: "'Tis resolved; for nature pleads that he Should only rule, who most resembles me.
Sh—<sup>2</sup> alone my perfect image bears,
15 Mature in dullness from his tender years:
Sh— alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretense,
But Sh— never deviates into sense.
20 Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through, and make a lucid interval;
But Sh—'s genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
Besides, his goodly fabric<sup>3</sup> fills the eye,
25 And seems designed for thoughtless majesty:
Thoughtless as monarch oaks that shade the plain,
And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.

Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee,<sup>4</sup>
 Thou last great prophet of tautology.<sup>5</sup>
 30 Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
 Was sent before but to prepare thy way;
 And, coarsely clad in Norwich drugget,<sup>o</sup> came
 To teach the nations in thy greater name.<sup>6</sup>
 My warbling lute, the lute I whilom<sup>o</sup> strung,
 35 When to King John of Portugal<sup>7</sup> I sung,
 Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
 When thou on silver Thames didst cut thy way,
 With well-timed oars before the royal barge,
 Swelled with the pride of thy celestial charge;
 40 And big with hymn, commander of a host,
 The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets tossed.<sup>8</sup>
 Methinks I see the new Arion<sup>9</sup> sail,
 The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.
 At thy well-sharpened thumb from shore to shore
 45 The treble squeaks for fear, the basses roar;
 Echoes from Pissing Alley<sup>1</sup> Sh—— call,
 And Sh—— they resound from Aston Hall.
 About thy boat the little fishes throng,
 As at the morning toast<sup>o</sup> that floats along.
 50 Sometimes, as prince of thy harmonious band,
 Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing hand,
 St. André's<sup>2</sup> feet ne'er kept more equal time,
 Not ev'n the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme;
 Though they in number as in sense excel:
 55 So just, so like tautology, they fell,
 That, pale with envy, Singleton<sup>3</sup> forswore
 The lute and sword, which he in triumph bore, }
 And vowed he ne'er would act Villerius<sup>4</sup>
 more."
 60 Here stopped the good old sire, and wept for joy

In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.
All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
That for anointed dullness<sup>5</sup> he was made.

65       Close to the walls which fair Augusta<sup>o</sup> bind
(The fair Augusta much to fears inclined),<sup>6</sup>
An ancient fabric,<sup>o</sup> raised to inform the sight,
There stood of yore, and Barbican it high:<sup>o</sup>
A watchtower once; but now, so fate ordains,
Of all the pile an empty name remains.
70       From its old ruins brothel houses rise,
Scenes of lewd loves, and of polluted joys,
Where their vast courts the mother-strumpets keep,
And, undisturbed by watch, in silence sleep.
Near these a Nursery<sup>7</sup> erects its head,
Where queens are formed, and future heroes bred;
75       Where unfledged actors learn to laugh and cry,
Where infant punks<sup>o</sup> their tender voices try,
And little Maximins<sup>8</sup> the gods defy.       }
Great Fletcher<sup>9</sup> never treads in buskins here,       }
80       Nor greater Jonson dares in socks<sup>1</sup> appear;
But gentle Simkin<sup>2</sup> just reception finds
Amidst this monument of vanished minds:
Pure clinches<sup>o</sup> the suburban Muse affords,
And Panton<sup>3</sup> waging harmless war with words.
Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,
85       Ambitiously design'd his Sh—'s throne;
For ancient Dekker<sup>4</sup> prophesied long since,       }
That in this pile would reign a mighty prince,
Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense;       }
90       To whom true dullness should some Psyches
owe,
But worlds of Misers from his pen should flow;
Humorists and Hypocrites<sup>5</sup> it should produce,
Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce.<sup>6</sup>

Now Empress Fame had published the renown
Of Sh——'s coronation through the town.
95 Roused by report of Fame, the nations meet,
From near Bunhill, and distant Watling Street.<sup>7</sup>
No Persian carpets spread the imperial way,
But scattered limbs of mangled poets lay;
From dusty shops neglected authors come,
100 Martyrs of pies, and relics of the bum.<sup>8</sup>
Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogilby<sup>9</sup> there lay,
But loads of Sh—— almost choked the way.
Bilked stationers for yeomen stood prepared,
And Herringman was captain of the guard.<sup>1</sup>
105 The hoary prince in majesty appeared,
High on a throne of his own labors reared.
At his right hand our young Ascanius sate,
Rome's other hope, and pillar of the state.
His brows thick fogs, instead of glories, grace,
110 And lambent dullness played around his face.<sup>2</sup>
As Hannibal did to the altars come,
Sworn by his sire a mortal foe to Rome,<sup>3</sup>
So Sh—— swore, nor should his vow be vain,
That he till death true dullness would maintain;
115 And, in his father's right, and realm's defense,
Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.
The king himself the sacred unction<sup>4</sup> made,
As king by office, and as priest by trade.
In his sinister<sup>o</sup> hand, instead of ball,
120 He placed a mighty mug of potent ale;
Love's Kingdom to his right he did convey,
At once his scepter, and his rule of sway;
Whose righteous lore the prince had practiced young,
And from whose loins recorded Psyche sprung.
125 His temples, last, with poppies were o'erspread,
That nodding seemed to consecrate his head.<sup>5</sup>

Just at that point of time, if fame not lie,
 On his left hand twelve reverend owls did fly.<sup>6</sup>
 So Romulus, 'tis sung, by Tiber's brook,
 130 Presage of sway from twice six vultures took.
 The admiring throng loud acclamations make,
 And omens of his future empire take.
 The sire then shook the honors<sup>7</sup> of his head,
 And from his brows damps of oblivion shed
 135 Full on the filial dullness: long he stood,
 Repelling from his breast the raging god;
 At length burst out in this prophetic mood: }
     "Heavens bless my son, from Ireland let him reign
 To far Barbadoes on the western main;<sup>8</sup>
 140 Of his dominion may no end be known,
 And greater than his father's be his throne;
 Beyond Love's Kingdom let him stretch his pen!"
 He paused, and all the people cried, "Amen."
 Then thus continued he: "My son, advance
 145 Still in new impudence, new ignorance.
 Success let others teach, learn thou from me
 Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.
 Let Virtuosos in five years be writ;
 Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit.
 150 Let gentle George<sup>9</sup> in triumph tread the stage,
 Make Dorimant betray, and Loveit rage;
 Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the pit,
 And in their folly show the writer's wit.
 Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defense,
 155 And justify their author's want of sense.
 Let 'em be all by thy own model made
 Of dullness, and desire no foreign aid;
 That they to future ages may be known,
 Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own.
 160 Nay, let thy men of wit too be the same,

All full of thee, and differing but in name.
But let no alien S—dl—y<sup>1</sup> interpose,
To lard with wit<sup>2</sup> thy hungry Epsom prose.
And when false flowers of rhetoric thou wouldst cull,
165 Trust nature, do not labor to be dull;
But write thy best, and top; and, in each line,
Sir Formal's<sup>3</sup> oratory will be thine:
Sir Formal, though unsought, attends thy quill,
And does thy northern dedications<sup>4</sup> fill.
170 Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to fame,
By arrogating Jonson's hostile name.
Let father Flecknoe fire thy mind with praise,
And uncle Ogilby thy envy raise.
Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no part:
175 What share have we in nature, or in art?
Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,
And rail at arts he did not understand?
Where made he love in Prince Nicander's vein,<sup>5</sup>
Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain?
180 Where sold he bargains, 'whip-stitch,<sup>6</sup> kiss my arse,'
Promised a play and dwindled to a farce?<sup>7</sup>
When did his Muse from Fletcher scenes purloin,
As thou whole Eth'rege dost transfuse to thine?
But so transfused, as oil on water's flow,
185 His always floats above, thine sinks below.
This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,
New humors to invent for each new play:
This is that boasted bias<sup>8</sup> of thy mind,
By which one way, to dullness, 'tis inclined;
190 Which makes thy writings lean on one side still,
And, in all changes, that way bends thy will.
Nor let thy mountain-belly make pretense
Of likeness; thine's a tympany<sup>9</sup> of sense.
A tun<sup>o</sup> of man in thy large bulk is writ,
195 But sure thou'rt but a kilderkin<sup>o</sup> of wit.

Like mine, thy gentle numbers feebly creep;
 Thy tragic Muse gives smiles, thy comic sleep.
 With whate'er gall thou sett'st thyself to write,
 Thy inoffensive satires never bite.
 200 In thy felonious heart though venom lies,
 It does but touch thy Irish pen,<sup>1</sup> and dies.
 Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
 In keen iambics,<sup>2</sup> but mild anagram.
 205 Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
 Some peaceful province in acrostic<sup>2</sup> land.
 There thou may'st wings display and altars raise,<sup>3</sup>
 And torture one poor word ten thousand ways.
 Or, if thou wouldst thy different talent suit,
 Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute."
 210 He said: but his last words were scarcely heard
 For Bruce and Longville had a trap prepared,
 And down they sent the yet declaiming
     bard.<sup>4</sup> }
 Sinking he left his drugget robe behind,
 Borne upwards by a subterranean wind.
 215 The mantle fell to the young prophet's part,<sup>5</sup>
 With double portion of his father's art.

ca. 1679

- Note 1: In 31 B.C.E. Octavian became the first Roman emperor, at the age of thirty-two. He assumed the title Augustus in 27 B.C.E. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Thomas Shadwell. The initial and second letter of the name followed by a dash give the appearance, but only the appearance, of protecting Dryden's victim by concealing his name. A common device in the satire of the period. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: His body. Shadwell was a corpulent man. Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Thomas Heywood (ca. 1570–1641) and James Shirley (1596–1666), playwrights popular before the closing of the theaters in 1642 but now out of fashion. They are introduced here as “types” (prefigurings) of Shadwell, in the sense that Solomon was regarded as an Old Testament prefiguring of Christ, the “last [final] great prophet.”Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Unnecessary repetition of meaning in different words.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The parallel between Flecknoe, as forerunner of Shadwell, and John the Baptist, as forerunner of Jesus, is made plain in lines 32–34 by the use of details and even words taken from Matthew 3:3–4 and John 1:23.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Flecknoe boasted of the patronage of the Portuguese king.Return to reference 7

- Note 6: Raymond and Bruce are characters in The Humorists and The Virtuoso, respectively.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Because Bunhill is about a quarter mile and Watling Street little more than a half mile from the site of the Nursery, where the coronation is held, Shadwell's fame is narrowly circumscribed. Moreover, his subjects live in the heart of the City, regarded by men of wit and fashion as the abode of bad taste and middle-class vulgarity.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Unsold books were used to line pie plates and as toilet paper.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: John Ogilby, a translator of Homer and Virgil, ridiculed by both Dryden and Pope as a bad poet.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: "Bilked stationers": cheated publishers, acting as "yeomen" of the guard, led by Henry Herringman, who until 1679 was the publisher of both Shadwell and Dryden.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Ascanius, or Iulus, was the son of Aeneas. Virgil referred to him as "spes altera Romae" ("Rome's other hope," Aeneid 12.168). As Troy fell, he was marked as favored by the

- gods when a flickering (“lambent”) flame played round his head (Aeneid 2.680–84).Return to reference 2

  - Note 4: The sacramental oil, used in the coronation.Return to reference 4
  - Note 5: During the coronation a British monarch holds two symbols of the throne: a globe (“ball”) representing the world in the left hand and a scepter in the right. Shadwell’s symbols of monarchy are a mug of ale, Flecknoe’s dreary play Love’s Kingdom, and a crown of poppies, which suggest heaviness, dullness, and drowsiness. The poppies also refer obliquely to Shadwell’s addiction to opium.Return to reference 5
  - Note 6: Birds of night. Appropriate substitutes for the twelve vultures whose flight confirmed to Romulus the destined site of Rome, of which he was founder and king.Return to reference 6
  - Note 7: Ornaments, hence locks.Return to reference 7
  - Note 8: Shadwell’s empire is vast but empty.Return to reference 8
  - Note 9: Sir George Etherege (ca. 1635–1691), a writer of brilliant comedies. In the next couplet Dryden names characters from his plays.Return to reference 9
  - Note 1: Sir Charles Sedley (1638–1701), wit, rake, poet, and playwright. Dryden hints that he contributed more than the prologue to Shadwell’s Epsom Wells.Return to reference 1
  - Note 2: This phrase recalls a sentence in Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy: “They lard their lean books with the fat of others’ works.”Return to reference 2
  - Note 3: Sir Formal Trifle, the ridiculous and vapid orator in The Virtuoso.Return to reference 3
  - Note 4: Shadwell frequently dedicated his works to the Duke of Newcastle and members of his family.Return to reference 4
  - Note 5: In Psyche.Return to reference 5
  - Note 6: A nonsense word frequently used by Sir Samuel Hearty in The Virtuoso. “Sold . . . bargains”: answered an innocent question with a coarse or indecent phrase, as in this line.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Low comedy that depends largely on situation rather than wit, consistently condemned by Dryden and other serious playwrights.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: In bowling, the spin given to the ball that causes it to swerve. Dryden closely parodies a passage in Shadwell's epilogue to The Humorists.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A swelling in some part of the body caused by flatulence.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Dryden accuses Flecknoe and his "son" of being Irish. Ireland suggested only poverty, superstition, and barbarity to 17th-century Londoners.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A poem in which the first letter of each line, read downward, makes up the name of the person or thing that is the subject of the poem. "Anagram": the transposition of letters in a word so as to make a new one.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: "Wings" and "altars" refer to poems in the shape of these objects, as in George Herbert's "Easter Wings" and "The Altar." Dryden is citing instances of triviality and overingenuity in literature.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In The Virtuoso, Bruce and Longville play this trick on Sir Formal Trifle while he makes a speech.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: When the prophet Elijah was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire borne on a whirlwind, his mantle fell on his successor, the younger prophet Elisha (2 Kings 2:8–14). Flecknoe, prophet of dullness, naturally cannot ascend, but must sink.Return to reference 5

A Song for St. Cecilia's Day<sup>1</sup>

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame began:
When Nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
And could not heave her head,
5 The tuneful voice was heard from high:
"Arise, ye more than dead."
Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,<sup>2</sup>
In order to their stations leap,
And Music's power obey.
10 From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason<sup>3</sup> closing full in man.

2

What passion cannot Music raise and quell!<sup>4</sup>
When Jubal struck the corded shell,<sup>5</sup>
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell
To worship that celestial sound.
20 Less than a god they thought there could not dwell
Within the hollow of that shell
That spoke so sweetly and so well.
What passion cannot Music raise and quell!

3

25       The trumpet's loud clangor
          Excites us to arms,
          With shrill notes of anger,
          And mortal alarms.
          The double double double beat
          Of the thundering drum
30       Cries: "Hark! the foes come;
          Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat."

4

          The soft complaining flute
          In dying notes discovers
          The woes of hopeless lovers,
35       Whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute.

5

          Sharp violins<sup>6</sup> proclaim
          Their jealous pangs, and desperation,
          Fury, frantic indignation,
40       Depth of pains, and height of passion,
          For the fair, disdainful dame.

6

          But O! what art can teach,
          What human voice can reach,
          The sacred organ's praise?
          Notes inspiring holy love,
45       Notes that wing their heavenly ways
          To mend the choirs above.

7

          Orpheus<sup>7</sup> could lead the savage race;
          And trees unrooted left their place,

50 Sequacious of<sup>o</sup> the lyre;
But bright Cecilia raised the wonder higher:
When to her organ vocal breath was given,
An angel heard, and straight appeared,<sup>8</sup>
Mistaking earth for heaven.

GRAND CHORUS

55 As from the power of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great Creator's praise<sup>9</sup>
To all the blest above;
So, when the last and dreadful hour
60 This crumbling pageant<sup>1</sup> shall devour,
The trumpet shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And Music shall untune the sky.<sup>2</sup>

Endnotes

1687

- Note 1:
St. Cecilia, a Roman lady, was an early Christian martyr. She has long been regarded as the patroness of music and the supposed inventor of the organ. Celebrations of her festival day (November 22) in England were usually devoted to music and the praise of music, and from about 1683 to 1703 the Musical Society in London annually commemorated it with a religious service and a public concert. This concert always included an ode written and set to music for the occasion, of which the two by Dryden ("A Song for St. Cecilia's Day," 1687, and "Alexander's Feast," 1697) are the most distinguished. G. B. Draghi, an Italian brought to England by Charles II, set this ode to music; but Handel's fine score, composed in 1739, has completely obscured the original setting. This is an irregular ode in the manner of Cowley. In stanzas 3–6, Dryden boldly attempted to suggest in the sounds of his words the characteristic tones of the instruments mentioned.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: "Nature": created nature, ordered by the Divine Wisdom out of chaos, which Dryden, adopting the physics of the Greek philosopher Epicurus, describes as composed of the warring and discordant ("jarring") atoms of the four elements: earth, fire, water, and air ("cold," "hot," "moist," and "dry").Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The entire compass of tones in the scale. Dryden is thinking of the Chain of Being, the ordered creation from inanimate nature up to humans, God's latest and final work. The just gradations of notes in a scale are analogous to the equally just gradations in the ascending scale of created beings. Both are the result of harmony.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The power of music to describe, evoke, or subdue emotion ("passion") is a frequent theme in 17th-century literature. In stanzas 2–6, the poet considers music as awakening religious awe, warlike courage, sorrow for unrequited love, jealousy and fury, and the impulse to worship God.Return to reference 4

Epigram on Milton<sup>1</sup>

Three poets,<sup>2</sup> in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn.
The first in loftiness of thought surpassed,
The next in majesty, in both the last:
The force of Nature could no farther go;
To make a third, she joined the former two.

CRITICISM

Dryden's impulse to write criticism came from his practical urge to explain and justify his own writings; his attraction to clear, ordered theoretical principles; and his growing sense of himself as a leader of English literary taste and judgment. The Elizabethans, largely impelled by the example of Italian humanists, had produced an interesting but unsystematic body of critical writings. Dryden could look back to such pioneering works as George Puttenham's Art of English Poesy (1589), Sir Philip Sidney's Defense of Poesy (1595), Samuel Daniel's Defense of Rhyme (ca. 1603), and Ben Jonson's Timber, or Discoveries (1641). These and later writings Dryden knew, as he knew the ancients and the important contemporary French critics, notably Pierre Corneille, René Rapin, and Nicolas Boileau. Taken as a whole, his critical prefaces and dedications, which appeared between 1664 and 1700, are the work of a man of independent mind who has made his own synthesis of critical canons from wide reading, a great deal of thinking, and the constant practice of the art of writing. As a critic he is no one's disciple, and he has the saving grace of being always willing to change his mind.

All but a very few of Dryden's critical works (most notably An Essay of Dramatic Poesy) grew out of the works to which they served as prefaces: comedies, heroic plays, tragedies, translations, and poems of various sorts. Each work posed problems that Dryden was eager to discuss with his readers, and the topics that he treated proved to be important in the development of the new literature of which he was the principal advocate. He dealt with the processes of literary creation, the poet's relation to tradition, the forms of modern drama, the craft of poetry, and above all the genius of earlier poets: Shakespeare, Jonson, Chaucer, Juvenal, Horace, Homer, and Virgil. His critical perspective, both authoritative and open-minded, profoundly influenced critical practice for decades.

[TWO SORTS OF BAD POETRY]

* * * "I have a mortal apprehension of two poets,<sup>2</sup> whom this victory, with the help of both her wings, will never be able to escape." "'Tis easy to guess whom you intend," said Lisideius; "and without naming them, I ask you if one of them does not perpetually pay us with clenches<sup>3</sup> upon words, and a certain clownish kind of raillery?<sup>4</sup> if now and then he does not offer at a catachresis or Clevelandism, wresting and torturing a word into another meaning: in fine, if he be not one of those whom the French would call un mauvais buffon,<sup>5</sup> one who is so much a well-willer to the satire, that he spares no man; and though he cannot strike a blow to hurt any, yet ought to be punished for the malice of the action, as our witches are justly hanged, because they think themselves so, and suffer deservedly for believing they did mischief, because they meant it." "You have described him," said Crites, "so exactly that I am afraid to come after you with my other extremity of poetry. He is one of those who, having had some advantage of education and converse, knows better than the other what a poet should be, but puts it into practice more unluckily than any man; his style and matter are everywhere alike: he is the most calm, peaceable writer you ever read: he never disquiets your passions with the least concernment, but still leaves you in as even a temper as he found you; he is a very Leveller<sup>6</sup> in poetry: he creeps along with ten little words in every line, and helps out his numbers with for to, and unto, and all the pretty expletives<sup>7</sup> he can find, till he drags them to the end of another line; while the sense is left tired halfway behind it: he doubly starves all his verses, first for want of thought, and then of expression; his poetry neither has wit in it, nor seems to have it; like him in Martial:

Pauper videri Cinna vult, et est pauper.*<sup>8</sup>

"He affects plainness, to cover his want of imagination: when he writes the serious way, the highest flight of his fancy is some miserable antithesis, or seeming contradiction; and in the comic he is still reaching at some thin conceit, the ghost of a jest, and that too flies before him, never to be caught; these swallows which we see before us on the Thames are the just resemblance of his wit: you may observe how near the water they stoop, how many proffers they make to dip, and yet how seldom they touch it; and when they do, it is but the surface: they skim over it but to catch a gnat, and then mount into the air and leave it."

[THE WIT OF THE ANCIENTS: THE UNIVERSAL]<sup>9</sup>

* * * "A thing well said will be wit in all languages; and though it may lose something in the translation, yet to him who reads it in the original, 'tis still the same: he has an idea of its excellency, though it cannot pass from his mind into any other expression or words than those in which he finds it. When Phaedria, in the Eunuch,<sup>1</sup> had a command from his mistress to be absent two days, and, encouraging himself to go through with it, said, 'Tan-dem ego non ilia caream, si sit opus, vel totum triduum?'<sup>2</sup>—Parmeno, to mock the softness of his master, lifting up his hands and eyes, cries out, as it were in admiration, 'Hui! universum triduum!'<sup>3</sup> the elegance of which universum, though it cannot be rendered in our language, yet leaves an impression on our souls: but this happens seldom in him; in Plautus<sup>4</sup> oftener, who is infinitely too bold in his metaphors and coining words, out of which many times his wit is nothing; which questionless was one reason why Horace falls upon him so severely in those verses:

*Sed proavi nostri Plautinos et numeros et Laudavere sales, nimium patienter utrumque,
Ne dicam stolide.*<sup>5</sup>

For Horace himself was cautious to obtrude a new word on his readers, and makes custom and common use the best measure of receiving it into our writings:

*Multa renascentur quae nunc cecidere, cadentque
Quae nunc sunt in honore vocabula, si volet usus,
Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus, et norma
loquendi.*<sup>6</sup>

"The not observing this rule is that which the world has blamed in our satirist, Cleveland: to express a thing hard and unnaturally is his new way of elocution. 'Tis true no poet but may sometimes use a catachresis: Virgil does it—

Mistaque ridenti colocasia fundet acantho<sup>7</sup>—

in his eclogue of Pollio; and in his seventh Aeneid:

*mirantur et undae,
Miratur nemus insuetum fulgentia longe
Scuta virum fluvio pictasque innare carinas.*<sup>8</sup>

And Ovid once so modestly that he asks leave to do it:

*quem, si verbo audacia detur,
Haud metuam summi dixisse Palatia caeli.*<sup>9</sup> calling the court of Jupiter by the name of Augustus his palace; though in another place he is more bold, where he says, 'et longas visent Capitolia pompas.<sup>1</sup> But to do this always, and never be able to write a line without it, though it may be admired by some few pedants, will not pass upon those who know that wit is best conveyed to us in the most easy language; and is most to be admired when a great thought comes dressed in words so commonly received that it is understood by the meanest apprehensions, as the best meat is the most easily digested: but we cannot read a verse of Cleveland's without making a face at it, as if every word were a pill to swallow: he gives us many times a hard nut to break our teeth, without a kernel for our pains. So that there is this difference betwixt his satires and Doctor Donne's; that the one gives us deep thoughts in common language, though rough cadence; the other gives us common thoughts in abstruse words: 'tis true in some places his wit is independent of his words, as in that of the Rebel Scot:

Had Cain been Scot, God would have changed his doom;
Not forced him wander, but confined him home.<sup>2</sup>

"Si sic omnia dixisset!"<sup>3</sup> This is wit in all languages: it is like mercury, never to be lost or killed: and so that other—

For beauty, like white powder, makes no noise,
And yet the silent hypocrite destroys.<sup>4</sup>

You see that the last line is highly metaphorical, but it is so soft and gentle that it does not shock us as we read it."

1668

- Note 1:
With the reopening of the theaters in 1660, older plays were revived, but despite their power and charm, they seemed old-fashioned. Although new playwrights, ambitious to create a modern English drama, soon appeared, they were uncertain of their direction. What, if anything, useful could they learn from the dramatic practice of the ancients? Should they ignore the English dramatists of the late 16th and early 17th centuries? Should they make their example the vigorous contemporary drama of France? Dryden addresses himself to these and other problems in this essay, his first extended piece of criticism. Its purpose, he tells us, was "chiefly to vindicate the honor of our English writers from the censure of those who unjustly prefer the French before them." Its method is skeptical: Dryden presents several points of view, but imposes none. The form is a dialogue among friends, like the Tusculan Disputations or the Brutus of Cicero. Crites praises the drama of the ancients; Eugenius protests against their authority and argues for the idea of progress in the arts; Lisideius urges the excellence of French plays; and Neander, speaking in the climactic position, defends the native tradition and the greatness of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Jonson. The dialogue takes place on June 3, 1665, in a boat on the Thames. The four friends are rowed downstream to listen to the cannonading of the English and Dutch fleets, engaged in battle off the Suffolk coast. As the gunfire recedes they are assured of victory and order their boatman to return to London, and naturally enough they fall to discussing the number of bad poems that the victory will evoke.

- Note 2: Crites here is probably referring to Robert Wilde and possibly to Richard Flecknoe, whom Dryden later ridiculed in "Mac Flecknoe" (p. 59). Their actual identity is unimportant, for they merely represent two extremes in poetry, both deplorable: the fantastic and extravagant manner of decadent metaphysical wit and its opposite, the flat and the dull. The new poetry was to seek a mean between these extremes (see Pope, An Essay on Criticism 2.239–42 and 289–300, pp. 526–27). Return to reference 2

["BOLDNESS" OF FIGURES AND TROPES DEFENDED: THE APPEAL TO "NATURE"]

* * * They, who would combat general authority with particular opinion, must first establish themselves a reputation of understanding better than other men. Are all the flights of heroic poetry to be concluded bombast, unnatural, and mere madness, because they are not affected with their excellencies? It is just as reasonable as to conclude there is no day, because a blind man cannot distinguish of light and colors. Ought they not rather, in modesty, to doubt of their own judgments, when they think this or that expression in Homer, Virgil, Tasso, or Milton's Paradise to be too far strained, than positively to conclude that 'tis all fustian and mere nonsense? 'Tis true there are limits to be set betwixt the boldness and rashness of a poet; but he must understand those limits who pretends to judge as well as he who undertakes to write: and he who has no liking to the whole ought, in reason, to be excluded from censuring of the parts. He must be a lawyer before he mounts the tribunal; and the judicature of one court, too, does not qualify a man to preside in another. He may be an excellent pleader in the Chancery, who is not fit to rule the Common Pleas.<sup>2</sup> But I will presume for once to tell them that the boldest strokes of poetry, when they are managed artfully, are those which most delight the reader.

Virgil and Horace, the severest writers of the severest age, have made frequent use of the hardest metaphors and of the strongest hyperboles; and in this case the best authority is the best argument, for generally to have pleased, and through all ages, must bear the force of universal tradition. And if you would appeal from thence to right reason, you will gain no more by it in effect than, first, to set up your reason against those authors, and, secondly, against all those who have admired them. You must prove why that ought not to have pleased which has pleased the most learned and the most judicious; and, to be thought knowing, you must first put the fool upon all mankind. If you can enter more deeply than they have done into the causes and resorts<sup>3</sup> of that which moves pleasure in a reader, the field is open, you may be heard: but those springs of human nature are not so easily discovered by every superficial judge: it requires philosophy, as well as poetry, to sound the depth of all the passions, what they are in themselves, and how they are to be provoked; and in this science the best poets have excelled. * *

* From hence have sprung the tropes and figures,<sup>4</sup> for which they wanted a name who first practiced them and succeeded in them. Thus I grant you that the knowledge of Nature was the original rule, and that all poets ought to study her, as well as Aristotle and Horace, her interpreters.<sup>5</sup> But then this also undeniably follows, that those things which delight all ages must have been an imitation of Nature—which is all I contend. Therefore is rhetoric made an art; therefore the names of so many tropes and figures were invented, because it was observed they had such and such effect upon the audience. Therefore catachreses and hyperboles<sup>6</sup> have found their place amongst them; not that they were to be avoided, but to be used judiciously and placed in poetry as heightenings and shadows are in painting, to make the figure bolder, and cause it to stand off to sight. * * *

[WIT AS "PROPRIETY"]

* * * [Wit] is a propriety of thoughts and words; or, in other terms, thought and words elegantly adapted to the subject. If our critics will join issue on this definition, that we may convenire in aliquo tertio;<sup>7</sup> if they will take it as a granted principle, it will be easy to put an end to this dispute. No man will disagree from another's judgment concerning the dignity of style in heroic poetry; but all reasonable men will conclude it necessary that sublime subjects ought to be adorned with the sublimest, and, consequently, often with the most figurative expressions. * * *

This essay was prefixed to Dryden's State of Innocence, the libretto for an opera (never produced) based on Paradise Lost. Dryden had been ridiculed for the extravagant and bold imagery and rhetorical figures that are typical of the style of his rhymed heroic plays. This preface is a defense not only of his own predilection for what Samuel Johnson described as "wild and daring sallies of sentiment, in the irregular and eccentric violence of wit" but also of the theory that heroic and idealized materials should be treated in lofty and boldly metaphorical style; hence his definition of wit as propriety.

From A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire<sup>1</sup>

[THE ART OF SATIRE]

* * * How easy is it to call rogue and villain, and that wittily! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a blockhead, or a knave without using any of those opprobrious terms! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing.<sup>2</sup> This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice; he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice. Neither is it true that this fineness of raillery<sup>3</sup> is offensive. A witty man is tickled while he is hurt in this manner, and a fool feels it not. The occasion of an offense may possibly be given, but he cannot take it. If it be granted that in effect this way does more mischief; that a man is secretly wounded, and though he be not sensible himself, yet the malicious world will find it out for him; yet there is still a vast difference betwixt the slovenly butchering of a man, and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body, and leaves it standing in its place. A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's<sup>4</sup> wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging; but to make a malefactor die sweetly was only belonging to her husband. I wish I could apply it to myself, if the reader would be kind enough to think it belongs to me. The character of Zimri in my Absalom<sup>5</sup> is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem: it is not bloody, but it is ridiculous enough; and he, for whom it was intended, was too witty to resent it as an injury. If I had railed,<sup>6</sup> I might have suffered for it justly; but I managed my own work more happily, perhaps more dexterously. I avoided the mention of great crimes, and applied myself to the representing of blindsides, and little extravagancies; to which, the wittier a man is, he is generally the more obnoxious.<sup>7</sup> It succeeded as I wished; the jest went round, and he was laughed at in his turn who began the frolic. * * *

This passage is an excerpt from the long and rambling preface that served as the dedication of a translation of the satires of the Roman satirists Juvenal and Persius to Charles Sackville, sixth Earl of Dorset. The translations were made by Dryden and other writers, among them William Congreve. Dryden traces the origin and development of verse satire in Rome and in a very fine passage contrasts Horace and Juvenal as satiric poets. It is plain that he prefers the “tragic” satire of Juvenal to the urbane and laughing satire of Horace. But in the passage printed here, he praises his own satiric character of Zimri (the Duke of Buckingham) in Absalom and Achitophel for the very reason that it is modeled on Horatian “raillery,” not Juvenalian invective.

SAMUEL PEPYS

1633–1703

Samuel Pepys (pronounced "Peeps") was the son of a London tailor. With the help of a scholarship he took a degree at Cambridge; with the help of a cousin he found a place in the Navy Office. Eventually, through hard work and an eye for detail, he rose to secretary of the Admiralty. His defense of the Navy Office and himself before Parliament in 1668 won him a reputation as a good administrator, and his career continued to prosper until it was broken, first by false accusations of treason in 1679 and finally by the fall of James II in 1688. But Pepys was more than a bureaucrat. A Londoner to his core, he was interested in all the activities of the city: the theater, music, the social whirl, business, religion, literary life, and the scientific experiments of the Royal Society (of which he served as president from 1684 to 1686). He also found plenty of chances to indulge his two obsessions: chasing after women and making money.

Pepys kept his diary from 1660 to 1669 (when his eyesight began to fail). Writing in shorthand and sometimes in code, he was utterly frank in recording the events of his day, both public and private, the major affairs of state or his quarrels with his wife. Altogether he wrote about 1.3 million words. When the diary was first deciphered and published in the nineteenth century, it made him newly famous. As a document of social history, it is unsurpassed for its rich detail, honesty, and immediacy. But more than that, it gives us a sense of somebody else's world: what it was like to live in the Restoration, and what it was like to see through the eyes of Pepys.

[THE GREAT FIRE]

September 2, 1666

Lords day. Some of our maids sitting up late last night to get things ready against our feast today, Jane called us up, about 3 in the morning, to tell us of a great fire they saw in the City.<sup>1</sup> So I rose, and slipped on my nightgown and went to her window, and thought it to be on the back side of Mark Lane<sup>2</sup> at the furthest; but being unused to such fires as followed, I thought it far enough off, and so went to bed again and to sleep. About 7 rose again to dress myself, and there looked out at the window and saw the fire not so much as it was, and further off. So to my closet<sup>3</sup> to set things to rights after yesterday's cleaning. By and by Jane comes and tells me that she hears that above 300 houses have been burned down tonight by the fire we saw, and that it was now burning down all Fish Street by London Bridge. So I made myself ready presently,<sup>4</sup> and walked to the Tower and there got up upon one of the high places, Sir J. Robinson's little son going up with me; and there I did see the houses at that end of the bridge all on fire, and an infinite great fire on this and the other side the end of the bridge—which, among other people, did trouble me for poor little Michell and our Sarah<sup>5</sup> on the Bridge. So down, with my heart full of trouble, to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who tells me that it begun this morning in the King's baker's house in Pudding Lane, and that it hath burned down St. Magnus' Church and most part of Fish Street already. So I down to the waterside and there got a boat and through bridge, and there saw a lamentable fire. Poor Michell's house, as far as the Old Swan,<sup>6</sup> already burned that way and the fire running further, that in a very little time it got as far as the Steelyard while I was there. Everybody endeavoring to remove their goods, and flinging into the river or bringing them into lighters<sup>7</sup> that lay off. Poor people staying in their houses as long as till the very fire touched them, and then running into boats or clambering from one pair of stair by the waterside to another. And among other things, the poor pigeons I perceive were loath to leave their houses, but hovered about the windows and balconies till they were some of them burned, their wings, and fell down.

Having stayed, and in an hour's time seen the fire rage every way, and nobody to my sight endeavoring to quench it, but to remove their goods and leave all to the fire; and having seen it get as far as the Steelyard, and the wind mighty high and driving it into the city, and everything, after so long a drought, proving combustible, even the very stones of churches, and among other things, the poor steeple by which pretty Mrs. <sup>8</sup> lives, and whereof my old school-fellow Elborough is parson, taken fire in the very top and there burned till it fell down—I to Whitehall<sup>9</sup> with a gentleman with me who desired to go off from the Tower to see the fire in my boat—to Whitehall, and there up to the King's closet in the chapel, where people came about me and I did give them an account dismayed them all; and word was carried in to the King, so I was called for and did tell the King and Duke of York what I saw, and that unless his Majesty did command houses to be pulled down, nothing could stop the fire. They seemed much troubled, and the King commanded me to go to my Lord Mayor from him and command him to spare no houses but to pull down before the fire every way. The Duke of York bid me tell him that if he would have any more soldiers, he shall; and so did my Lord Arlington afterward, as a great secret. Here meeting with Captain Cocke, I in his coach, which he lent me, and Creed with me, to Paul's;<sup>1</sup> and there walked along Watling Street as well as I could, every creature coming away laden with goods to save—and here and there sick people carried away in beds. Extraordinary good goods carried in carts and on backs. At last met my Lord Mayor in Canning Street, like a man spent, with a hankercher <sup>2</sup> about his neck. To the King's message, he cried like a fainting woman, "Lord, what can I do? I am spent. People will not obey me. I have been pulling down houses. But the fire overtakes us faster than we can do it." That he needed no more soldiers; and that for himself, he must go and refresh himself, having been up all night. So he left me, and I him, and walked home—seeing people all almost distracted and no manner of means used to quench the fire. The houses too, so very thick thereabouts, and full of matter for burning, as pitch and tar, in Thames Street—and warehouses of oil and wines and brandy and other things. Here I saw Mr. Isaak Houblon, that handsome man—prettily dressed and dirty at his door at Dowgate, receiving some of his brothers' things whose houses were on fire; and as he says, have been removed twice already, and he doubts<sup>3</sup> (as it soon proved) that they must be in a little time removed from his house also—which was a sad consideration. And to see the churches all filling with goods, by people who themselves should have been quietly there at this time.

By this time it was about 12 o'clock, and so home and there find my guests, which was Mr. Wood and his wife, Barbary Shelden, and also Mr. Moone—she mighty fine, and her husband, for aught I see, a likely<sup>4</sup> man. But Mr. Moone's design and mine, which was to look over my closet and please him with the sight thereof, which he hath long desired, was wholly disappointed, for we were in great trouble and disturbance at this fire, not knowing what to think of it. However, we had an extraordinary good dinner, and as merry as at this time we could be.

While at dinner, Mrs. Batelier came to enquire after Mr. Woolfe and Stanes (who it seems are related to them), whose houses in Fish Street are all burned, and they in a sad condition. She would not stay in the fright.

As soon as dined, I and Moone away and walked through the City, the streets full of nothing but people and horses and carts loaden with goods, ready to run over one another, and removing goods from one burned house to another—they now removing out of Canning Street (which received goods in the morning) into Lombard Street and further; and among others, I now saw my little goldsmith Stokes receiving some friend's goods, whose house itself was burned the day after. We parted at Paul's, he home and I to Paul's Wharf, where I had appointed a boat to attend me; and took in Mr. Carcasse and his brother, whom I met in the street, and carried them below and above bridge, to and again, to see the fire, which was now got further, both below and above, and no likelihood of stopping it. Met with the King and Duke of York in their barge, and with them to Queenhithe and there called Sir Rd. Browne<sup>5</sup> to them. Their order was only to pull down houses apace, and so below bridge at the waterside; but little was or could be done, the fire coming upon them so fast. Good hopes there was of stopping it at the Three Cranes above, and at Buttolph's Wharf below bridge, if care be used; but the wind carries it into the City, so as we know not by the waterside what it doth there. River full of lighters and boats taking in goods, and good goods swimming in the water; and only, I observed that hardly one lighter or boat in three that had the goods of a house in, but there was a pair of virginals<sup>6</sup> in it. Having seen as much as I could now, I away to Whitehall by appointment, and there walked to St. James's Park, and there met my wife and Creed and Wood and his wife and walked to my boat, and there upon the water again, and to the fire up and down, it still increasing and the wind great. So near the fire as we could for smoke; and all over the Thames, with one's face in the wind you were almost burned with a shower of firedrops—this is very true—so as houses were burned by these drops and flakes of fire, three or four, nay five or six houses, one from another. When we could endure no more upon the water, we to a little alehouse on the Bankside over against the Three Cranes, and there stayed till it was dark almost and saw the fire grow; and as it grew darker, appeared more and more, and in corners and upon steeples and between churches and houses, as far as we could see up the hill of the City, in a most horrid malicious bloody flame, not like the fine flame of an ordinary fire. Barbary<sup>7</sup> and her husband away before us. We stayed till, it being darkish, we saw the fire as only one entire arch of fire from this to the other side the bridge, and in a bow up the hill, for an arch of above a mile long. It made me weep to see it. The churches, houses, and all on fire and flaming at once, and a horrid noise the flames made, and the cracking of houses at their ruin. So home with a sad heart, and there find everybody discoursing and lamenting the fire; and poor

Tom Hater came with some few of his goods saved out of his house, which is burned upon Fish Street hill. I invited him to lie at my house, and did receive his goods: but was deceived in his lying there,<sup>8</sup> the noise coming every moment of the growth of the fire, so as we were forced to begin to pack up our own goods and prepare for their removal. And did by moonshine (it being brave,<sup>9</sup> dry, and moonshine and warm weather) carry much of my goods into the garden, and Mr. Hater and I did remove my money and iron chests into my cellar—as thinking that the safest place. And got my bags of gold into my office ready to carry away, and my chief papers of accounts also there, and my tallies<sup>1</sup> into a box by themselves. So great was our fear, as Sir W. Batten had carts come out of the country to fetch away his goods this night. We did put Mr. Hater, poor man, to bed a little; but he got but very little rest, so much noise being in my house, taking down of goods.

September 5, 1666

I lay down in the office again upon W. Hewer's<sup>2</sup> quilt, being mighty weary and sore in my feet with going till I was hardly able to stand. About 2 in the morning my wife calls me up and tells of new cries of "Fire!"—it being come to Barking Church, which is the bottom of our lane. I up; and finding it so, resolved presently to take her away; and did, and took my gold (which was about £2350), W. Hewer, and Jane down by Poundy's boat to Woolwich.<sup>3</sup> But Lord, what a sad sight it was by moonlight to see the whole City almost on fire—that you might see it plain at Woolwich, as if you were by it. There when I came, I find the gates shut, but no guard kept at all; which troubled me, because of discourses now begun that there is plot in it and that the French had done it.<sup>4</sup> I got the gates open, and to Mr. Sheldon's,<sup>5</sup> where I locked up my gold and charged my wife and W. Hewer never to leave the room without one of them in it night nor day. So back again, by the way seeing my goods well in the lighters at Deptford and watched well by people. Home, and whereas I expected to have seen our house on fire, it being now about 7 o'clock, it was not. But to the fire, and there find greater hopes than I expected; for my confidence of finding our office on fire was such, that I durst not ask anybody how it was with us, till I came and saw it not burned. But going to the fire, I find, by the blowing up of houses and the great help given by the workmen out of the King's yards, sent up by Sir W. Penn, there is a good stop given to it, as well at Mark Lane end as ours—it having only burned the dial<sup>6</sup> of Barking Church, and part of the porch, and was there quenched. I up to the top of Barking steeple, and there saw the saddest sight of desolation that I ever saw. Everywhere great fires. Oil cellars and brimstone and other things burning. I became afear'd to stay there long; and therefore down again as fast as I could, the fire being spread as far as I could see it, and to Sir W. Penn's and there eat a piece of cold meat, having eaten nothing since Sunday but the remains of Sunday's dinner.

Here I met with Mr. Young and Whistler; and having removed all my things, and received good hopes that the fire at our end is stopped, they and I walked into the town and find Fanchurch Street, Gracious Street, and Lumbard Street all in dust. The Exchange a sad sight, nothing standing there of all the statues or pillars but Sir Tho. Gresham's picture in the corner.<sup>7</sup> Walked into Moore-fields (our feet ready to burn, walking through the town among the hot coals) and find that full of people, and poor wretches carrying their goods there, and everybody keeping his goods together by themselves (and a great blessing it is to them that it is fair weather for them to keep abroad<sup>8</sup> night and day); drank there, and paid twopence for a plain penny loaf.

Thence homeward, having passed through Cheapside and Newgate Market, all burned—and seen Anthony Joyce's house in fire. And took up (which I keep by me) a piece of glass of Mercer's Chapel in the street, where much more was, so melted and buckled with the heat of the fire, like parchment. I also did see a poor cat taken out of a hole in the chimney joining to the wall of the Exchange, with the hair all burned off the body and yet alive. So home at night, and find there good hopes of saving our office—but great endeavors of watching all night and having men ready; and so we lodged them in the office and had drink and bread and cheese for them. And I lay down and slept a good night about midnight—though when I rose, I hear that there had been a great alarm of French and Dutch being risen—which proved nothing. But it is a strange thing to see how long this time did look since Sunday, having been always full of variety of actions, and little sleep, that it looked like a week or more. And I had forgot almost the day of the week.<sup>9</sup>

[THE DEB WILLET AFFAIR]

October 25, 1668

Lords day. Up, and discoursing with my wife about our house and many new things we are doing of; and so to church I, and there find Jack Fen come, and his wife, a pretty black<sup>1</sup> woman; I never saw her before, nor took notice of her now. So home and to dinner; and after dinner, all the afternoon got my wife and boy<sup>2</sup> to read to me. And at night W. Batelier comes and sups with us; and after supper, to have my head combed by Deb,<sup>3</sup> which occasioned the greatest sorrow to me that ever I knew in this world; for my wife, coming up suddenly, did find me embracing the girl con my hand sub su coats; and indeed, I was with my main in her cunny.<sup>4</sup> I was at a wonderful loss upon it, and the girl also; and I endeavored to put it off, but my wife was struck mute and grew angry, and as her voice came to her, grew quite out of order; and I do say little, but to bed; and my wife said little also, but could not sleep all night; but about 2 in the morning waked me and cried, and fell to tell me as a great secret that she was a Roman Catholic and had received the Holy Sacrament;<sup>5</sup> which troubled me but I took no notice of it, but she went on from one thing to another, till at last it appeared plainly her trouble was at what she saw; but yet I did not know how much she saw and therefore said nothing to her. But after her much crying and reproaching me with inconstancy and preferring a sorry girl before her, I did give her no provocations but did promise all fair usage to her, and love, and foreswore any hurt that I did with her—till at last she seemed to be at ease again; and so toward morning, a little sleep; [Oct. 26] and so I, with some little repose and rest, rose, and up and by water to Whitehall, but with my mind mightily troubled for the poor girl, whom I fear I have undone by this, my wife telling me that she would turn her out of door. However, I was obliged to attend the Duke of York, thinking to have had a meeting of Tanger<sup>6</sup> today, but had not; but he did take me and Mr. Wren into his closet, and there did press me to prepare what I had to say upon the answers of my fellow-officers to his great letter; which I promised to do against<sup>7</sup> his coming to town again the next week; and so to other discourse, finding plainly that he is in trouble and apprehensions of the reformers, and would be found to do what he can towards reforming himself. And so thence to my Lord Sandwich; where after long stay, he being in talk with others privately, I to him; and there he taking physic and keeping his chamber, I had an hour's talk with him about the ill posture of things at this time, while the King gives countenance to Sir Ch. Sidly and Lord Buckhurst,<sup>8</sup> telling him their late story of running up and down the streets a little while since all night, and their being beaten and clapped up all night by the constable, who is since chid and imprisoned for his pains.

He tells me that he thinks his matters do stand well with the King—and hopes to have dispatch to his mind;<sup>9</sup> but I doubt it, and do see that he doth fear it too. He told me my Lady Carteret's trouble about my writing of that letter of the Duke of York's lately to the office; which I did not own, but declared to be of no injury to G. Carteret<sup>1</sup> and that I would write a letter to him to satisfy him therein. But this I am in pain how to do without doing myself wrong, and the end I had, of preparing a justification to myself hereafter, when the faults of the Navy come to be found out. However, I will do it in the best manner I can.

Thence by coach home and to dinner, finding my wife mightily discontented and the girl sad, and no words from my wife to her. So after dinner, they out<sup>2</sup> with me about two or three things; and so home again, I all the evening busy and my wife full of trouble in her looks; and anon to bed—where about midnight, she wakes me and there falls foul on me again, affirming that she saw me hug and kiss the girl; the latter I denied, and truly; the other I confessed and no more. And upon her pressing me, did offer to give her under my hand that I would never see Mrs. Pierce more, nor Knepp, but did promise her particular demonstrations of my true love to her, owning some indiscretion in what I did, but that there was no harm in it. She at last on these promises was quiet, and very kind we were, and so to sleep; [Oct. 27] and in the morning up, but with my mind troubled for the poor girl, with whom I could not get opportunity to speak; but to the office, my mind mighty full of sorrow for her, where all the morning, and to dinner with my people and to the office all the afternoon; and so at night home and there busy to get some things ready against tomorrow's meeting of Tanger; and that being done and my clerks gone, my wife did towards bedtime begin to be in a mighty rage from some new matter that she had got in her head, and did most part of the night in bed rant at me in most high terms, of threats of publishing<sup>3</sup> my shame; and when I offered to rise, would have rose too, and caused a candle to be lit, to burn by her all night in the chimney while she ranted; while I, that knew myself to have given some grounds for it, did make it my business to appease her all I could possibly, and by good words and fair promises did make her very quiet; and so rested all night and rose with perfect good peace, being heartily afflicted for this folly of mine that did occasion it; but was forced to be silent about the girl, which I have no mind to part with, but much less that the poor girl should be undone by my folly. [Oct. 28] So up, with mighty kindness from my wife and a thorough peace; and being up, did by a note advise the girl what I had done and owned, which note I was in pain for till she told me that she had burned it. This evening, Mr. Spong came and sat late with me, and first told me of the instrument called Parrallogram,<sup>4</sup> which I must have one of, showing me his practice thereon by a map of England.

November 14, 1668

Up, and had a mighty mind to have seen or given a note to Deb or to have given her a little money; to which purpose I wrapped up 40s in a paper, thinking to give her; but my wife rose presently, and would not let me be out of her sight; and went down before me into the kitchen, and came up and told me that she was in the kitchen, and therefore would have me go round the other way; which she repeating, and I vexed at it, answered her a little angrily; upon which she instantly flew out into a rage, calling me dog and rogue, and that I had a rotten heart; all which, knowing that I deserved it, I bore with; and word being brought presently up that she was gone away by coach with her things, my wife was friends; and so all quiet, and I to the office with my heart sad, and find that I cannot forget the girl, and vexed I know not where to look for her—and more troubled to see how my wife is by this means likely for ever to have her hand over me, that I shall for ever be a slave to her; that is to say, only in matters of pleasure, but in other things she will make her business, I know, to please me and to keep me right to her—which I will labor to be indeed, for she deserves it of me, though it will be I fear a little time before I shall be able to wear Deb out of my mind. At the office all the morning, and merry at noon at dinner; and after dinner to the office, where all the afternoon and doing much business late; my mind being free of all troubles, I thank God, but<sup>5</sup> only for my thoughts of this girl, which hang after her. And so at night home to supper, and there did sleep with great content with my wife. I must here remember that I have lain with my moher<sup>6</sup> as a husband more times since this falling-out then in I believe twelve months before—and with more pleasure to her then I think in all the time of our marriage before.

November 18, 1668

Lay long in bed, talking with my wife, she being unwilling to have me go abroad, being and declaring herself jealous of my going out, for fear of my going to Deb; which I do deny—for which God forgive me, for I was no sooner out about noon but I did go by coach directly to Somerset House and there inquired among the porters there for Dr. Allbun;<sup>7</sup> and the first I spoke with told me he knew him, and that he was newly gone into Lincoln's Inn fields, but whither he could not tell me, but that one of his fellows, not then in the way, did carry a chest of drawers thither with him, and that when he comes he would ask him. This put me in some hopes; and I to Whitehall and thence to Mr. Povy's, but he at dinner; and therefore I away and walked up and down the Strand between the two turnstiles,<sup>8</sup> hoping to see her out of a window; and then employed a porter, one Osbeston, to find out this doctor's lodgings thereabouts; who by appointment comes to me to Hercules' Pillars, where I dined alone, but tells me that he cannot find out any such but will inquire further. Thence back to Whitehall to the treasury a while, and thence to the Strand; and towards night did meet with the porter that carried the chest of drawers with this doctor, but he would not tell me where he lived, being his good master he told me; but if I would have a message to him, he would deliver it. At last, I told him my business was not with him, but a little gentlewoman, one Mrs. Willet, that is with him; and sent him to see how she did, from her friend in London, and no other token. He goes while I walk in Somerset House walk there in the court; at last he comes back and tells me she is well, and that I may see her if I will—but no more. So I could not be commanded by my reason, but I must go this very night; and so by coach, it being now dark, I to her, close by my tailor's; and there she came into the coach to me, and yo did besar her and tocar her thing, but ella was against it and labored with much earnestness, such as I believed to be real; and yet at last yo did make her tener mi cosa in her mano, while mi mano was sopra her pectus, and so did hazer<sup>9</sup> with grand delight. I did nevertheless give her the best counsel I could, to have a care of her honor and to fear God and suffer no man para haver to do con her—as yo have done—which she promised. Yo did give her 20s and directions para laisser sealed in paper at any time the name of the place of her being, at Herringman's my bookseller in the Change<sup>1</sup>—by which I might go para her. And so bid her good-night, with much content to my mind and resolution to look after her no more till I heard from her. And so home, and there told my wife a fair tale, God knows, how I spent the whole day; with which the poor wretch was satisfied, or at least seemed so; and so to supper and to bed, she having been mighty busy all day in getting of her house in order against tomorrow, to hang up our new hangings and furnishing our best chamber.

November 19, 1668

Up, and at the office all the morning, with my heart full of joy to think in what a safe condition all my matters now stand between my wife and Deb and me; and at noon, running upstairs to see the upholsters, who are at work upon hanging my best room and setting up my new bed, I find my wife sitting sad in the dining-room; which inquiring into the reason of, she begun to call me all the false, rotten-hearted rogues in the world, letting me understand that I was with Deb yesterday; which, thinking impossible for her ever to understand, I did a while deny; but at last did, for the ease of my mind and hers, and for ever to discharge my heart of this wicked business, I did confess all; and above-stairs in our bed-chamber there, I did endure the sorrow of her threats and vows and curses all the afternoon. And which was worst, she swore by all that was good that she would slit the nose of this girl, and be gone herself this very night from me; and did there demand 3 or 400/ of me to buy my peace, that she might be gone without making any noise, or else protested that she would make all the world know of it. So, with most perfect confusion of face and heart, and sorrow and shame, in the greatest agony in the world, I did pass this afternoon, fearing that it will never have an end; but at last I did call for W. Hewer, who I was forced to make privy now to all; and the poor fellow did cry like a child and obtained what I could not, that she would be pacified, upon condition that I would give it under my hand never to see or speak with Deb while I live, as I did before of Pierce and Knepp; and which I did also, God knows, promise for Deb too, but I have the confidence to deny it, to the perjuring of myself. So before it was late, there was, beyond my hopes as well as desert, a tolerable peace; and so to supper, and pretty kind words, and to bed, and there yo did hazer con ella to her content; and so with some rest spent the night in bed, being most absolutely resolved, if ever I can master this bout, never to give her occasion while I live of more trouble of this or any other kind, there being no curse in the world so great as this of the difference between myself and her; and therefore I do by the grace of God promise never to offend her more, and did this night begin to pray to God upon my knees alone in my chamber; which God knows I cannot yet do heartily, but I hope God will give me the grace more and more every day to fear Him, and to be true to my poor wife. This night the upholsters did finish the hanging of my best chamber, but my sorrow and trouble is so great about this business, that put me out of all joy in looking upon it or minding how it was.<sup>2</sup>

1628–1688

John Bunyan is one of the most remarkable figures in seventeenth-century literature. The son of a poor Bedfordshire tinker (a maker and mender of metal pots), he received only meager schooling and then learned his father's craft. Nothing in the circumstances of his early life could have suggested that he would become a writer known the world over.

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), his spiritual autobiography, records his transformation from a self-doubting sinner into an eloquent and fearless Baptist preacher. Preachers, both men and women, often even less educated than Bunyan, were common phenomena among the sects during the Commonwealth. They wished no ordination but the "call," and they could dispense with learning because they abounded in inspiration, inner light, and the gifts conferred by the Holy Spirit. In November 1660, the Anglican Church began to persecute and silence the dissenting sects. Jails filled with unlicensed Nonconformist preachers, and Bunyan was one of the prisoners. Refusing to keep silent, he chose imprisonment and so for twelve years remained in Bedford jail, preaching to his fellow prisoners and writing religious books. Upon his release, he was called to the pastorate of a Nonconformist group in Bedford. It was during a second imprisonment, in 1675, when the Test Act was once again rigorously enforced against Nonconformists, that he wrote his greatest work, The Pilgrim's Progress from This World to That Which Is to Come (1678), revised and augmented in the third edition (1679). Bunyan was a prolific writer: part 2 of The Pilgrim's Progress, dealing with the journey of Christian's wife and children, appeared in 1684; The Life and Death of Mr. Badman, in 1680; The Holy War, in 1682. And these major works form only a small part of all his writings.

The Pilgrim's Progress was long the most popular allegory in English. Its basic metaphor—life is a journey—is simple and familiar; the objects that the pilgrim Christian meets are homely and commonplace: a quagmire, the highway, the bypaths and shortcuts through pleasant meadows, the inn, the steep hill, the town fair on market day, and the river that must be forded. As in the equally homely parables of Jesus, however, these simple things are charged with spiritual significance. Moreover, this is a tale of adventure. If the road that Christian travels is the King's Highway, it is also a perilous path along which we encounter giants, wild beasts, hobgoblins, and the terrible Apollyon, "the angel of the bottomless pit," whom Christian must fight. Bunyan keeps the tale firmly based on human experience, and his style, modeled on the prose of the English Bible, together with his concrete language and carefully observed details, enables even the simplest reader to share the experiences of the characters. The Pilgrim's Progress is no longer a household book, but it survives in the phrases it gave to our language: "the slough of despond," "the house beautiful," "Mr. Worldly-Wiseman," and "Vanity Fair."

[CHRISTIAN SETS OUT FOR THE CELESTIAL CITY]

As I walked through the wilderness of this world, I lighted on a certain place where was a den, and I laid me down in that place to sleep; and, as I slept, I dreamed a dream. I dreamed, and behold I saw a man clothed with rags, standing in a certain place, with his face from his own house, a book in his hand, and a great burden upon his back (Isaiah lxiv.6; Luke xiv.33; Psalms xxxviii.4; Habakkuk ii.2; Acts xvi.31). I looked and saw him open the book and read therein; and, as he read, he wept, and trembled; and not being able longer to contain, he brake out with a lamentable cry, saying, "What shall I do?" (Acts ii.37).

In this plight, therefore, he went home and refrained himself as long as he could, that his wife and children should not perceive his distress; but he could not be silent long, because that his trouble increased. Wherefore at length he brake his mind to his wife and children; and thus he began to talk to them. O my dear wife, said he, and you the children of my bowels, I your dear friend am in myself undone by reason of a burden that lieth hard upon me; moreover, I am for certain informed that this our city will be burned with fire from heaven, in which fearful overthrow both myself, with thee, my wife, and you, my sweet babes, shall miserably come to ruin, except (the which yet I see not) some way of escape can be found, whereby we may be delivered. At this his relations were sore amazed; not for that they believed that what he had said to them was true, but because they thought that some frenzy distemper<sup>1</sup> had got into his head; therefore, it drawing towards night, and they hoping that sleep might settle his brains, with all haste they got him to bed; but the night was as troublesome to him as the day; wherefore, instead of sleeping, he spent it in sighs and tears. So when the morning was come, they would know how he did. He told them, Worse and worse; he also set to talking to them again, but they began to be hardened. They also thought to drive away his distemper by harsh and surly carriages<sup>2</sup> to him: sometimes they would deride, sometimes they would chide, and sometimes they would quite neglect him. Wherefore he began to retire himself to his chamber, to pray for and pity them, and also to condole his own misery; he would also walk solitarily in the fields, sometimes reading, and sometimes praying; and thus for some days he spent his time.

Now I saw, upon a time, when he was walking in the fields, that he was (as he was wont) reading in this book, and greatly distressed in his mind; and as he read, he burst out, as he had done before, crying, "What shall I do to be saved?"

I saw also that he looked this way and that way, as if he would run; yet he stood still, because (as I perceived) he could not tell which way to go. I looked then, and saw a man named Evangelist<sup>3</sup> coming to him, who asked, Wherefore dost thou cry? (Job xxxiii.23). He answered, Sir, I perceive by the book in my hand that I am condemned to die, and after that to come to judgment (Hebrews ix.27), and I find that I am not willing to do the first (Job xvi.21), nor able to do the second (Ezekiel xxii.14). . . .

Then said Evangelist, Why not willing to die, since this life is attended with so many evils? The man answered, Because I fear that this burden that is upon my back will sink me lower than the grave, and I shall fall into Tophet<sup>4</sup> (Isaiah xxx.33). And, sir, if I be not fit to go to prison, I am not fit to go to judgment, and from thence to execution; and the thoughts of these things make me cry.<sup>5</sup>

Then said Evangelist, If this be thy condition, why standest thou still? He answered, Because I know not whither to go. Then he gave him a parchment roll, and there was written within, "Fly from the wrath to come" (Matthew iii.7).

The man therefore read it, and looking upon Evangelist very carefully,<sup>6</sup> said, Whither must I fly? Then said Evangelist, pointing with his finger over a very wide field, Do you see yonder wicketgate?<sup>7</sup> (Matthew vii. 13, 14.) The man said, No. Then said the other, Do you see yonder shining light? (Psalms cxix.105; II Peter i.19.) He said, I think I do. Then said Evangelist, Keep that light in your eye, and go up directly thereto; so shalt thou see the gate; at which when thou knockest it shall be told thee what thou shalt do.

So I saw in my dream that the man began to run. Now, he had not run far from his own door, but his wife and children perceiving it, began to cry after him to return; but the man put his fingers in his ears, and ran on, crying, Life! life! eternal life! (Luke xiv.26). So he looked not behind him, but fled towards the middle of the plain (Genesis xix.17).

The neighbors also came out to see him run (Jeremiah xx.10); and as he ran some mocked, others threatened, and some cried after him to return; and, among those that did so, there were two that resolved to fetch him back by force. The name of the one was Obstinate, and the name of the other Pliable. Now by this time the man was got a good distance from them; but, however, they were resolved to pursue him, which they did, and in a little time they overtook him. Then said the man, Neighbors, wherefore are ye come? They said, To persuade you to go back with us. But he said, That can by no means be; you dwell, said he, in the City of Destruction (the place also where I was born) I see it to be so; and, dying there, sooner or later, you will sink lower than the grave, into a place that burns with fire and brimstone; be content, good neighbors, and go along with me.

OBST. What! said Obstinate, and leave our friends and our comforts behind us?

CHR. Yes, said Christian (for that was his name), because that ALL which you shall forsake is not worthy to be compared with a little of that which I am seeking to enjoy (II Corinthians v.17); and, if you will go along with me, and hold it, you shall fare as I myself; for there, where I go, is enough and to spare (Luke xv.17). Come away, and prove my words.

OBST. What are the things you seek, since you leave all the world to find them?

CHR. I seek an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away (I Peter i.4), and it is laid up in heaven, and safe there (Hebrews xi.16), to be bestowed, at the time appointed, on them that diligently seek it. Read it so, if you will, in my book.

OBST. Tush! said Obstinate, away with your book; will you go back with us or no?

CHR. No, not I, said the other, because I have laid my hand to the plow (Luke ix.62).

OBST. Come, then, neighbor Pliable, let us turn again, and go home without him; there is a company of these crazed-headed coxcombs, that, when they take a fancy<sup>8</sup> by the end, are wiser in their own eyes than seven men that can render a reason (Proverbs xxvi.16).

PLI. Then said Pliable, Don't revile; if what the good Christian says is true, the things he looks after are better than ours; my heart inclines to go with my neighbor.

OBST. What! more fools still? Be ruled by me, go back; who knows whither such a brain-sick fellow will lead you? Go back, go back, and be wise.

CHR. Nay, but do thou come with thy neighbor, Pliable; there are such things to be had which I spoke of, and many more glories besides. If you believe not me, read here in this book; and for the truth of what is expressed therein, behold, all is confirmed by the blood of Him that made it (Hebrews ix.17–22; xiii.20).

PLI. Well, neighbor Obstinate, said Pliable, I begin to come to a point,<sup>9</sup> I intend to go along with this good man, and to cast in my lot with him: but, my good companion, do you know the way to this desired place?

CHR. I am directed by a man, whose name is Evangelist, to speed me to a little gate that is before us, where we shall receive instructions about the way.

PLI. Come, then, good neighbor, let us be going. Then they went both together. * * *

[THE SLOUGH OF DESPOND]

Now I saw in my dream, that just as they had ended this talk they drew near to a very miry slough,<sup>1</sup> that was in the midst of the plain; and they, being heedless, did both fall suddenly into the bog. The name of the slough was Despond. Here, therefore, they wallowed for a time, being grievously bedaubed with dirt; and Christian, because of the burden that was on his back, began to sink in the mire.

PLI. Then said Pliable, Ah, neighbor Christian, where are you now?

CHR. Truly, said Christian, I do not know.

PLI. At that Pliable began to be offended, and angrily said to his fellow, Is this the happiness you have told me all this while of? If we have such ill speed at our first setting out, what may we expect 'twixt this and our journey's end? May I get out again with my life, you shall possess the brave<sup>2</sup> country alone for me. And, with that, he gave a desperate struggle or two, and got out of the mire on that side of the slough which was next<sup>3</sup> to his own house: so away he went, and Christian saw him no more.

Wherefore Christian was left to tumble in the Slough of Despond alone: but still he endeavored to struggle to that side of the slough that was further from his own house, and next to the wicket-gate; the which he did, but could not get out, because of the burden that was upon his back: but I beheld in my dream, that a man came to him, whose name was Help, and asked him what he did there?

CHR. Sir, said Christian, I was bid go this way by a man called Evangelist, who directed me also to yonder gate, that I might escape the wrath to come; and as I was going thither I fell in here.

HELP. But why did not you look for the steps?

CHR. Fear followed me so hard that I fled the next way, and fell in.

HELP. Then said he, Give me thy hand; so he gave him his hand, and he drew him out, and set him upon sound ground, and bid him go on his way.

Then I stepped to him that plucked him out, and said, Sir, wherefore, since over this place is the way from the City of Destruction to yonder gate, is it that this plat<sup>4</sup> is not mended, that poor travelers might go thither with more security? And he said unto me, This miry slough is such a place as cannot be mended; it is the descent whither the scum and filth that attends conviction for sin doth continually run, and therefore it was called the Slough of Despond; for still, as the sinner is awakened about his lost condition, there ariseth in his soul many fears, and doubts, and discouraging apprehensions, which all of them get together, and settle in his place. And this is the reason of the badness of this ground. * * *

[VANITY FAIR]<sup>5</sup>

Then I saw in my dream, that when they were got out of the wilderness, they presently saw a town before them, and the name of that town is Vanity; and at the town there is a fair kept, called Vanity Fair; it is kept all the year long; it beareth the name of Vanity Fair because the town where it is kept is lighter than vanity; and also because all that is there sold, or that cometh thither, is vanity. As is the saying of the wise, "All that cometh is vanity" (Ecclesiastes i.2, 14; ii.11, 17; xi.8; Isaiah xl.17).

This fair is no new-erected business, but a thing of ancient standing; I will show you the original of it.

Almost five thousand years ago, there were pilgrims walking to the Celestial City, as these two honest persons are; and Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion,<sup>6</sup> with their companions, perceiving by the path that the pilgrims made, that their way to the city lay through this town of Vanity, they contrived here to set up a fair; a fair wherein should be sold all sorts of vanity, and that it should last all the year long. Therefore at this fair are all such merchandise sold, as houses, lands, trades, places, honors, preferments,<sup>7</sup> titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts, as whores, bawds, wives, husbands, children, masters, servants, lives, blood, bodies, souls, silver, gold, pearls, precious stones, and what not.

And, moreover, at this fair there is at all times to be seen jugglings, cheats, games, plays, fools, apes, knaves, and rogues, and that of every kind.

Here are to be seen, too, and that for nothing, thefts, murders, adulteries, false swearers, and that of a blood-red color.

And as in other fairs of less moment, there are the several rows and streets, under their proper names, where such and such wares are vended; so here likewise you have the proper places, rows, streets (viz., countries and kingdoms), where the wares of this fair are soonest to be found. Here is the Britain Row, the French Row, the Italian Row, the Spanish Row, the German Row, where several sorts of vanities are to be sold. But, as in other fairs, some one commodity is as the chief of all the fair, so the ware of Rome and her merchandise<sup>8</sup> is greatly promoted in this fair; only our English nation, with some others, have taken a dislike thereat.

Now, as I said, the way to the Celestial City lies just through this town where this lusty<sup>9</sup> fair is kept; and he that will go to the City, and yet not go through this town, must needs "go out of the world" (I Corinthians v.10). The Prince of princes himself, when here, went through this town to his own country, and that upon a fair-day too,<sup>1</sup> yea, and as I think, it was Beelzebub, the chief lord of this fair, that invited him to buy of his vanities; yea, would have made him lord of the fair, would he but have done him reverence as he went through the town. (Matthew iv.8; Luke iv.5–7.) Yea, because he was such a person of honor, Beelzebub had him from street to street, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a little time, that he might, if possible, allure the Blessed One to cheapen<sup>2</sup> and buy some of his vanities; but he had no mind to the merchandise, and therefore left the town, without laying out so much as one farthing upon these vanities. This fair, therefore, is an ancient thing, of long standing, and a very great fair.

Now these pilgrims, as I said, must needs go through this fair. Well, so they did; but, behold, even as they entered into the fair, all the people in the fair were moved, and the town itself as it were in a hubbub about them; and that for several reasons: for

First, The pilgrims were clothed with such kind of raiment as was diverse from the raiment of any that traded in that fair. The people, therefore, of the fair, made a great gazing upon them: some said they were fools, some they were bedlams, and some they are outlandish<sup>3</sup> men. (I Corinthians ii.7, 8).

Secondly, And as they wondered at their apparel, so they did likewise at their speech; for few could understand what they said; they naturally spoke the language of Canaan, but they that kept the fair were the men of this world; so that, from one end of the fair to the other, they seemed barbarians<sup>4</sup> each to the other.

Thirdly, But that which did not a little amuse the merchandisers was that these pilgrims set very light by all their wares; they cared not so much as to look upon them; and if they called upon them to buy, they would put their fingers in their ears, and cry, "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity," and look upwards, signifying that their trade and traffic was in heaven. (Psalms cxix.37; Philippians iii.19, 20).

One chanced mockingly, beholding the carriages of the men, to say unto them, What will ye buy? But they, looking-gravely upon him, said, "We buy the truth" (Proverbs xxiii.23). At that there was an occasion taken to despise the men the more; some mocking, some taunting, some speaking reproachfully, and some calling upon others to smite them. At last things came to an hubbub and great stir in the fair, insomuch that all order was confounded. Now was word presently brought to the great one of the fair, who quickly came down, and deputed some of his most trusty friends to take these men into examination, about whom the fair was almost overturned. So the men were brought to examination; and they that sat upon them<sup>5</sup> asked them whence they came, whither they went, and what they did there, in such an unusual garb? The men told them that they were pilgrims and strangers in the world, and that they were going to their own country, which was the Heavenly Jerusalem (Hebrews xi.13–16); and that they had given no occasion to the men of the town, nor yet to the merchandisers, thus to abuse them, and to let<sup>6</sup> them in their journey, except it was for that, when one asked them what they would buy, they said they would buy the truth. But they that were appointed to examine them did not believe them to be any other than bedlams and mad, or else such as came to put all things into a confusion in the fair. Therefore they took them and beat them, and besmeared them with dirt, and then put them into the cage, that they might be made a spectacle to all the men of the fair. * * *

- Note 5:

In this, perhaps the best-known episode in the book, Bunyan characteristically turns one of the most familiar institutions in contemporary England—annual fairs—into an allegory of universal spiritual significance. Christian and his companion Faithful pass through the town of Vanity at the season of the local fair. Vanity means “emptiness” or “worthlessness,” and hence the fair is an allegory of worldliness and the corruption of the religious life through the attractions of the world. From earliest times numerous fairs were held for stated periods throughout Britain; to them the most important merchants from all over Europe brought their wares. The serious business of buying and selling was accompanied by all sorts of diversions—eating, drinking, and other fleshly pleasures, as well as spectacles of strange animals, acrobats, and other wonders.

[THE RIVER OF DEATH AND THE CELESTIAL CITY]

So I saw that when they<sup>7</sup> awoke, they addressed themselves to go up to the City; but, as I said, the reflection of the sun upon the City (for the City was pure gold, Revelation xxi.18) was so extremely glorious, that they could not, as yet, with open face behold it, but through an instrument made for that purpose. (II Corinthians iii.18). So I saw that as I went on, there met them two men, in raiment that shone like gold; also their faces shone as the light.

These men asked the pilgrims whence they came; and they told them. They also asked them where they had lodged, what difficulties and dangers, what comforts and pleasures they had met in the way; and they told them. Then said the men that met them, You have but two difficulties more to meet with, and then you are in the City.

Christian then and his companion asked the men to go along with them; so they told them they would. But, said they, you must obtain it by your own faith. So I saw in my dream that they went on together till they came in sight of the gate.

Now I further saw that betwixt them and the gate was a river, but there was no bridge to go over; the river was very deep. At the sight, therefore, of this river, the pilgrims were much stunned;<sup>8</sup> but the men that went with them said, You must go through, or you cannot come at the gate.

The pilgrims then began to inquire if there was no other way to the gate; to which they answered, Yes; but there hath not any, save two, to wit, Enoch and Elijah,<sup>9</sup> been permitted to tread that path, since the foundation of the world, nor shall, until the last trumpet shall sound. (I Corinthians xv.51, 52). The pilgrims then, especially Christian, began to despond in his mind, and looked this way and that, but no way could be found by them by which they might escape the river. Then they asked the men if the waters were all of a depth. They said no; yet they could not help them in that case; for, said they, you shall find it deeper or shallower, as you believe in the King of the place.

They then addressed themselves to the water; and entering, Christian began to sink, and crying out to his good friend Hopeful, he said, I sink in deep waters; the billows go over my head, all his waves go over me! Selah.<sup>1</sup>

Then said the other, Be of good cheer, my brother, I feel the bottom, and it is good. Then said Christian, Ah, my friend, the sorrows of death have compassed me about; I shall not see the land that flows with milk and honey. And with that a great darkness and horror fell upon Christian, so that he could not see before him. Also here he in great measure lost his senses, so that he could neither remember nor orderly talk of any of those sweet refreshments that he had met with in the way of his pilgrimage. But all the words that he spake still tended to discover<sup>2</sup> that he had horror of mind, and heart-fears that he should die in that river, and never obtain entrance in at the gate. Here also, as they that stood by perceived, he was much in the troublesome thoughts of the sins that he had committed, both since and before he began to be a pilgrim. 'Twas also observed that he was troubled with apparitions of hobgoblins and evil spirits; for ever and anon he would intimate so much by words. Hopeful, therefore, here had much ado to keep his brother's head above water; yea, sometimes he would be quite gone down, and then, ere a while, he would rise up again half dead. Hopeful also would endeavor to comfort him, saying, Brother, I see the gate and men standing by to receive us; but Christian would answer, 'Tis you, 'tis you they wait for; you have been Hopeful ever since I knew you. And so have you, said he to Christian. Ah, brother, said he, surely if I was right he would now arise to help me; but for my sins he hath brought me into the snare, and hath left me. Then said Hopeful, My brother, you have quite forgot the text, where it is said of the wicked, "There are no bands in their death, but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men, neither are they plagued like other men" (Psalms lxxiii.4, 5). These troubles and distresses that you go through in these waters are no sign that God hath forsaken you, but are sent to try you, whether you will call to mind that which heretofore you have received of his goodness, and live upon him in your distresses.

Then I saw in my dream that Christian was as in a muse<sup>3</sup> a while, to whom also Hopeful added this word, Be of good cheer. Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. And with that Christian brake out with a loud voice, Oh, I see him again! and he tells me, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee" (Isaiah xliii.2). Then they both took courage, and the Enemy was after that as still as a stone, until they were gone over. Christian therefore presently found ground to stand upon, and so it followed that the rest of the river was but shallow. Thus they got over. Now, upon the bank of the river on the other side, they saw the two Shining Men again, who there waited<sup>4</sup> for them. Wherefore, being come out of the river, they saluted<sup>4</sup> them saying, We are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for those that shall be heirs of salvation. Thus they went along towards the gate. * * *

Now when they were come up to the gate, there was written over it in letters of gold, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city" (Revelation xxii.14).

Then I saw in my dream, that the Shining Men bid them call at the gate; the which, when they did, some from above looked over the gate, to wit, Enoch, Moses, and Elijah, etc., to whom it was said, These pilgrims are come from the City of Destruction, for the love that they bear to the King of this place; and then the pilgrims gave in unto them each man his certificate, which they had received in the beginning; those, therefore, were carried in to the King, who, when he had read them, said, Where are the men? To whom it was answered, They are standing without the gate. The King then commanded to open the gate, "That the righteous nation," said he, "which keepeth the truth, may enter in" (Isaiah xxvi.2).

Now I saw in my dream that these two men went in at the gate; and lo, as they entered, they were transfigured, and they had raiment put on that shone like gold. There was also that met them with harps and crowns, and gave them to them: the harps to praise withal, and the crowns in token of honor. Then I heard in my dream that all the bells in the city rang again for joy, and that it was said unto them, "ENTER YE INTO THE JOY OF OUR LORD" (Matthew xxv.21). I also heard the men themselves, that they sang with a loud voice, saying, "BLESSING AND HONOR, GLORY AND POWER, BE TO HIM THAT SITTETH UPON THE THRONE, AND TO THE LAMB FOREVER AND EVER" (Revelation v.13).

Now just as the gates were opened to let in the men, I looked in after them, and, behold, the City shone like the sun; the streets also were paved with gold, and in them walked many men, with crowns on their heads, palms in their hands, and golden harps to sing praises withal.

There were also of them that had wings, and they answered one another without intermission, saying, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord" (Revelation iv.8). And after that they shut up the gates, which when I had seen I wished myself among them.

Now while I was gazing upon all these things, I turned my head to look back, and saw Ignorance come up to the riverside; but he soon got over, and that without half that difficulty which the other two men met with. For it happened that there was then in that place one Vain-hope, a ferryman, that with his boat helped him over; so he, as the other, I saw, did ascend the hill to come up to the gate, only he came alone; neither did any man meet him with the least encouragement. When he was come up to the gate, he looked up to the writing that was above, and then began to knock, supposing that entrance should have been quickly administered to him; but he was asked by the men that looked over the top of the gate, Whence came you? and what would you have? He answered, I have eat and drank in the presence of the King, and he has taught in our streets. Then they asked him for his certificate, that they might go in and show it to the King; so he fumbled in his bosom for one, and found none. Then said they, Have you none? But the man answered never a word. So they told the King, but he would not come down to see him, but commanded the two Shining Ones that conducted Christian and Hopeful to the City, to go out and take Ignorance, and bind him hand and foot, and have him away. Then they took him up, and carried him through the air, to the door that I saw in the side of the hill, and put him in there. Then I saw that there was a way to hell, even from the gates of heaven, as well as from the City of Destruction. So I awoke, and behold it was a dream.

Science, Society, and God

In the early seventeenth century, politician and philosopher Francis Bacon imagined a utopian world organized around a powerful scientific society that aimed at “the knowledge of causes, and secret motions of things; and the enlarging of the bounds of human empire, to the effecting of all things possible.” Over three decades later, on November 28, 1660, a group gathered at Gresham College to discuss creating a real scientific society—not in a fictional text but right where they were, in London. While Bacon had imagined a secretive society, these men wanted to create one that would publicly encourage a kind of learning that did not yet feature in the school or university curriculum. Among the men gathered was Robert Boyle, a gentleman doing groundbreaking experiments into the nature of matter with a vacuum pump. John Wilkins was there too, an influential clergyman who was devising a sign system for a new scientific language. The group also included, among others, Lawrence Rooke, an astronomer; William Petty, a medical doctor; Lord Viscount William Brouncker, a nobleman interested in math and music; and Christopher Wren, who would become famous as the architect of St. Paul’s Cathedral in London. The society these men dreamed up later received a charter from King Charles II, who approved of their work, and became the Royal Society of London for Improving of Natural Knowledge—the first scientific society in England. This group would soon start publishing the Philosophical Transactions, the first scientific journal in English.

The seventeenth century used to be described as the century of the “Scientific Revolution,” a period of heroic individual acts of discovery: Isaac Newton supposedly was struck by an apple that prompted a “Eureka!” insight into the very structure of the universe. Today, scholars have challenged many aspects of this old picture. The myth of a solitary genius has been replaced by a clearer picture of a group of people working both within and outside new institutions to forge new practices, build new technologies, and legitimize new kinds of knowledge. And what once seemed like a “revolution” instead involved complex continuities with the past. Even “science” as a singular noun does not seem exactly right. Contemporaries sometimes described what they were doing as the “new science” (where “science” was from the Latin scientia, signifying knowledge more generally), but they also talked of “natural philosophy,” “mechanical philosophy,” and “natural history.” The word scientist was not coined until the nineteenth century: they were instead “natural philosophers,” or “naturalists,” or “virtuosi” (a word also used for collectors). Using our word science also threatens to obscure the way seventeenth-century new science was understood in relation with religion, or alchemy and natural magic, or anthropology, or linguistics. Yet, even if the old picture of the “Scientific Revolution” has been challenged, this period remains crucial in the history of science: new ideas about atomism, experiment, technology, and probability developed, and many of the practices and structures we associate with modern science were institutionalized. The new science became more popular, capturing imaginations. This cluster focuses on the early Royal Society as it offers a snapshot of the late seventeenth-century moment when all this was starting to happen.

The Royal Society’s early advocates made much of how its members held different political and religious views and came from different walks of life (nobility and tradesmen alike). In the early years, however, the fellows were all men and most of them were quite privileged. Women were not allowed in the seventeenth century or for a long time after. (The first women were elected to the Royal Society in 1945.) The first Jewish man, Moses da Costa, was elected in 1736; and in the first decades of the eighteenth century the Society rejected a Black Jamaican man, Francis Williams, who attended a few meetings and was proposed for membership. (Later, the Gentleman’s Magazine suggested that the rejection was “solely . . . on account of his complexion.”) The men of the Royal Society were not the only people interested in science in the period, just one group that organized themselves influentially.

The early fellows chose as their motto "Nullius in verba," meaning "On the word of no one." Instead of writing arguments relying on the authority of Aristotle and other ancient thinkers, they wanted to see things for themselves: actual natural things, animals and plants. They were empiricists, thinkers who started from sensory experience. These empiricists would begin small—studying natural objects and collecting facts from all over—and only slowly build to conclusions or generalizations. But they would not just passively look at nature: they would experiment and dissect. This approach to knowledge seemed to involve a change of scale that was striking to contemporaries. Some people found it mockable: instead of asking big questions about Truth, these philosophers proposed studying dirt and bugs. But they also used powerful instruments to enable a change of scale that seemed thrilling to others: with microscopes they could see tiny animals moving around in cheese, and telescopes helped them glimpse stars never before seen by humans. One influential idea at the core of the Society's early work was that nature was like a machine—it worked, clocklike, through tiny bits of matter in motion, with none of the complicated ideas about "occult powers" or "substantial forms" that Aristotelian traditions used to explain matter.

None of these ideas, however, went unchallenged. An empiricist approach to knowledge was dominant in the late seventeenth-century Royal Society, but it was not shared by the fellows doing cutting-edge work in math. And even proponents of the "mechanical" worldview were unsure if it could explain gravity or the human nervous system, say. Further, there were philosophers outside the society—like Thomas Hobbes and Margaret Cavendish—who were well versed in the new science but actively challenged the Royal Society's dominant ways of knowing (could seventeenth-century microscopes be trusted to do what advocates promised?) and its understanding of nature (was all matter really as inert and passive as bits of a clock?). In the culture at large, the Royal Society's new science was far from dominant: universities kept on teaching their Aristotle-inspired brand of Scholasticism. And theater audiences of Thomas Shadwell's play The Virtuoso (1676) laughed at an impotent madman wasting time and money on bottles of air but also slaughtering dogs for useless experiments that led nowhere (see Joseph Addison's reimagining of this character, p. 130). Today, familiar with how powerful science has become, we might find it surprising that its early advocates had to work so hard to promote and legitimize science. The fellows of the Royal Society were at pains to emphasize that, unlike theological and political disputes that had been central to the Civil Wars of the preceding years, the study of nature posed no social threat. They also insisted that their work would be useful to society at large, yielding practical applications. And this new science did not challenge Christianity, they argued, but served it: they could help people understand God's wisdom and design in the creation of the world. Over the course of the eighteenth century, science was popularized in new ways—including in sermons, introductory books for women, and coffeehouse lectures featuring live experiments. Over the same period, science would also get aligned with power in increasingly material ways: for instance, the Royal Society would help fund Captain James Cook's imperial voyages into the Pacific in the 1760s.

Literature of this period expressed a wide range of attitudes about science: writers mocked it or thrilled to its possibilities; they cited its discoveries, or their prose styles registered its influence. And while science influenced literature, the reverse was also true. Francis Bacon inspired the Society with utopian fiction, and Cavendish critiqued it in fiction too. To be sure, some advocates of science distrusted literature's resources: "nullius in verba" condemned textual authorities but also rhetoric itself. Advocates of early science dreamed influentially of a "plain style" of writing that would avoid what John Locke called the "cheat" of figurative language and deliver, as Thomas Sprat put it, "so many things almost in an equal number of words" (see p. 98). Whatever they said, though, science's advocates kept right on using kinds of language we think of as literary—"nullius in verba" itself is taken from Horace's ancient Latin poetry. Moreover, Steven Shapin argues that Robert Boyle worked with vacuum technology but also a "literary technology" that helped legitimize his findings, a vivid and verbose kind of description that urged readers to imagine they were actually watching the experiment. And so many early Royal Society writers used analogies and metaphors to explain and understand what they saw—even the very notion of a "mechanical philosophy" rests on the metaphor of nature as a machine. Indeed, for all that "nullius in verba" was its ideal, early science happened in and through language, and it comes down to us in these words.

THOMAS SPRAT

Thomas Sprat (1635–1713) wrote The History of the Royal Society of London, For the Improving of Natural Knowledge in 1667, just seven years after the first meeting and five years after the Society received its charter. Sprat's book offers a history of the Society's founding but also of science itself, as Sprat places its brand of experimentation in a long history of knowledge stretching back to the ancient Greeks. The book also functions as a kind of introduction to the Society's work, featuring excerpts from its science: "observations of the eclipses of the satellites of Jupiter," a description of Tenerife, "an account of a dog dissected," experiments with colored dye, and a discussion of the life cycle of Colchester oysters. Above all, though, the History is a defense of the Royal Society against its critics, influentially expressing some key themes of early science's advocates: science is useful, and no danger to church or state.

The History is perhaps best remembered today for its famous comments on scientific writing—Sprat's celebration of the Royal Society's "plain" style that matched things to words, and his diatribe against ornamental and affective rhetoric. There is historical irony in the influence of his antirhetorical ideal, for Sprat himself was better known in the seventeenth century as a poet interested in ornate Pindaric odes. Moreover, Sprat brought considerable rhetorical savvy to his endorsement of the Royal Society and its aims. He closes by imagining science ushering in a better world: "all tempests will cease; the oppositions and contentious wranglings of science falsely so called will soon vanish away; the peaceable calmness of men's judgements will have admirable influence on their manners; the sincerity of their understandings will appear in their actions; their opinions will be less violent and dogmatical but more certain" and "the value of their arts will be esteemed by the great things they perform and not by those they speak." The new science will, Sprat promises, "enrich us with all the benefits of fruitfulness and plenty."

From The History of the Royal Society

[A MODEL OF THEIR WHOLE DESIGN]

Their purpose is, in short, to make faithful records of all the works of nature or art, which can come within their reach: that so the present age and posterity may be able to put a mark on the errors, which have been strengthened by long prescription:<sup>1</sup> to restore the truths that have lain neglected: to push on those, which are already known, to more various uses:<sup>2</sup> and to make the way more passable to what remains unrevealed. This is the compass of their design. And to accomplish this, they have endeavored to separate the knowledge of nature from the colors of rhetoric, the devices of fancy, or the delightful deceit of fables. They have labored to enlarge it, from being confined to the custody of a few,<sup>3</sup> or from servitude to private interests. They have striven to preserve it from being over-pressed by a confused heap of vain and useless particulars; or from being straitened and bounded too much up by general doctrines. They have tried to put it into a condition of perpetual increasing, by settling an inviolable correspondence between the hand and the brain. They have studied to make it not only an enterprise of one season or of some lucky opportunity; but a business of time, a steady, a lasting, a popular, an uninterrupted work. They have attempted to free it from the artifice, and humors,<sup>4</sup> and passions of sects; to render it an instrument, whereby mankind may obtain a dominion over things, and not only over one another's judgments. And lastly, they have begun to establish these reformatations in philosophy, not so much by any solemnity of laws or ostentation of ceremonies, as by solid practice and examples: not by a glorious pomp of words, but by the silent, effectual, and unanswerable arguments of real productions.

[THEIR MANNER OF DISCOURSE]

Thus they have directed, judged, conjectured upon, and improved experiments. But lastly, in these and all other businesses that have come under their care, there is one thing more about which the Society has been most solicitous; and that is, the manner of their discourse: which, unless they had been very watchful to keep in due temper, the whole spirit and vigor of their design had been soon eaten out by the luxury and redundance of speech. The ill effects of this superfluity of talking have already overwhelmed most other arts and professions; insomuch that when I consider the means of happy living and the causes of their corruption, I can hardly forbear recanting<sup>5</sup> what I said before; and concluding that eloquence ought to be banished out of all civil societies, as a thing fatal to peace and good manners. To this opinion I should wholly incline, if I did not find that it is a weapon, which may be as easily procured by bad men as good, and that, if these<sup>6</sup> should only cast it away and those retain it, the naked innocence of virtue would be upon all occasions exposed to the armed malice of the wicked. This is the chief reason that should now keep up the ornaments of speaking in any request: since they are so much degenerated from their original usefulness. They were at first, no doubt, an admirable instrument in the hands of wise men: when they were only employed to describe goodness, honesty, obedience in larger, fairer, and more moving images; to represent truth, clothed with bodies; and to bring knowledge back again to our very senses, from whence it was at first derived to our understandings.<sup>7</sup> But now they are generally changed to worse uses. They make the fancy disgust the best things, if they come sound and unadorned; they are in open defiance against reason, professing not to hold much correspondence with that but with its slaves, the passions; they give the mind a motion too changeable and bewitching to consist with right practice. Who can behold, without indignation, how many mists and uncertainties these specious tropes and figures have brought on our knowledge? How many rewards, which are due to more profitable and difficult arts, have been still snatched away by the easy vanity of fine speaking? For now I am warmed with this just anger, I cannot withhold myself from betraying the shallowness of all these seeming mysteries, upon which we writers and speakers look so big. And, in few words, I dare say that of all the studies of men, nothing may be sooner obtained than this vicious abundance of phrase, this trick of metaphors, this volubility of tongue, which makes so great a noise in the world. But I spend words in vain; for the evil is now so inveterate<sup>8</sup> that it is hard to know whom to blame or where to begin to reform. We all value one another so much upon this beautiful deceit and labor so long after it in the years of our education, that we cannot but ever after think kinder of it than it deserves. And indeed, in most other parts of learning, I look on it to be a thing almost utterly desperate in its cure: and I think it may be placed amongst those general mischiefs, such as the dissention of Christian princes, the want of practice in religion and the like, which have been so long spoken against that men are become insensible<sup>9</sup> about them, every one shifting off the fault from himself to others; and so they are only made bare commonplaces of complaint. It will suffice my present purpose to point out what has been done by the Royal Society towards the correcting of its excesses in natural philosophy, to which it is, of all others, a most professed enemy.

They have therefore been most rigorous in putting in execution the only remedy that can be found for this extravagance, and that has been a constant resolution to reject all the amplifications, digressions, and swellings of style: to return back to the primitive purity and shortness, when men delivered so many things almost in an equal number of words. They have exacted from all their members a close, naked, natural way of speaking; positive expressions, clear senses, a native easiness; bringing all things as near the mathematical plainness as they can; and preferring the language of artisans, countrymen, and merchants, before that of wits or scholars.

[NATURAL PHILOSOPHY NOT HARMFUL TO RELIGION]

First there can be no just reason assigned, why an experimenter should be prone to deny the essence and properties of God, the universal sovereignty of His dominion, and His providence over the creation. He has before him the very same argument to confirm his judgment in all these; with which he himself is wont to be abundantly satisfied when he meets with it in any of his philosophical inquiries. In everything that he tries, he believes that this is enough for him to rest on, if he finds that not only his own, but the universal observations of men of all times and places, without any mutual conspiracy have consented in the same conclusion. How can he then refrain from embracing this common truth, which is witnessed by the unanimous approbation of all countries, the agreement of nations, and the secret acknowledgement of every man's breast?<sup>1</sup>

'Tis true his employment is about material things. But this is so far from drawing him to oppose invisible beings that it rather puts his thoughts into an excellent good capacity to believe them. In every work of nature that he handles, he knows that there is not only a gross<sup>2</sup> substance, which presents itself to all men's eyes, but an infinite subtilty of parts, which come not into the sharpest sense. So that what the Scripture relates of the purity of God, of the spirituality of his nature, and that of angels and the souls of men cannot seem incredible to him, when he perceives the numberless particles that move in every man's blood and the prodigious streams that continually flow unseen from every body. Having found that his own senses have been so far assisted by the instruments of art, he may sooner admit that his mind ought to be raised higher by a heavenly light in those things wherein his senses do fall short. If (as the Apostle says) the invisible things of God are manifested by the visible,<sup>3</sup> then how much stronger arguments has he for his belief in the eternal power and Godhead, from the vast number of creatures that are invisible to others but are exposed to his view by the help of his experiments?

Thus he is prepared to admit a deity and to embrace the consequences of that concession. He is also from his experiments as well furnished with arguments to adore it: he has always before his eyes the beauty, contrivance, and order of God's works: from hence, he will learn to serve Him with all reverence, who in all that He has made consulted ornament, as well as use * * *<sup>4</sup>

So true is that saying of my Lord Bacon, That by a little knowledge of nature men become atheists; but a great deal returns them back again to a sound and religious mind.<sup>5</sup> In brief, if we rightly apprehend the matter, it will be found that it is not only sottishness<sup>6</sup> but prophaneness for men to cry out against the understanding of nature: for that being nothing else but the instrument of God, whereby He gives being and action to things, the knowledge of it deserves so little to be esteemed impious, that it ought rather to be reckoned as divine.

ROBERT HOOKE

Robert Hooke (1635–1703) was one of the most prolific and skilled natural philosophers of the early Royal Society. He was born to a minister and received a small inheritance, though he was of a lower class than many of the other gentlemen of the Royal Society. In the early 1650s, he started working as an assistant to natural philosophers in Oxford, a role that involved him in cutting-edge scientific work, including Robert Boyle's groundbreaking vacuum pump experiments. Upon the Royal Society's founding, Hooke was appointed curator of experiments, tasked with performing a few at every meeting. This was something more like a job at first (though a salary was promised only in the future), but Hooke was given full status as a fellow the following year. Later, he was granted a paid lectureship at Gresham College, the institution in London where the Royal Society met. Many scholars thus describe Hooke as "the first professional research scientist," earning his living off scientific work. Later, Hooke became one of the secretaries of the Royal Society.

Hooke's most influential work, the lavishly illustrated Micrographia—literally, "tiny writing" or "drawing"—was published in 1665, only the second book to come out with the Royal Society's imprimatur, or official sanction. The very project of microscopy captured many of the central energies of early science: it involved a Francis Bacon-inspired collection of facts about nature; it worked through minute attention to sensed particulars; and it used a scientific instrument that promised to remedy, at least partially, fundamental human limitations. The Micrographia also shows evidence of Hooke's own extraordinarily wide-ranging scientific interests, as in its pages he studies color, fire, minerals, plants, and insects and even speculates about craters on the moon. The book contains the first use of the word cell to describe plant structure, in Hooke's discussion of cork under a microscope.

One of Hooke's recurring conclusions was about how the microscope reveals the complex artistry of God's creation, in comparison with the "rudeness and bungling" of human constructions: magnified, a seed evinced previously unfathomable intricacy of design, whereas a manufactured needle showed only lumps and bumps. Yet, the Micrographia was also a celebration of the new possibilities of scientific technology, of the idea that human abilities might be extended.

From The Preface

It is the great prerogative of mankind above other creatures, that we are not only able to behold the works of nature, or barely to sustain our lives by them, but we have also the power of considering, comparing, altering, assisting, and improving them to various uses. And as this is the peculiar privilege of human nature in general, so is it capable of being so far advanced by the helps of art and experience as to make some men excel others in their observations and deductions, almost as much as they do beasts. By the addition of such artificial instruments and methods, there may be, in some manner, a reparation made for the mischiefs, and imperfection, mankind has drawn upon itself, by negligence and intemperance and a willful and superstitious deserting the prescripts and rules of nature, whereby every man, both from a derived corruption, innate and born with him, and from his breeding and converse with men, is very subject to slip into all sorts of errors.<sup>2</sup>

The only way which now remains for us to recover some degree of those former perfections seems to be by rectifying the operations of the sense, the memory, and reason, since upon the evidence, the strength, the integrity, and the right correspondence of all these, all the light by which our actions are to be guided is to be renewed, and all our command over things is to be established.

It is therefore most worthy of our consideration to recollect their several defects,<sup>3</sup> that so we may the better understand how to supply them, and by what assistances we may enlarge their power and secure them in performing their particular duties.

As for the actions of our senses, we cannot but observe them to be in many particulars much outdone by those of other creatures, and when at best to be far short of the perfection they seem capable of. And these infirmities of the senses arise from a double cause, either from the disproportion of the object to the organ, whereby an infinite number of things can never enter into them,<sup>4</sup> or else from error in the perception, that many things, which come within their reach, are not received in a right manner.

The like frailties are to be found in the memory; we often let many things slip away from us, which deserve to be retained; and of those which we treasure up, a great part is either frivolous or false; and if good and substantial, either in tract of time obliterated, or at best so overwhelmed and buried under more frothy notions that when there is need of them, they are in vain sought for.

The two main foundations being so deceivable, it is no wonder that all the succeeding works which we build upon them, of arguing, concluding, defining, judging, and all the other degrees of reason are liable to the same imperfection, being, at best, either vain<sup>5</sup> or uncertain: so that the errors of the understanding are answerable to the two other, being defective both in the quantity and goodness of its knowledge; for the limits to which our thoughts are confined are small in respect of the vast extent of nature itself; some parts of it are too large to be comprehended, and some too little to be perceived. And from thence it must follow, that not having a full sensation of the object, we must be very lame and imperfect in our conceptions about it, and in all the proportions which we build upon it; hence we often take the shadow of things for the substance, small appearances for good similitudes,<sup>6</sup> similitudes for definitions; and even many of those, which we think to be the most solid definitions, are rather expressions of our own misguided apprehensions than of the true nature of the things themselves.

The effects of these imperfections are manifested in different ways, according to the temper and disposition of the several minds of men: some they incline to gross ignorance and stupidity, and others to a presumptuous imposing on other men's opinions, and a confident dogmatizing on matters, whereof there is no assurance to be given.

Thus all the uncertainty and mistakes of human actions proceed either from the narrowness and wandering of our senses, from the slipperiness or delusion of our memory, from the confinement<sup>7</sup> or rashness of our understanding, so that 'tis no wonder that our power over natural causes and effects is so slowly improved, seeing we are not only to contend with the obscurity and difficulty of the things whereon we work and think, but even the forces of our own minds conspire to betray us.

These being the dangers in the process of human reason, the remedies of them all can only proceed from the real, the mechanical, the experimental philosophy, which has this advantage over the philosophy of discourse and disputation, that whereas that chiefly aims at the subtilty of its deductions and conclusions, without much regard to the first groundwork, which ought to be well laid on the sense and memory; so this<sup>8</sup> intends the right ordering of them all, and the making them serviceable to each other.

The first thing to be undertaken in this weighty work is a watchfulness over the failings and an enlargement of the dominion of the senses.

To which end it is requisite, first, that there should be a scrupulous choice and a strict examination of the reality, constancy, and certainty of the particulars that we admit; this is the first rise whereon truth is to begin, and here the most severe and most impartial diligence must be employed; the storing up of all, without any regard to evidence or use, will only tend to darkness and confusion. We must not therefore esteem the riches of our philosophical treasure by the number only, but chiefly by the weight; the most vulgar instances are not to be neglected, but above all, the most instructive are to be entertained; the footsteps of Nature are to be traced, not only in her ordinary course, but when she seems to be put to her shifts, to make many doublings and turnings, and to use some kind of art in endeavoring to avoid our discovery.<sup>9</sup>

The next care to be taken, in respect of the senses, is a supplying of their infirmities with instruments, and, as it were, the adding of artificial organs to the natural; this in one of them has been of late years accomplished with prodigious benefit to all sorts of useful knowledge, by the invention of optical glasses. By the means of telescopes, there is nothing so far distant but may be represented to our view; and by the help of microscopes, there is nothing so small as to escape our inquiry; hence there is a new visible world discovered<sup>1</sup> to the understanding. By this means the heavens are opened, and a vast number of new stars, and new motions, and new productions appear in them, to which all the ancient astronomers were utterly strangers. By this the Earth itself, which lies so near us, under our feet, shows quite a new thing to us, and in every little particle of its matter, we now behold almost as great a variety of creatures, as we were able before to reckon up in the whole universe itself.

It seems not improbable, but that by these helps the subtilty of the composition of bodies, the structure of their parts, the various texture of their matter, the instruments and manner of their inward motions,<sup>2</sup> and all the other possible appearances of things may come to be more fully discovered; all which the ancient Peripatetics<sup>3</sup> were content to comprehend in two general and (unless further explained) useless words of matter and form. From whence there may arise many admirable advantages towards the increase of the operative<sup>4</sup> and the mechanic knowledge, to which this age seems so much inclined, because we may perhaps be enabled to discern all the secret workings of nature, almost in the same manner as we do those that are the productions of art, and are managed by wheels, and engines, and springs, that were devised by human wit.<sup>5</sup>

In this kind I here present to the world my imperfect endeavors; which though they shall prove no other way considerable, yet, I hope, they may be in some measure useful to the main design of a reformation in philosophy, if it be only by showing that there is not so much required towards it, any strength of imagination, or exactness of method, or depth of contemplation (though the addition of these, where they can be had, must needs produce a much more perfect composure) as a sincere hand and a faithful eye, to examine and to record the things themselves as they appear. * * *<sup>6</sup>

Observation 54. Of a Louse

This is a creature so officious, that 'twill be known to every one at one time or other, so busy and so impudent<sup>7</sup> that it will be intruding itself in everyone's company, and so proud and aspiring withall, that it fears not to trample on the best, and affects nothing so much as a crown;<sup>8</sup> feeds and lives very high, and that makes it so saucy, as to pull any one by the ears<sup>9</sup> that comes in its way, and will never be quiet till it has drawn blood: it is troubled at nothing so much as at a man that scratches his head, as knowing that man is plotting and contriving some mischief against it, and that makes it oftentime skulk into some meaner and lower place, and run behind a man's back, though it go very much against the hair;<sup>1</sup> which ill conditions of it having made it better known than trusted would exempt me from making any further description of it did not my faithful Mercury,<sup>2</sup> my microscope, bring me other information of it. For this has discovered to me, by means of a very bright light cast on it, that it is a creature of a very odd shape; it has a head shaped like that expressed in 35. Scheme<sup>3</sup> marked with A, which seems almost conical, but is a little flatted on the upper and under sides, at the biggest part of which, on either side behind the head (as it were, being the place where other creatures' ears stand) are placed its two black shining goggle eyes BB, looking backwards, and fenced round with several small cilia or hairs that encompass it, so that it seems this creature has no very good foresight:<sup>4</sup> it does not seem to have any eyelids, and therefore perhaps its eyes were so placed that it might the better cleanse them with its fore-legs; and perhaps this may be the reason why they so much avoid and run from the light behind them, for being made to live in the shady and dark recesses of the hair, and thence probably their eye having a great aperture, the open and clear light, especially that of the sun, must needs very much offend them;<sup>5</sup> to secure these eyes from receiving any injury from the hairs through which it passes, it has two horns that grow before it, in the place where one would have thought the eyes should be; each of these CC hath four joints, which are fringed, as it were, with small bristles, from which to the tip of its snout D, the head seems very round and tapering, ending in a very sharp nose D, which seems to have a small hole and to be the passage through which he sucks the blood. Now whereas if it be placed on its back with its belly upwards, as it is in the 35. Scheme, it seems in several positions to have a resemblance of chaps, or jaws, as is represented in the figure by EE, yet in other postures those dark strokes disappear; and having kept several of them in a box for two or three days, so that for all that time they had nothing to feed on, I found, upon letting one creep on my hand, that it immediately fell to sucking,<sup>6</sup> and did neither seem to thrust its nose very deep into the skin, nor to open any kind of mouth, but I could plainly perceive a small current of blood, which came directly from its snout and past into its belly; and about A there seemed a contrivance, somewhat resembling a pump, pair of bellows, or heart, for by a very swift systole and diastole<sup>7</sup> the blood seemed drawn from the nose and forced into the body. It did not seem at all, though I viewed it a good while as it was sucking, to thrust more of its nose into the skin than the very snout D, nor did it cause the least discernable pain, and yet the blood seemed to run through its head very quick and freely, so that it seems there is no part of the skin but the blood is dispersed into, nay, even into the cuticula; for had it thrust its whole nose in from D to CC, it would not have amounted to the supposed thickness of that tegument,<sup>8</sup> the length of the nose being not more than a three hundredth part of an inch. It has six legs, covered with a very transparent shell, and jointed exactly like a crab's or lobster's; each leg is divided into six parts by these joints, and those have here and there several small hairs; and at the end of each leg it has two claws, very properly adapted for its peculiar use, being thereby enabled to walk very securely both on the skin and hair; and indeed this contrivance of the feet is very curious, and could not be made more commodiously and compendiously,<sup>9</sup> for performing both these requisite motions of walking and climbing up the hair of a man's head than it is: for, by having the lesser claw (a) set so much short of the bigger (b) when it walks on the skin the shorter touches not, and then the feet are the same with those of a mite and several other small insects, but by means of the small joints of the longer claw it can bend it round, and so with both claws take hold of a hair, in the manner represented in the figure, the long transparent cylinder FFF being a man's hair held by it.

The thorax<sup>1</sup> seemed cased with another kind of substance than the belly, namely, with a thin transparent horny substance, which upon the fasting of the creature did not grow flaccid; through this I could plainly see the blood, sucked from my hand, to be variously distributed and moved to and fro; and about G there seemed a pretty big white substance, which seemed to be moved within its thorax; besides, there appeared very many small milk-white vessels, which crossed over the breast between the legs, out of which on either side were many small branchings, these seemed to be the veins and arteries, for that which is analogous to blood in all insects is milk-white.

The belly is covered with a transparent substance likewise, but more resembling a skin than a shell, for 'tis grained all over the belly just like the skin in the palms of a man's hand, and when the belly is empty grows very flaccid and wrinkled; at the upper end of this is placed the stomach HH, and perhaps also the white spot II may be the liver or pancreas, which, by the peristaltic motion<sup>2</sup> of the guts, is a little moved to and fro, not with a systole and diastole, but rather with a thronging or justling motion. Viewing one of these creatures after it had fasted two days, all the hinder part was lank and flaccid, and the white spot II hardly moved, most of the white branchings disappeared, and most also of the redness or sucked blood in the guts, the peristaltic motion of which was scarce discernable; but upon the suffering it to suck, it presently filled the skin of the belly, and of the six scalloped embossments<sup>3</sup> on either side, as full as it could be stuffed; the stomach and guts were as full as they could hold; the peristaltic motion of the gut grew quick, and the justling motion of II accordingly; multitudes of milk-white vessels seemed quickly filled and turgid,<sup>4</sup> which were perhaps the veins and arteries, and the creature was so greedy that though it could not contain more, yet it continued sucking as fast as ever and as fast emptying itself behind: the digestion of this creature must needs be very quick, for though I perceived the blood thicker and blacker when sucked, yet, when in the guts, it was of a very lovely ruby color, and that part of it, which was digested into the veins, seemed white; whence it appears, that a further digestion of blood may make it milk, at least of a resembling color. What is else observable in the figure of this creature may be seen by the 35. Scheme.

MARGARET CAVENDISH

Margaret Cavendish, the Duchess of Newcastle (1623–1673), was a natural philosopher who wrote several books working out her own original alternative to both the older Aristotelean and the newer “mechanical” theories of matter. She advocated instead for a vitalist materialism premised on the idea that matter is not inert but animate. Cavendish, a noblewoman, was fascinated by the new science but was also a fierce critic of the Royal Society’s particular brand of it. In Observations upon Experimental Philosophy (1666), Cavendish incorporates whole passages in italics from Hooke’s Micrographia (1665) and then offers her own point-by-point rebuttals—attacking Hooke’s understanding of nature, his methods, his reliance on technology, and his understanding of humanity’s place in the world.

Cavendish was also a prolific poet, playwright, essayist, and fiction writer, and the philosophical critique in her Observations was published alongside her work of fiction, The Description of a New World, Called the Blazing World (see volume B of this anthology), which developed many of her objections. In Blazing World, an empress visiting another world encounters many fantastical creatures, including a group of “bear-men” obsessed with microscopes and telescopes. Dismayed at how the bear-men cannot agree on what they see, the empress orders them to break their useless instruments, but they beg pitifully. These obstinate philosophers then baldly admit that they “take more delight in artificial delusions, than in natural truths” and that, without their lenses, they would lose all the fun of “confuting and contradicting each other.” The empress relents for the moment but later forces the bear-men to dissolve their society, which—with other scientific societies in the Blazing World—was causing “contentions and divisions” that threatened the “ruin of the government.” Cavendish’s criticisms were philosophical, methodological, and social, and they were asserted powerfully in both a philosophical treatise and a utopian fiction. Unfortunately, the Royal Society would not engage meaningfully with her ideas. She visited a meeting once in 1667, but the existing reports by men there that day focus more on her clothing than her comments. Philosophers today, however, do engage with her brand of materialism—they see that she deserved to be taken much more seriously.

[OF ART AND EXPERIMENTAL PHILOSOPHY]

Some are of opinion, that by art there can be a reparation made of the mischiefs and imperfections mankind has drawn upon itself by negligence and intemperance, and a willful and superstitious deserting the prescripts and rules of nature, whereby every man, both from a derived corruption, innate and born with him, and from his breeding and converse with men is very subject to slip into all sorts of errors.<sup>1</sup> But the all-powerful God and his servant Nature know that art, which is but a particular creature,<sup>2</sup> cannot inform us of the truth of the infinite parts of Nature, being but finite itself; for though every creature has a double perception, rational and sensitive, yet each creature or part has not an infinite perception; nay, although each particular creature or part of nature may have some conceptions of the infinite parts of nature, yet it cannot know the truth of those infinite parts, being but a finite part itself, which finiteness causes errors in perceptions; wherefore it is well said, when they confess themselves, that the uncertainty and mistakes of human actions proceed either from the narrowness and wandering of our senses, or from the slipperiness or delusion of our memory, or from the confinement or rashness of our understanding. But, say they, It is no wonder that our power over natural causes and effects is so slowly improved, seeing we are not only to contend with the obscurity and difficulty of the things whereon we work and think, but even the forces of our minds conspire to betray us: And these being the dangers in the process of human reason, the remedies can only proceed from the real, the mechanical, the experimental philosophy, which has this advantage over the philosophy of discourse and disputation, that whereas that chiefly aims at the subtilty of its deductions and conclusions, without much regard to the first groundwork, which ought to be well laid on the sense and memory, so this intends the right ordering of them all, and making them serviceable to each other.<sup>3</sup> In which discourse I do not understand, first, what they mean by our power over natural causes and effects; for we have no power at all over natural causes and effects, but only one particular effect may have some power over another, which are natural actions; but neither can natural causes nor effects be overpowered by man so, as if man was a degree above nature, but they must be as nature is pleased to order them; for man is but a small part, and his powers are but particular actions of nature, and therefore he cannot have a supreme and absolute power. Next, I say, that sense,<sup>4</sup> which is more apt to be deluded than reason, cannot be the ground of reason, no more than art can be the ground of nature: wherefore discourse shall sooner find or trace nature's corporeal figurative motions,<sup>5</sup> than deluding arts can inform the senses; for how can a fool order his understanding by art, if nature has made it defective? Or how can a wise man trust his senses, if either the objects be not truly presented according to their natural figure and shape, or if the senses be defective, either through age, sickness, or other accidents, which do alter the natural motions proper to each sense? And hence I conclude, that experimental and mechanic philosophy cannot be above the speculative part, by reason most experiments have their rise from the speculative, so that the artist or mechanic is but a servant to the student.

[OF MICROGRAPHY, AND OF MAGNIFYING AND MULTIPLYING GLASSES]

Although I am not able to give a solid judgment of the art of micrography, and the several dioptrical instruments<sup>6</sup> belonging thereto, by reason I have neither studied nor practiced that art; yet of this I am confident, that this same art, with all its instruments, is not able to discover the interior natural motions of any part or creature of nature; nay, the question is, whether it can represent yet the exterior shapes and motions so exactly, as naturally they are; for art doth more easily alter than inform: as for example, art makes cylinders, concave and convex-glasses, and the like, which represent the figure of an object in no part exactly and truly, but very deformed and misshaped: also a glass that is flawed, cracked, or broke, or cut into the figure of lozenges,<sup>7</sup> triangles, squares, or the like will present numerous pictures of one object. Besides, there are so many alterations made by several lights, their shadows, refractions, reflections, as also several lines, points, mediums, interposing and intermixing parts, forms and positions, as the truth of an object will hardly be known; for the perception of sight, and so of the rest of the senses, goes no further than the exterior parts of the object presented; and though the perception may be true, when the object is truly presented, yet when the presentation is false, the information must be false also. And it is to be observed, that art, for the most part, makes hermaphroditical,<sup>8</sup> that is, mixed figures, as partly artificial and partly natural: for art may make some metal, as pewter, which is between tin and lead, as also brass, and numerous other things of mixed natures; in the like manner may artificial glasses present objects, partly natural and partly artificial; nay, put the case they can present the natural figure of an object, yet that natural figure may be presented in as monstrous a shape, as it may appear misshapen rather than natural. For example, a louse by the help of a magnifying glass<sup>9</sup> appears like a lobster, where the microscope enlarging and magnifying each part of it makes them bigger and rounder than naturally they are. The truth is, the more the figure by art is magnified, the more it appears misshapen from the natural, in so much as each joint will appear as a diseased, swelled and tumid body, ready and ripe for incision. But mistake me not; I do not say that no glass presents the true picture of an object; but only that magnifying, multiplying, and the like optic glasses may, and do oftentimes present falsely the picture of an exterior object; I say, the picture, because it is not the real body of the object which the glass presents, but the glass only figures or patterns out the picture presented in and by the glass, and there may easily mistakes be committed in taking copies from copies. Nay, artists do confess themselves, that flies and the like will appear of several figures or shapes, according to the several reflections, refractions, mediums and positions of several lights;<sup>1</sup> which if so, how can they tell or judge which is the truest light, position, or medium, that doth present the object naturally as it is? And if not, then an edge may very well seem flat, and a point of a needle a globe; but if the edge of a knife or point of a needle<sup>2</sup> were naturally and really so as the microscope presents them, they would never be so useful as they are; for a flat or broad plain-edged knife would not cut, nor a blunt globe pierce so suddenly another body, neither would or could they pierce without tearing and rending, if their bodies were so uneven; and if the picture of a young beautiful lady should be drawn according to the representation of the microscope, or according to the various refraction and reflection of light through such like glasses, it would be so far from being like her, as it would not be like a human face, but rather a monster, than a picture of nature. Wherefore those that invented microscopes and such like dioptrical glasses at first did, in my opinion, the world more injury than benefit; for this art has intoxicated so many men's brains, and wholly employed their thoughts and bodily actions about phenomena, or the exterior figures of objects, as all better arts and studies are laid aside; nay, those that are not as earnest and active in such employments as they, are, by many of them, accounted unprofitable subjects to the Commonwealth of Learning. But though there be numerous books written of the wonders of these glasses, yet I cannot perceive any such, at best, they are but superficial wonders, as I may call them. But could experimental philosophers find out more beneficial arts than our forefathers have done, either for the better increase of vegetables and brute animals to nourish our bodies, or better and commodious contrivances in the art of architecture to build us houses, or for the advancing of trade and traffic to provide necessities for us to live, or for the decrease of nice<sup>3</sup> distinctions and sophistical disputes in churches, schools and courts of judicature to make men live in unity, peace and neighborly friendship, it would not only be worth their labor, but of as much praise as could be given to them.<sup>4</sup> But as boys that play with watery bubbles,<sup>5</sup> or fling dust<sup>6</sup> into each other's eyes, or make a hobby-horse<sup>7</sup> of snow are worthy of reproof rather than praise, for wasting their time with useless sports; so those that addict themselves to unprofitable arts spend more time than they reap benefit thereby. Nay, could they benefit men either in husbandry, architecture, or the like necessary and profitable employments, yet before the vulgar sort would learn to understand them, the world would want<sup>8</sup> bread to eat, and houses to dwell in, as also clothes to keep them from the inconveniences of the inconstant weather. But truly, although spinsters were most experienced in this art, yet they will never be able to spin silk, thread, or wool, etc. from loose atoms; neither will weavers weave a web of light from the sun's rays, nor an architect build an house of the bubbles of water and air, unless they be poetical spinsters, weavers and architects; and if a painter should draw a louse as big as a crab, and of that shape as the microscope presents, can anybody imagine that a beggar would believe it to be true? But if he did, what advantage would it be to the beggar? For it doth neither instruct him how to avoid breeding them, or how to catch them, or to hinder them from biting.<sup>9</sup> Again: if a painter should paint birds according to those colors the microscope presents, what advantage would it be for fowlers<sup>1</sup> to take them? Truly, no fowler will be able to distinguish several birds through a microscope, neither by their shapes nor colors; they will be better discerned by those that eat their flesh, than by micrographers that look upon their colors and exterior figures through a magnifying-glass.<sup>2</sup> In short, magnifying-glasses are like a high heel to a short leg, which if it be made too high, it is apt to make the wearer fall, and at the best, can do no more than represent exterior figures in a bigger, and so in a more deformed shape and posture than naturally they are; but as for the interior form and motions of a creature, as I said before, they can no more represent them, than telescopes can the interior essence and nature of the sun, and what matter it consists of; for if one that never had seen milk before should look upon it through a microscope, he would never be able to discover the interior parts of milk by that instrument, were it the best that is in the world; neither the whey, nor the butter, nor the curds. Wherefore the best optic is a perfect natural eye and a regular sensitive perception, and the best judge is reason, and the best study is rational contemplation joined with the observations of regular sense, but not deluding arts; for art is not only gross in comparison to nature, but, for the most part, deformed and defective, and at best produces mixed or hermaphroditical figures, that is, a third figure between nature and art: which proves, that natural reason is above artificial sense, as I may call it: wherefore those arts are the best and surest informers that alter nature least, and they the greatest deluders that alter nature most, I mean, the particular nature of each particular creature; (for art is so far from altering infinite Nature, that it is no more in comparison to it than a little fly to an elephant, no not so much, for there is no comparison between finite and infinite). But wise Nature taking delight in variety, her parts, which are her creatures, must of necessity do so too.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON

Isaac Newton (1642–1727) was the posthumous son of a Lincolnshire farmer. As a boy, he invented machines; as an undergraduate, he made major discoveries in optics and mathematics; and in 1667—at twenty-five—he was elected a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Two years later his teacher, Isaac Barrow, resigned the Lucasian Chair of Mathematics in his favor. By then, in secret, Newton had already begun to rethink the universe. His mind worked incessantly, at the highest level of insight, both theoretical and experimental. He designed the first reflecting telescope and explained why the sky looks blue; contemporaneously with Leibniz, he invented calculus; he revolutionized the study of mechanics and physics with three basic laws of motion; and as everyone knows, he discovered the universal law of gravity. Although Newton's Principia Mathematica (Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy, 1687) made possible the modern understanding of the cosmos, his Opticks (1704) had a still greater impact on his contemporaries, not only for its discoveries about light and color but also for its formulation of a proper scientific method. All the while he retained a lifelong fascination with alchemy and religious studies, and these pursuits overlapped with his science.

Newton reported most of his scientific findings in Latin, the language of international scholarship; but when he chose, he could express himself in crisp and vigorous English. His early experiments on light and color were described in a letter to Henry Oldenburg, secretary of the Royal Society, and quickly published in the society's journal. By analyzing the spectrum, Newton had discovered something amazing, the "oddest if not the most considerable detection, which hath hitherto been made in the operations of nature": light is not homogeneous, as everyone thought, but a compound of heterogeneous rays, and white is not the absence of color but a composite of all sorts of colors. Newton assumes that a clear account of his experiments and reasoning will compel assent; when, at the end of his summary, he drops a very heavy word, he clinches the point like a carpenter nailing a box shut. But other scientists resisted the theory. In years to come, Newton would become master of the mint in London and president of the Royal Society. All the while, his fame would continue to grow. "There could be only one Newton," Napoleon was told a century later: "there was only one world to discover."

From A Letter of Mr. Isaac Newton, Professor of the Mathematics in the University of Cambridge, Containing His New Theory about Light and Colors

Sent by the Author to the Publisher from Cambridge, Febr. 6, 1672, in order to Be Communicated to the Royal Society

Sir,

To perform my late promise to you, I shall without further ceremony acquaint you that in the beginning of the year 1666 (at which time I applied myself to the grinding of optic glasses of other figures than spherical) I procured me a triangular glass prism to try therewith the celebrated phenomena of colors. And in order thereto having darkened my chamber and made a small hole in my window-shuts to let in a convenient quantity of the sun's light, I placed my prism at his entrance that it might be thereby refracted<sup>1</sup> to the opposite wall. It was at first a very pleasing divertissement to view the vivid and intense colors produced thereby; but after a while, applying myself to consider them more circumspectly, I became surprised to see them in an oblong form, which according to the received laws of refraction I expected should have been circular.

They were terminated at the sides with straight lines, but at the ends the decay of light was so gradual that it was difficult to determine justly what was their figure; yet they seemed semicircular.

Comparing the length of this colored spectrum with its breadth, I found it about five times greater, a disproportion so extravagant that it excited me to a more than ordinary curiosity of examining from whence it might proceed. I could scarce think that the various thickness of the glass or the termination with shadow or darkness could have any influence on light to produce such an effect; yet I thought it not amiss first to examine those circumstances, and so tried what would happen by transmitting light through parts of the glass of divers thicknesses, or through holes in the window of divers bignesses, or by setting the prism without, so that the light might pass through it and be refracted before it was terminated by the hole. But I found none of those circumstances material. The fashion of the colors was in all these cases the same.

Then I suspected whether by any unevenness in the glass or other contingent irregularity these colors might be thus dilated. And to try this, I took another prism like the former and so placed it that the light, passing through them both, might be refracted contrary ways, and so by the latter returned into that course from which the former had diverted it. For by this means I thought the regular effects of the first prism would be destroyed by the second prism, but the irregular ones more augmented by the multiplicity of refractions. The event was that the light, which by the first prism was diffused into an oblong form, was by the second reduced into an orbicular one with as much regularity as when it did not at all pass through them. So that, whatever was the cause of that length, 'twas not any contingent irregularity.<sup>2</sup>

The gradual removal of these suspicions at length led me to the experimentum crucis,<sup>3</sup> which was this: I took two boards, and placed one of them close behind the prism at the window, so that the light might pass through a small hole made in it for the purpose and fall on the other board, which I placed at about 12 foot distance, having first made a small hole in it also, for some of that incident<sup>4</sup> light to pass through. Then I placed another prism behind this second board so that the light, trajected through both the boards, might pass through that also, and be again refracted before it arrived at the wall. This done, I took the first prism in my hand, and turned it to and fro slowly about its axis, so much as to make the several parts of the image, cast on the second board, successively pass through the hole in it, that I might observe to what places on the wall the second prism would refract them. And I saw by the variation of those places that the light, tending to that end of the image towards which the refraction of the first prism was made, did in the second prism suffer a refraction considerably greater than the light tending to the other end. And so the true cause of the length of that image was detected to be no other than that light consists of rays differently refrangible, which, without any respect to a difference in their incidence, were, according to their degrees of refrangibility, transmitted towards divers parts of the wall.<sup>5</sup>

* * *

I shall now proceed to acquaint you with another more notable difformity<sup>6</sup> in its rays, wherein the origin of colors is infolded. A naturalist<sup>7</sup> would scarce expect to see the science of those become mathematical, and yet I dare affirm that there is as much certainty in it as in any other part of optics. For what I shall tell concerning them is not an hypothesis but most rigid consequence, not conjectured by barely inferring 'tis thus because not otherwise or because it satisfied all phenomena (the philosophers' universal topic) but evinced by the mediation of experiments concluding directly and without any suspicion of doubt. * * *

The doctrine you will find comprehended and illustrated in the following propositions.

1. As the rays of light differ in degrees of refrangibility, so they also differ in their disposition to exhibit this or that particular color. Colors are not qualifications of light, derived from refractions or reflections of natural bodies (as 'tis generally believed), but original and connate properties which in divers rays are divers. Some rays are disposed to exhibit a red color and no other; some a yellow and no other, some a green and no other, and so of the rest. Nor are there only rays proper and particular to the more eminent colors, but even to all their intermediate gradations.

2. To the same degree of refrangibility ever belongs the same color, and to the same color ever belongs the same degree of refrangibility. The least refrangible rays are all disposed to exhibit a red color, and contrarily those rays which are disposed to exhibit a red color are all the least refrangible. So the most refrangible rays are all disposed to exhibit a deep violet color, and contrarily those which are apt to exhibit such a violet color are all the most refrangible. And so to all the intermediate colors in a continued series belong intermediate degrees of refrangibility. And this analogy 'twixt colors and refrangibility is very precise and strict; the rays always either exactly agreeing in both or proportionally disagreeing in both.

3. The species of color and degree of refrangibility proper to any particular sort of rays is not mutable by refraction, nor by reflection from natural bodies, nor by any other cause that I could yet observe. When any one sort of rays hath been well parted from those of other kinds, it hath afterwards obstinately retained its color, notwithstanding my utmost endeavors to change it. I have refracted it with prisms and reflected it with bodies which in daylight were of other colors; I have intercepted it with the colored film of air interceding two compressed plates of glass; transmitted it through colored mediums and through mediums irradiated with other sorts of rays, and diversely terminated it; and yet could never produce any new color out of it. It would by contracting or dilating become more brisk or faint and by the loss of many rays in some cases very obscure and dark; but I could never see it changed in specie.<sup>8</sup>

4. Yet seeming transmutations of colors may be made, where there is any mixture of divers sorts of rays. For in such mixtures, the component colors appear not, but by their mutual allaying each other constitute a middling color. And therefore, if by refraction or any other of the aforesaid causes the difform rays latent in such a mixture be separated, there shall emerge colors different from the color of the composition. Which colors are not new generated, but only made apparent by being parted; for if they be again entirely mixed and blended together, they will again compose that color which they did before separation. And for the same reason, transmutations made by the convening of divers colors are not real; for when the difform rays are again severed, they will exhibit the very same colors which they did before they entered the composition—as you see blue and yellow powders when finely mixed appear to the naked eye green, and yet the colors of the component corpuscles are not thereby transmuted, but only blended. For, when viewed with a good microscope, they still appear blue and yellow interspersedly.

5. There are therefore two sorts of colors: the one original and simple, the other compounded of these. The original or primary colors are red, yellow, green, blue, and a violet-purple, together with orange, indigo, and an indefinite variety of intermediate graduations.

6. The same colors in specie with these primary ones may be also produced by composition. For a mixture of yellow and blue makes green; of red and yellow makes orange; of orange and yellowish green makes yellow. And in general, if any two colors be mixed which, in the series of those generated by the prism, are not too far distant one from another, they by their mutual alloy compound that color which in the said series appeareth in the mid-way between them. But those which are situated at too great a distance, do not so. Orange and indigo produce not the intermediate green, nor scarlet and green the intermediate yellow.

7. But the most surprising and wonderful composition was that of whiteness. There is no one sort of rays which alone can exhibit this. 'Tis ever compounded, and to its composition are requisite all the aforesaid primary colors, mixed in a due proportion. I have often with admiration beheld that all the colors of the prism, being made to converge, and thereby to be again mixed as they were in the light before it was incident upon the prism, reproduced light entirely and perfectly white, and not at all sensibly differing from a direct light of the sun, unless when the glasses I used were not sufficiently clear; for then they would a little incline it to their color.

8. Hence therefore it comes to pass that whiteness is the usual color of light, for light is a confused aggregate of rays endued with all sorts of colors, as they are promiscuously darted from the various parts of luminous bodies. And of such a confused aggregate, as I said, is generated whiteness, if there be a due proportion of the ingredients; but if any one predominate, the light must incline to that color, as it happens in the blue flame of brimstone, the yellow flame of a candle, and the various colors of the fixed stars.

9. These things considered, the manner how colors are produced by the prism is evident. For of the rays constituting the incident light, since those which differ in color proportionally differ in refrangibility, they by their unequal refractions must be severed and dispersed into an oblong form in an orderly succession from the least refracted scarlet to the most refracted violet. And for the same reason it is that objects, when looked upon through a prism, appear colored. For the difform rays, by their unequal refractions, are made to diverge towards several parts of the retina, and there express the images of things colored, as in the former case they did the sun's image upon a wall. And by this inequality of refractions they become not only colored, but also very confused and indistinct.

10. Why the colors of the rainbow appear in falling drops of rain is also from hence evident. For those drops which refract the rays disposed to appear purple in greatest quantity to the spectator's eye, refract the rays of other sorts so much less as to make them pass beside it;<sup>9</sup> and such are the drops on the inside of the primary bow and on the outside of the secondary or exterior one. So those drops which refract in greatest plenty the rays apt to appear red toward the spectator's eye, refract those of other sorts so much more as to make them pass beside it; and such are the drops on the exterior part of the primary and interior part of the secondary bow.

JOHN LOCKE

John Locke's An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) is "a history-book," according to Laurence Sterne, "of what passes in a man's own mind." Like Montaigne's essays, it aims to explore the human mind in general by closely watching one particular mind. When Locke (1632–1704) analyzed his ideas, the ways they were acquired and put together, he found they were clear when they were based on direct sensed experience and adequate when they were clear. Usually, it appeared, problems occurred when basic ideas were blurred or confused or did not refer to anything determinate. Thus a critical analysis of the ideas in an individual mind could lead straight to a rule about adequate ideas in general and the sort of subject where adequate ideas were possible. On the basis of such a limitation, individuals might reach rational agreement with one another.

Locke's new "way of ideas" strikes a humble, antidogmatic note, but readers quickly perceived its far-reaching implications. By basing knowledge on the ideas immediately "before the mind," Locke comports with and helps codify the movement of his times away from the authority of traditions of medieval, scholastic philosophy. His understanding of how the mind works—empirically and inductively, building up from sensed particulars—bolstered the scientific project. His approach also alarmed some divines who argued that the foundation of human life—the mysteries of faith—could never be reduced to clear, distinct ideas. Locke indirectly accepts the Christian scriptures in the Essay in the midst of his famous critique of "enthusiasm," the belief in private revelation, but his main impulse is to restrain rather than to encourage religious speculations. (His fullest theological work, The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695, argues that scriptural revelation is necessary for right-thinking people but not incompatible with ordinary reasonable beliefs gathered from personal experience and history.) The Essay also contains an unsettling discussion of personal identity (in the chapter "Of Identity and Diversity" added to the second edition in 1694). Locke argues that a person's sense of selfhood derives not from the "identity of soul" but rather from "consciousness of present and past actions": I am myself now because I remember my past, not because a unique substance ("me") underlies everything I experience. This account drew critical responses from numerous distinguished thinkers throughout the eighteenth century.

Locke spent his life in thought. His background and connections were all with the Puritan movement, but he was disillusioned early with the enthusiastic moods and persecutions to which he found the Puritans prone. Having a small but steady private income, he became a student, chiefly at Oxford, learning enough medicine to act as a physician and becoming interested in new currents in natural philosophy. He was later made a fellow of the Royal Society. After 1667, he was personal physician and tutor in the household of a violent, crafty politician, the first Earl of Shaftesbury (Dryden's "Achitophel"). But Locke himself was always a grave, dispassionate man. On one occasion, Shaftesbury's political enemies at Oxford had Locke watched for several years on end, during which he was not heard to say one word either critical of the government or favorable to it. When times are turbulent, so much discretion is suspicious in itself, and Locke found it convenient to go abroad for several years during the 1680s. He lived quietly in Holland and pursued his thoughts. The Glorious Revolution of 1688 and the accession of William III brought him back to England and made possible the publication of the Essay, on which he had been working for many years. Its publication foreshadowed the coming age, not only in the positive ideas that the book advanced but in the quiet way it set aside as insoluble a range of problems about absolute authority and absolute assurance that had torn society apart earlier in the seventeenth century.

From An Essay Concerning Human Understanding

From The Epistle to the Reader

Reader,

I here put into thy hands what has been the diversion of some of my idle and heavy hours; if it has the good luck to prove so of any of thine, and thou hast but half so much pleasure in reading as I had in writing it, thou wilt as little think thy money, as I do my pains, ill-bestowed. Mistake not this for a commendation of my work; nor conclude, because I was pleased with the doing of it, that therefore I am fondly taken with it now it is done. He that hawks at larks and sparrows, has no less sport, though a much less considerable quarry, than he that flies at nobler game: and he is little acquainted with the subject of this treatise, the Understanding, who does not know, that as it is the most elevated faculty of the soul, so it is employed with a greater and more constant delight than any of the other. Its searches after truth are a sort of hawking and hunting, wherein the very pursuit makes a great part of the pleasure. Every step the mind takes in its progress towards knowledge makes some discovery, which is not only new, but the best, too, for the time at least.

For the understanding, like the eye, judging of objects only by its own sight, cannot but be pleased with what it discovers, having less regret for what has escaped it, because it is unknown. Thus he who has raised himself above the alms-basket, and, not content to live lazily on scraps of begged opinions, sets his own thoughts on work to find and follow truth, will (whatever he lights on) not miss the hunter's satisfaction; every moment of his pursuit will reward his pains with some delight, and he will have reason to think his time not ill-spent, even when he cannot much boast of any great acquisition.

This, reader, is the entertainment of those who let loose their own thoughts, and follow them in writing; which thou oughtest not to envy them, since they afford thee an opportunity of the like diversion, if thou wilt make use of thy own thoughts in reading. It is to them, if they are thy own, that I refer myself; but if they are taken upon trust from others, it is no great matter what they are, they not following truth, but some meaner consideration; and it is not worthwhile to be concerned what he says or thinks, who says or thinks only as he is directed by another. If thou judgest for thyself, I know thou wilt judge candidly; and then I shall not be harmed or offended, whatever be thy censure. For, though it be certain that there is nothing in this treatise of the truth whereof I am not fully persuaded, yet I consider myself as liable to mistakes as I can think thee; and know that this book must stand or fall with thee, not by any opinion I have of it, but thy own. If thou findest little in it new or instructive to thee, thou art not to blame me for it. It was not meant for those that had already mastered this subject, and made a thorough acquaintance with their own understandings, but for my own information, and the satisfaction of a few friends, who acknowledged themselves not to have sufficiently considered it. Were it fit to trouble thee with the history of this Essay, I should tell thee, that five or six friends, meeting at my chamber, and discoursing on a subject very remote from this, found themselves quickly at a stand by the difficulties that rose on every side. After we had awhile puzzled ourselves, without coming any nearer a resolution of those doubts which perplexed us, it came into my thoughts, that we took a wrong course; and that, before we set ourselves upon inquiries of that nature, it was necessary to examine our own abilities, and see what objects our understandings were or were not fitted to deal with. This I proposed to the company, who all readily assented; and thereupon it was agreed, that this should be our first inquiry. Some hasty and undigested thoughts, on a subject I had never before considered, which I set down against<sup>1</sup> our next meeting, gave the first entrance into this discourse, which, having been thus begun by chance, was continued by entreaty; written by incoherent parcels; and, after long intervals of neglect, resumed again, as my humor or occasions permitted; and at last, in a retirement, where an attendance on my health gave me leisure, it was brought into that order thou now seest it.

This discontinued way of writing may have occasioned, besides others, two contrary faults; viz., that too little and too much may be said in it. If thou findest anything wanting, I shall be glad that what I have writ gives thee any desire that I should have gone farther: if it seems too much to thee, thou must blame the subject; for when I first put pen to paper, I thought all I should have to say on this matter would have been contained in one sheet of paper; but the farther I went, the larger prospect I had: new discoveries led me still on, and so it grew insensibly to the bulk it now appears in. I will not deny but possibly it might be reduced to a narrower compass than it is; and that some parts of it might be contracted; the way it has been writ in, by catches,<sup>2</sup> and many long intervals of interruption, being apt to cause some repetitions. But, to confess the truth, I am now too lazy or too busy to make it shorter.

* * * I pretend not to publish this Essay for the information of men of large thoughts and quick apprehensions; to such masters of knowledge, I profess myself a scholar, and therefore warn them beforehand not to expect anything here but what, being spun out of my own coarse thoughts, is fitted to men of my own size, to whom, perhaps, it will not be unacceptable that I have taken some pains to make plain and familiar to their thoughts some truths, which established prejudice or the abstractness of the ideas themselves might render difficult.

The commonwealth of learning is not at this time without master-builders, whose mighty designs in advancing, the sciences will leave lasting monuments to the admiration of posterity: but everyone must not hope to be a Boyle or a Sydenham; and in an age that produces such masters as the great Huygenius, and the incomparable Mr. Newton,<sup>3</sup> with some other of that strain, it is ambition enough to be employed as an under-laborer in clearing the ground a little, and removing some of the rubbish that lies in the way to knowledge; which certainly had been very much more advanced in the world, if the endeavors of ingenious and industrious men had not been much cumbered with the learned but frivolous use of uncouth, affected, or unintelligible terms introduced into the sciences, and there made an art of to that degree that philosophy, which is nothing but the true knowledge of things, was thought unfit or incapable to be brought into well-bred company and polite conversation.<sup>4</sup> Vague and insignificant forms of speech, and abuse of language, have so long passed for mysteries of science; and hard or misapplied words, with little or no meaning, have, by prescription, such a right to be mistaken for deep learning and height of speculation; that it will not be easy to persuade either those who speak or those who hear them, that they are but the covers of ignorance, and hindrance of true knowledge. * * *

The booksellers, preparing for the fourth edition of my Essay, gave me notice of it, that I might, if I had leisure, make any additions or alterations I should think fit. Whereupon I thought it convenient to advertise the reader, that besides several corrections I had made here and there, there was one alteration which it was necessary to mention, because it ran through the whole book, and is of consequence to be rightly understood. What I thereupon said, was this:—

“Clear and distinct ideas” are terms which, though familiar and frequent in men’s mouths, I have reason to think everyone who uses does not perfectly understand. And possibly it is but here and there one who gives himself the trouble to consider them so far as to know what he himself or others precisely mean by them. I have therefore, in most places, chose to put “determinate” or “determined,”<sup>5</sup> instead of “clear” and “distinct,” as more likely to direct men’s thoughts to my meaning in this matter. By those denominations, I mean some object in the mind, and consequently determined, i.e., such as it is there seen and perceived to be. This, I think, may fitly be called a "determinate" or "determined" idea, when such as it is at any time objectively in the mind, and so determined there, it is annexed, and without variation determined, to a name or articulate sound which is to be steadily the sign of that very same object of the mind, or determinate idea.

To explain this a little more particularly: By "determinate," when applied to a simple idea, I mean that simple appearance which the mind has in its view, or perceives in itself, when that idea is said to be in it. By "determined," when applied to a complex idea, I mean such an one as consists of a determinate number of certain simple or less complex ideas, joined in such a proportion and situation as the mind has before its view, and sees in itself, when that idea is present in it, or should be present in it, when a man gives a name to it. I say "should be"; because it is not everyone, nor perhaps anyone, who is so careful of his language as to use no word till he views in his mind the precise determined idea which he resolves to make it the sign of. The want of this is the cause of no small obscurity and confusion in men's thoughts and discourses.

I know there are not words enough in any language to answer all the variety of ideas that enter into men's discourses and reasonings. But this hinders not but that when anyone uses any term, he may have in his mind a determined idea which he makes it the sign of, and to which he should keep it steadily annexed during that present discourse. Where he does not or cannot do this, he in vain pretends to clear or distinct ideas: it is plain his are not so; and therefore there can be expected nothing but obscurity and confusion, where such terms are made use of which have not such a precise determination.

Upon this ground I have thought "determined ideas" a way of speaking less liable to mistake than "clear and distinct"; and where men have got such determined ideas of all that they reason, inquire, or argue about, they will find a great part of their doubts and disputes at an end; the greatest part of the questions and controversies that perplex mankind depending on the doubtful and uncertain use of words, or (which is the same) indetermined ideas, which they are made to stand for. I have made choice of these terms to signify, 1. Some immediate object of the mind, which it perceives and has before it, distinct from the sound it uses as a sign of it. 2. That this idea, thus determined, i.e., which the mind has in itself, and knows and sees there, be determined without any change to that name, and that name determined to that precise idea. If men had such determined ideas in their inquiries and discourses, they would both discern how far their own inquiries and discourses went, and avoid the greatest part of the disputes and wranglings they have with others.

ROBERT BOYLE

Robert Boyle (1627–1691), the Anglo-Irish son of a powerful earl, brought his gentlemanly status and his considerable learning and skill in experimentation to his advocacy of science. Boyle became interested in natural philosophy and experiment in the late 1640s and in the 1650s attended the meetings that John Wilkins hosted for like-minded thinkers in Oxford. This group—whose meetings Boyle would later host in his own house—formed the core of what would become the Royal Society: Boyle was at the Society's first official meeting and would become a powerful representative of its scientific program. Against those who complained that the Royal Society had "done nothing" significant in its early years, one contemporary, Joseph Glanvill, wrote that "the Illustrious Mr. Boyle" had single-handedly "done enough" that, if he "lived in those days, when men godded their benefactors, he could not have missed one of the first places among their deified mortals."

Boyle's scientific publications are too many to list. He is best known to students today for "Boyle's law" concerning air pressure. This discovery was part of his influential work with the air pump, a piece of cutting-edge scientific equipment with a vacuum chamber. Boyle also influentially challenged the older Aristotelian ideas about the nature of matter still being taught in schools. He argued, instead, for a "mechanical philosophy," and he worked out a doctrine of "corpuscularianism," in which little atom-like corpuscles compose everything—though his use of "corpuscle" instead of "atom" helped him distinguish what he understood as his Christian philosophy from the atheism of ancient atomism. Indeed, a central theme of Boyle's work throughout his career was the compatibility of science and his Christian religion. This was part of Boyle's legacy too: upon his death, his will founded a series of influential "Boyle lectures" in defense of Christianity.

Boyle had an extremely various and active research agenda. The “General Heads,” included here, were among Boyle’s many publications in the Philosophical Transactions and reflect another aspect of his scientific program: his interest in the larger-scale projects of information collection promoted by Francis Bacon. Here, Boyle outlines a series of inquiries that any natural historian could ask about the places they traveled, and the Royal Society was interested in collecting answers from all over the globe. Such a project enacted the empiricist idea that collecting particulars might lead to eventual generalizations and insights, which in turn might provide a foundation “to superstruct,” or build, a whole philosophy upon. Boyle’s inquiries also illuminate science’s close links with early imperial projects and its interest in racial and geographical differences. What we today might think of as separate realms of nature and culture are closely intertwined here.

General Heads for a Natural History of a Country, Great or Small<sup>1</sup>

It having been already intimated (Num. 8 of Phil. Transact. p. 140, 141)<sup>2</sup> that diverse philosophers aim, among other things, at the composing of a good natural history, to superstruct in time a solid and useful philosophy upon; and it being of no slight importance to be furnished with pertinent heads,<sup>3</sup> for the direction of inquirers; that lately named benefactor to experimental philosophy<sup>4</sup> has been pleased to communicate, for the ends abovesaid, the following articles, which (as himself did signify) belong to one of his essays of the unpublished part of the Usefulness of Nat. and Experimen. Philosophy.<sup>5</sup>

But first he premises, that what follows is designed only to point at the more general heads of inquiry, which the proposer ignores not to be diverse of them very comprehensive,<sup>6</sup> in so much that, about some of the subordinate subjects, perhaps too not the most fertile, he has drawn up articles of inquisition about particulars, that take up near as much room as what is here to be delivered of this matter.<sup>7</sup>

The Heads themselves follow;

The things to be observed in such a history may be variously (and almost at pleasure) divided: As, into supraterraneous, terrestrial, and subterraneous;<sup>8</sup> and, otherwise: but we will at present distinguish them into those things that respect the heavens, or concern the air, the water, or the earth.

1. To the first sort of particulars belong the longitude and latitude of the place (that being of moment<sup>9</sup> in reference to observations about the air etc.) and consequently the length of the longest and shortest days and nights, the climate, parallels etc., what fixed stars are and what not seen there:

what constellations 'tis said to be subject to? Whereunto may be added other astrological matters, if they be thought worth mentioning.

2. About the air may be observed its temperature, as to the first four qualities (commonly so called)<sup>1</sup> and the measures of them: its weight, clearness, refractive power: its subtlety or grossness: its abounding with or wanting an esurine<sup>2</sup> salt: its variations according to the seasons of the year, and the times of the day; what duration the several kinds of weather usually have: what meteors it is most or least wont to breed; and in what order they are generated; and how long they usually last: especially what winds it is subject to; whether any of them be stated and ordinary, etc. What diseases are epidemical that are supposed<sup>3</sup> to flow from the air: what other diseases, wherein that hath a share, the country is subject to; the plague and contagious sickness: what is the usual salubrity or insalubrity of the air; and with what constitutions<sup>4</sup> it agrees better or worse than others.
3. About the water may be observed, the sea, its depth, degree of saltness, tides, currents, etc. Next, rivers, their bigness, length, course, inundations, goodness, levity<sup>5</sup> (or their contraries) of waters, etc. Then, lakes, ponds, springs, and especially mineral waters, their kinds, qualities, virtues, and how examined. To the waters belong also fishes, what kinds of them (whether salt or fresh-water fish) are to be found in the country; their store, bigness, goodness, seasons, haunts, peculiarities of any kind, and the ways of taking them, especially those that are not purely mechanical.<sup>6</sup>
4. In the earth may be observed
  1. Itself.
  2. Its inhabitants and its productions, and these external and internal.

First, in the earth itself may be observed, its dimensions, situation, east, west, north, and south: its figure, its plains and valleys, and their extents, its hills and mountains, and the height of the tallest, both in reference to the neighboring valleys or plains, and in reference to the level of the seas: as also, whether the mountains lie scattered or in ridges, and whether those run north and south or east and west, etc. What promontories,<sup>7</sup> fiery or smoking hills, &c the country has, or hath not: whether the country be coherent, or much broken into islands. What the magnetical declination<sup>8</sup> is in several places, and the variations of that declination in the same place (and, if either of those be very considerable, then what circumstances may assist one to guess at the reason, as subterranean<sup>9</sup> fires, the vicinity of iron-mines &c.), what the nature of the soil is, whether clays, sandy, etc. or good mold; and what grains, fruits, and other vegetables do the most naturally agree with it: as also, by what particular arts and industries the inhabitants improve the advantages and remedy the inconveniences of their soil: what hidden qualities the soil may have (as that of Ireland, against venomous beasts,<sup>1</sup> etc.).

Secondly, above the ignobler productions of the earth, there must be careful account given of the inhabitants themselves, both natives and strangers that have been long settled there: and in particular, their stature, shape, color, features, strength, agility, beauty (or the want of it), complexions, hair, diet, inclinations, and customs that seem not due to education. As to their women (beside the other things) may be observed their fruitfulness or barrenness; their hard or easy labor, etc. And both in women and men must be taken notice of what diseases they are subject to, and in these whether there be any symptom or any other circumstance that is unusual and remarkable.

As to the external productions of the earth, the inquiries may be such as these: what grasses, grains, herbs, (garden and wild) flowers, fruit-trees, timber-trees (especially any trees whose wood is considerable), coppices,<sup>2</sup> groves, woods, forests, etc. the country has or wants: what peculiarities are observable in any of them: what soils they most like or dislike; and with what culture<sup>3</sup> they thrive best. What animals the country has or wants, both as to wild beasts, hawks, and other birds of prey; and as to poultry and cattle of all sorts, and particularly whether it have any animals that are not common, or anything that is peculiar in those that are so.

The internal productions or concealments of the earth are here understood to be the riches that lie hid under the ground and are not already referred to other inquiries.

Among these subterranean observations may be taken notice of, what sorts of minerals of any kind they want, as well as what they have; then, what quarries the country affords and the particular conditions both of the quarries and the stones: as also, how the beds of stone lie, in reference to north and south etc. What clays and earths it affords, as tobacco-pipe-clay, marls, fuller's earths, earths for potter's wares, boluses and other medicated earths;<sup>4</sup> what other minerals it yields, as coals, salt-mines, or salt-springs, alum, vitriol, sulphur, etc. What metals the country yields, and a description of the mines, their number, situation, depth, signs, waters, damp, quantities of ore, goodness of ore, extraneous things and ways of reducing their ores into metals, etc.

To these general articles of inquiries (sayeth their proposer)<sup>5</sup> should be added; 1. Inquiries about traditions concerning all particular things relating to that country, as either peculiar to it or at least uncommon elsewhere. 2. Inquiries that require learning or skill in the answerer: to which should be subjoined proposals of ways to enable men to give answers to these more difficult inquiries.

Thus far our author, who, as he has been pleased to impart these general (but yet very comprehensive and greatly directive<sup>6</sup>) articles; so, 'tis hoped from his own late intimation, that he will shortly enlarge them with particular and subordinate ones. These, in the meantime, were thought fit to be published, that the inquisitive and curious might, by such an assistance, be invited not to delay their searches or matters that are so highly conducive to the improvement of true philosophy and the welfare of mankind.

JOSEPH ADDISON

In his periodical writing in the Tatler and Spectator (see p. 281), Joseph Addison celebrated science and satirized it, thus offering a rich example of a thoughtful contemporary engaging with new intellectual currents. As his writings show, science could seem closely intertwined both with the noblest speculations of religion and with an extremely mockable form of obsessive collecting. As a university student, Addison offered a Latin oration praising Descartes' challenge to Aristotelianism, and later he helped arrange an influential series of London coffeehouse lectures on astronomy by Newton's chosen successor, the eccentric William Whiston. In Spectator 519, Addison articulated some of the excitement and importance he found in new scientific discoveries. But he also satirized certain kinds and uses of science. In Tatler 216, he repurposed the figure of Nicholas Gimcrack, the ridiculous experimenter skewered in Thomas Shadwell's 1676 play The Virtuoso. In the play, Gimcrack loses money and relationships in pursuit of a completely useless and trivial brand of science: he boasts, for instance, that he has spent "whole days and nights" studying "a small black speck" stuck to the "anus" of an ant inside an egg. (Many contemporaries assumed Shadwell was mocking Robert Hooke.) Decades later, Addison extends this satire by imagining Gimcrack's will—a document suggesting that science's focus on small things might lead to a failure to value things and people properly.

Nugis addere pondus<sup>1</sup> HORACE, Epistles 1.19.42

From my own apartment, August 25.

Nature is full of wonders; every atom is a standing miracle, and endowed with such qualities as could not be impressed on it by a power and wisdom less than infinite. For this reason I would not discourage any searches that are made into the most minute and trivial parts of the creation. However, since the world abounds in the noblest fields of speculation, it is, methinks, the mark of a little genius to be wholly conversant among insects, reptiles, animalcules, and these trifling rarities that furnish out the apartment of a Virtuoso.<sup>2</sup>

There are some men whose heads are so oddly turned this way, that though they are utter strangers to the common occurrences of life, they are able to discover the sex of a cockle, or describe the generation of a mite in all its circumstances. They are so little versed in the world, that they scarce know a horse from an ox; but at the same time will tell you with a great deal of gravity, that a flea is a rhinoceros, and a snail an hermaphrodite. I have known one of these whimsical philosophers who has set a greater value upon a collection of spiders than he would upon a flock of sheep, and has sold his coat off his back to purchase a tarantula.

I would not have a scholar wholly unacquainted with these secrets and curiosities of nature; but certainly the mind of man, that is capable of so much higher contemplations, should not be altogether fixed upon such mean<sup>3</sup> and disproportioned objects. Observations of this kind are apt to alienate us too much from the knowledge of the world, and to make us serious upon trifles, by which means they expose philosophy to the ridicule of the witty, and contempt of the ignorant. In short, studies of this nature should be the diversions, relaxations and amusements, not the care, business, and concern of life.

It is indeed wonderful<sup>4</sup> to consider that there should be a sort of learned men who are wholly employed in gathering together the refuse of nature, if I may call it so, and hoarding up in their chests and cabinets such creatures as others industriously avoid the sight of. One does not know how to mention some of the most precious parts of their treasure, without a kind of an apology for it. I have been shewn a beetle valued at 20 crowns,<sup>5</sup> and a toad at an hundred. But we must take this for a general rule, that whatever appears trivial or obscene in the common notions of the world looks grave and philosophical in the eye of a Virtuoso.

To show this humor in its perfection, I shall present my reader with the legacy of a certain Virtuoso, who laid out a considerable estate<sup>6</sup> in natural rarities and curiosities, which upon his deathbed he bequeathed to his relations and friends in the following words:

The will of a virtuoso.

I Nicholas Gimcrack<sup>7</sup> being in sound health of mind, but in great weakness of body, do by this my last will and testament bestow my worldly goods and chattels in manner following:

Imprimis,<sup>8</sup> To my dear wife,

One box of butterflies,<sup>9</sup>

One drawer of shells,

A female skeleton,

A dried cockatrice.<sup>1</sup>

Item, To my daughter Elizabeth, my receipt for preserving dead caterpillars; as also my preparations of winter may-dew and embryo pickle.<sup>2</sup>

Item, To my little daughter Fanny,

Three crocodile's eggs.

And upon the birth of her first child, if she marries with her mother's consent,

The nest of an hummingbird.

Item, To my eldest brother, as an acknowledgment for the lands
he has vested in<sup>3</sup> my son Charles, I bequeath

My last year's collection of grasshoppers.

Item, To his daughter Susanna, being his only child, I bequeath my

English weeds pasted on royal paper.

With my large folio<sup>4</sup> of Indian cabbage.

Item, To my learned and worthy friend Dr. Johannes Elscrickius, professor in anatomy, and my associate in the studies of nature, as an eternal monument of my affection and friendship for him, I bequeath

My rat's testicles, and

Whale's pizzle,<sup>5</sup>

To him and his issue-male,<sup>6</sup> and in default of such issue in the said
Dr. Elscrickius, then to return to my executor and his heirs for ever.

Having fully provided for my nephew Isaac, by making over to him some years since

A horned scarabaeus<sup>7</sup>

The skin of a rattle-snake, and

The mummy of an Egyptian king,

I make no further provision for him in this my will.

My eldest son John having spoken disrespectfully of his little sister whom I keep by me in spirits of wine,<sup>8</sup> and in many other instances behaved himself undutifully towards me, I do disinherit and wholly cut off from any part of this my personal estate, by giving him a single cockle shell.

To my second son Charles I give and bequeath all my flowers, plants, minerals, mosses, shells, pebbles, fossils, beetles, butterflies, caterpillars, grasshoppers, and vermin not above specified; as also all my monsters,<sup>9</sup> both wet and dry, making the said Charles whole and sole executor of this my last will and testament; he paying or causing to be paid the aforesaid legacies within the space of six months after my decease. And I do hereby revoke all other wills whatsoever by me formerly made.

[On the Scale of Being]

The Spectator 519, October 25, 1712

*Inde hominum pecudumque genus, vitaeque
volantum,
Et quae marmoreo fert monstra sub aequore pontus.*<sup>1</sup>

—VIRGIL, Aeneid 6.728–29

Though there is a great deal of pleasure in contemplating the material world, by which I mean that system of bodies into which nature has so curiously wrought the mass of dead matter, with the several relations which those bodies bear to one another, there is still, methinks, something more wonderful and surprising in contemplations on the world of life, by which I mean all those animals with which every part of the universe is furnished. The material world is only the shell of the universe: the world of life are its inhabitants.

If we consider those parts of the material world which lie the nearest to us and are, therefore, subject to our observations and inquiries, it is amazing to consider the infinity of animals with which it is stocked. Every part of matter is peopled. Every green leaf swarms with inhabitants. There is scarce a single humor in the body of a man, or of any other animal, in which our glasses<sup>2</sup> do not discover myriads of living creatures. The surface of animals is also covered with other animals which are, in the same manner, the basis of other animals that live upon it; nay, we find in the most solid bodies, as in marble itself, innumerable cells and cavities that are crowded with such imperceptible inhabitants as are too little for the naked eye to discover. On the other hand, if we look into the more bulky parts of nature, we see the seas, lakes, and rivers teeming with numberless kinds of living creatures. We find every mountain and marsh, wilderness and wood, plentifully stocked with birds and beasts, and every part of matter affording proper necessities and conveniences for the livelihood of multitudes which inhabit it.

The author of The Plurality of Worlds<sup>3</sup> draws a very good argument upon this consideration for the peopling of every planet, as indeed it seems very probable from the analogy of reason that, if no part of matter which we are acquainted with lies waste and useless, those great bodies, which are at such a distance from us, should not be desert and unpeopled, but rather that they should be furnished with beings adapted to their respective situations.

Existence is a blessing to those beings only which are endowed with perception and is, in a manner, thrown away upon dead matter any further than as it is subservient to beings which are conscious of their existence. Accordingly, we find from the bodies which lie under our observation that matter is only made as the basis and support of animals and that there is no more of the one than what is necessary for the existence of the other.

Infinite Goodness is of so communicative a nature that it seems to delight in the conferring of existence upon every degree of perceptive being. As this is a speculation which I have often pursued with great pleasure to myself, I shall enlarge farther upon it, by considering that part of the scale of beings which comes within our knowledge.

There are some living creatures which are raised but just above dead matter. To mention only that species of shellfish, which are formed in the fashion of a cone, that grow to the surface of several rocks and immediately die upon their being severed from the place where they grow. There are many other creatures but one remove from these, which have no other sense besides that of feeling and taste. Others have still an additional one of hearing; others of smell, and others of sight. It is wonderful to observe by what a gradual progress the world of life advances through a prodigious variety of species before a creature is formed that is complete in all its senses; and, even among these, there is such a different degree of perfection in the sense which one animal enjoys, beyond what appears in another, that, though the sense in different animals be distinguished by the same common denomination, it seems almost of a different nature. If after this we look into the several inward perfections of cunning and sagacity, or what we generally call instinct, we find them rising after the same manner, imperceptibly, one above another, and receiving additional improvements, according to the species in which they are implanted. This progress in nature is so very gradual that the most perfect of an inferior species comes very near to the most imperfect of that which is immediately above it.

The exuberant and overflowing goodness of the Supreme Being, whose mercy extends to all his works, is plainly seen, as I have before hinted, from his having made so very little matter, at least what falls within our knowledge, that does not swarm with life. Nor is his goodness less seen in the diversity than in the multitude of living creatures. Had he only made one species of animals, none of the rest would have enjoyed the happiness of existence; he has, therefore, specified in his creation every degree of life, every capacity of being. The whole chasm in nature, from a plant to a man, is filled up with diverse kinds of creatures, rising one over another by such a gentle and easy ascent that the little transitions and deviations from one species to another are almost insensible. This intermediate space is so well husbanded and managed that there is scarce a degree of perception which does not appear in some one part of the world of life. Is the goodness or wisdom of the Divine Being more manifested in this his proceeding?

There is a consequence, besides those I have already mentioned, which seems very naturally deducible from the foregoing considerations. If the scale of being rises by such a regular progress so high as man, we may by a parity of reason<sup>4</sup> suppose that it still proceeds gradually through those beings which are of a superior nature to him, since there is an infinitely greater space and room for different degrees of perfection between the Supreme Being and man than between man and the most despicable insect. This consequence of so great a variety of beings which are superior to us, from that variety which is inferior to us, is made by Mr. Locke<sup>5</sup> in a passage which I shall here set down after having premised that, notwithstanding there is such infinite room between man and his Maker for the creative power to exert itself in, it is impossible that it should ever be filled up, since there will be still an infinite gap or distance between the highest created being and the Power which produced him:

That there should be more species of intelligent creatures above us than there are of sensible and material below, is probable to me from hence: That in all the visible corporeal world we see no chasms or no gaps. All quite down from us, the descent is by easy steps and a continued series of things that, in each remove, differ very little from the other. There are fishes that have wings and are not strangers to the airy region; and there are some birds that are inhabitants of the water, whose blood is cold as fishes and their flesh so like in taste that the scrupulous are allowed them on fish days.<sup>6</sup> There are animals so near of kin both to birds and beasts that they are in the middle between both: amphibious animals link the terrestrial and aquatic together; seals live at land and at sea, and porpoises have the warm blood and entrails of a hog, not to mention what is confidently reported of mermaids or seamen. There are some brutes that seem to have as much knowledge and reason as some that are called men; and the animal and vegetable kingdoms are so nearly joined that, if you will take the lowest of one and the highest of the other, there will scarce be perceived any great difference between them; and so on, till we come to the lowest and the most inorganical parts of matter, we shall find everywhere that the several species are linked together and differ but in almost insensible degrees. And when we consider the infinite power and wisdom of the Maker, we have reason to think that it is suitable to the magnificent harmony of the universe and the great design and infinite goodness of the Architect, that the species of creatures should also, by gentle degrees, ascend upward from us toward his infinite perfection, as we see they gradually descend from us downward; which, if it be probable, we have reason to be persuaded that there are far more species of creatures above us than there are beneath, we being in degrees of perfection much more remote from the infinite being of God than we are from the lowest state of being and that which approaches nearest to nothing. And yet of all those distinct species we have no clear distinct ideas.

In this system of being, there is no creature so wonderful in its nature, and which so much deserves our particular attention, as man, who fills up the middle space between the animal and intellectual nature, the visible and invisible world, and is that link in the chain of beings which has been often termed the nexus utriusque mundi.<sup>7</sup> So that he who, in one respect, is associated with angels and archangels, may look upon a Being of infinite perfection as his father, and the highest order of spirits as his brethren, may, in another respect, say to corruption, "Thou art my father," and to the worm, "Thou art my mother and my sister."<sup>8</sup>

JOHN WILMOT, SECOND EARL OF ROCHESTER 1647–1680

John Wilmot, second Earl of Rochester, was the precocious son of one of Charles II's most loyal followers in exile. He won the king's favor at the Restoration and, in 1664, after education at Oxford and on the Continent, took a place at court, at the age of seventeen. There he soon distinguished himself as "the man who has the most wit and the least honor in England." When he was eighteen, he abducted Elizabeth Malet, an heiress, seemingly with an intent to force her to marry him. The crime outraged many, including the king, who imprisoned Rochester in the Tower of London. But he regained his position by courageous service in the naval war against the Dutch, and in 1667 he married Malet. The rest of his career was no less stormy. His satiric wit, directed not only at ordinary mortals but at Dryden and Charles II himself, embroiled him in constant quarrels and exiles; his practical jokes, his affairs, and his sinful ways were legendary. He circulated his works, always intellectually daring and often obscene, to a limited court readership in manuscripts executed by professional scribes—a common way of handling writing deemed too ideologically or morally scandalous for print. An early printed collection of his poems did appear in 1680, though the title page read "Antwerp," probably to hide its London origin. The air of scandal and disguise surrounding his writing only intensified his notoriety as the exemplar of the dissolute, libertine ways of court culture. He told his biographer, Gilbert Burnet, that “for five years together he was continually drunk.” His deathbed was also a dramatic scene of performance, and for posterity Rochester became a favorite moral topic: the libertine who had seen the error of his ways and converted to Christian repentance.

Wit, in the Restoration, meant not only a clever turn of phrase but mental capacity and intellectual power. Rochester was famous for both kinds of wit. His fierce intelligence, impatient of sham and convention, helped design a way of life based on style, cleverness, and self-interest—a way of life observable in Restoration plays (Dorimant, in Etherege’s The Man of Mode, strongly resembles Rochester). Stylistically, Rochester infuses forms such as the heroic couplet with a volatility that contrasts with the pointed and balanced manner of its other masters. From the very first line of “A Satire against Reason and Mankind”—“Were I who to my cost already am”—he plunges the reader into a couplet mode energized by speculation, self-interruption, and enjambment; and he frequently employs extravagant effects (such as the alliterations “love’s lesser lightning” and “balmy brinks of bliss” in “The Imperfect Enjoyment”) to flaunt his delight in dramatizing situations, sensations, and himself. “The Disabled Debauchee,” composed in “heroic stanzas” like those of Dryden’s Annus Mirabilis, subverts the very notion of heroism by turning conventions upside down. Philosophically, Rochester is daring and destabilizing. In “A Satire,” he rejects high-flown, theoretical reason and consigns its “misguided follower” to an abyss of doubt. And his love lyrics use libertine postures to press at the conventions of the poetic form. Rochester everywhere discovers his poetic voice through opposition and critique, and even seems to enjoy turning such critical energies against himself.

The Disabled Debauchee

As some brave admiral, in former war
Deprived of force, but pressed with courage still,
Two rival fleets appearing from afar,
Crawls to the top of an adjacent hill;

5 From whence, with thoughts full of concern, he views
The wise and daring conduct of the fight,
And each bold action to his mind renews
His present glory and his past delight;

10 From his fierce eyes flashes of fire he throws,
As from black clouds when lightning breaks away;
Transported, thinks himself amidst his foes,
And absent, yet enjoys the bloody day;

15 So, when my days of impotence approach,
And I'm by pox<sup>o</sup> and wine's unlucky chance
Forced from the pleasing billows of debauch
On the dull shore of lazy temperance,

20 My pains at least some respite shall afford
While I behold the battles you maintain
When fleets of glasses sail about the board,<sup>o</sup>
From whose broadsides<sup>1</sup> volleys of wit shall rain.

Nor shall the sight of honorable scars,
Which my too forward valor did procure,
Frighten new-listed<sup>o</sup> soldiers from the wars:
Past joys have more than paid what I endure.

25       Should any youth (worth being drunk) prove nice,<sup>o</sup>
           And from his fair inviter meanly shrink,
       'Twill please the ghost of my departed vice
           If, at my counsel, he repent and drink.

30       Or should some cold-complexioned sot forbid,
           With his dull morals, our bold night-alarms,
       I'll fire his blood by telling what I did
           When I was strong and able to bear arms.

35       I'll tell of whores attacked, their lords at home;
           Bawds' quarters beaten up, and fortress won;
       Windows demolished, watches<sup>o</sup> overcome;
           And handsome ills by my contrivance done.

40       Nor shall our love-fits, Chloris, be forgot,
           When each the well-looking linkboy<sup>2</sup> strove t'
           enjoy,
       And the best kiss was the deciding lot
           Whether the boy used<sup>3</sup> you, or I the boy.

45       With tales like these I will such thoughts inspire
           As to important mischief shall incline:
       I'll make him long some ancient church to fire,
           And fear no lewdness he's called to by wine.

45       Thus, statesmanlike, I'll saucily impose,
           And safe from action, valiantly advise;
       Sheltered in impotence, urge you to blows,
           And being good for nothing else, be wise.

The Imperfect Enjoyment<sup>1</sup>

Naked she lay, clasped in my longing arms,
I filled with love, and she all over charms;
Both equally inspired with eager fire,
Melting through kindness, flaming in desire.
5 With arms, legs, lips close clinging to embrace,
She clips<sup>o</sup> me to her breast, and sucks me to her face.
Her nimble tongue, Love's lesser lightning, played
Within my mouth, and to my thoughts conveyed
Swift orders that I should prepare to throw
10 The all-dissolving thunderbolt below.
My fluttering soul, sprung<sup>2</sup> with the pointed kiss,
Hangs hovering o'er her balmy brinks of bliss.
But whilst her busy hand would guide that part
Which should convey my soul up to her heart,
15 In liquid raptures I dissolve all o'er,
Melt into sperm, and spend at every pore.
A touch from any part of her had done 't:
Her hand, her foot, her very look's a cunt.
Smiling, she chides in a kind murmuring noise,
And from her body wipes the clammy joys,
20 When, with a thousand kisses wandering o'er
My panting bosom, "Is there then no more?"
She cries. "All this to love and rapture's due;
Must we not pay a debt to pleasure too?"
But I, the most forlorn, lost man alive,
25 To show my wished obedience vainly strive:
I sigh, alas! and kiss, but cannot swive.<sup>o</sup>
Eager desires confound my first intent,
Succeeding shame does more success prevent,

30 And rage at last confirms me impotent.
 Ev'n her fair hand, which might bid heat return
 To frozen age, and make cold hermits burn,
 Applied to my dead cinder, warms no more
 Than fire to ashes could past flames restore.
 Trembling, confused, despairing, limber, dry,
 35 A wishing, weak, unmoving lump I lie.
 This dart of love, whose piercing point, oft tried,
 With virgin blood ten thousand maids have dyed;
 Which nature still directed with such art
 That it through every cunt reached every heart—
 40 Stiffly resolved, 'twould carelessly invade
 Woman or man, nor aught<sup>o</sup> its fury stayed:
 Where'er it pierced, a cunt it found or made
 Now languid lies in this unhappy hour,
 Shrunk up and sapless like a withered flower.
 45 Thou treacherous, base deserter of my flame,
 False to my passion, fatal to my fame,
 Through what mistaken magic dost thou prove
 So true to lewdness, so untrue to love?
 What oyster-cinder-beggar-common whore
 50 Didst thou e'er fail in all thy life before?
 When vice, disease, and scandal lead the way,
 With what officious haste dost thou obey!
 Like a rude, roaring hector<sup>o</sup> in the streets
 Who scuffles, cuffs, and justles all he meets,
 55 But if his King or country claim his aid,
 The rakehell villain shrinks and hides his head;
 Ev'n so thy brutal valor is displayed, Breaks every stew,<sup>3</sup> does each small whore invade,
 But when great Love the onset does command,
 60 Base recreant to thy prince, thou dar'st not stand.
 Worst part of me, and henceforth hated most,

Through all the town a common fucking post,
 On whom each whore relieves her tingling cunt
 As hogs on gates do rub themselves and grunt,
 65      Mayst thou to ravenous chancres be a prey,
 Or in consuming weepings<sup>4</sup> waste away;
 May strangury and stone<sup>5</sup> thy days attend;
 May'st thou ne'er piss, who didst refuse to spend
 When all my joys did on false thee depend.
 70      And may ten thousand abler pricks agree
 To do the wronged Corinna right for thee.

Upon Nothing

Nothing, thou elder brother even to shade,
Thou hadst a being ere the world was made
And (well fixed) art alone of ending not afraid.

5 Ere time and place were, time and place were not,
When primitive Nothing Something straight begot,
Then all proceeded from the great united What.

Something, the general attribute of all,
Severed from thee, its sole original,
Into thy boundless self must undistinguished fall.

10 Yet Something did thy mighty power command
And from thy fruitful emptiness's hand
Snatched men, beasts, birds, fire, water, air, and land.

Matter, the wick'dst offspring of thy race,
By form assisted, flew from thy embrace,
And rebel light obscured thy reverend dusky face.

15 With form and matter, time and place did join,
Body thy foe, with these did leagues combine<sup>1</sup>
To spoil thy peaceful realm and ruin all thy line.

But turncoat time assists the foe in vain
And bribed by thee destroys their short-lived reign
20 And to thy hungry womb drives back thy slaves again.

Though mysteries are barred from laic eyes<sup>2</sup>
And the divine alone with warrant pries

Into thy bosom where thy truth in private lies,
25 Yet this of thee the wise may truly say:
Thou from the virtuous, nothing tak'st away,<sup>3</sup>
And to be part of thee, the wicked wisely pray.

Great negative, how vainly would the wise
Enquire, define, distinguish, teach, devise,
30 Didst thou not stand to point<sup>o</sup> their blind philosophies.

Is or Is Not, the two great ends of fate,
And true or false, the subject of debate
That perfect or destroy the vast designs of state,

When they have racked the politician's breast,
35 Within thy bosom most securely rest
And when reduced to thee are least unsafe and best.

But Nothing, why does Something still permit
That sacred monarchs should at council sit
With persons highly thought, at best, for nothing fit;

40 Whilst weighty Something modestly abstains
From princes' coffers<sup>4</sup> and from statesmen's brains
And Nothing there like stately Something reigns?

Nothing, who dwellst with fools in grave disguise,
For whom they reverend shapes and forms devise,
45 Lawn-sleeves and furs and gowns,<sup>5</sup> when they like thee look wise;

French truth, Dutch prowess, British policy,
Hibernian<sup>o</sup> learning, Scotch civility, Spaniards' dispatch, Danes' wit<sup>6</sup> are mainly seen in thee;

The great man's gratitude to his best friend,
 Kings' promises, whores' vows, towards thee they bend,
 Flow swiftly into thee and in thee ever end.

A Satire against Reason and Mankind<sup>1</sup>

Were I (who to my cost already am
One of those strange prodigious creatures, man)
A spirit free to choose, for my own share,
What case of flesh and blood I pleased to wear,
5 I'd be a dog, a monkey, or a bear;
Or anything but that vain animal
Who is so proud of being rational.
The senses are too gross, and he'll contrive
A sixth<sup>2</sup> to contradict the other five:
And before certain instinct will prefer
10 Reason, which fifty times for one does err.
Reason, an ignis fatuus<sup>3</sup> of the mind,
Which leaving light of nature, sense, behind,
Pathless and dangerous wandering ways it takes,
Through Error's fenny bogs and thorny brakes:<sup>o</sup>
15 Whilst the misguided follower climbs with pain
Mountains of whimsies heaped in his own brain;
Stumbling from thought to thought, falls headlong
down
Into doubt's boundless sea, where like<sup>o</sup> to drown,
Books bear him up awhile, and make him try
20 To swim with bladders<sup>4</sup> of philosophy;
In hopes still to o'ertake th'escaping light,
The vapor dances in his dazzled sight,
Till spent, it leaves him to eternal night.
Then old age and experience, hand in hand,
25 Lead him to death, and make him understand,
After a search so painful and so long,
That all his life he has been in the wrong.
Huddled in dirt the reasoning engine<sup>o</sup> lies,

30 Who was so proud, so witty and so wise.
Pride drew him in (as cheats their bubbles<sup>o</sup> catch)
And made him venture to be made a wretch.
His wisdom did his happiness destroy,
Aiming to know that world he should enjoy;
35 And wit was his vain frivolous pretence
Of pleasing others at his own expense:
For wits are treated just like common whores,
First they're enjoyed and then kicked out of doors.
The pleasure past, a threatening doubt remains,
40 That frights th'enjoyer with succeeding pains:<sup>5</sup>
Women and men of wit are dangerous tools,
And ever fatal to admiring fools.
Pleasure allures, and when the fops escape,
'Tis not that they're beloved, but fortunate;
45 And therefore what they fear, at heart they hate.<sup>6</sup>

But now methinks some formal band and beard<sup>7</sup>
Takes me to task. Come on, Sir, I'm prepared:
"Then by your favor any thing that's writ
Against this gibing,<sup>o</sup> jingling knack called wit,
Likes<sup>o</sup> me abundantly, but you take care
50 Upon this point not to be too severe.
Perhaps my Muse were fitter for this part,
For I profess I can be very smart
On wit, which I abhor with all my heart.
I long to lash it in some sharp essay,
55 But your grand indiscretion bids me stay,
And turns my tide of ink another way.
What rage ferments in your degenerate mind,

Jacob Huysmans, Lord Rochester with a Monkey and a Book, 1665–70. Rochester bestowing a laurel wreath, symbol of poetic excellence, on a monkey, who holds a page torn from a book.

---

60 To make you rail at reason and mankind?
Blest glorious man! to whom alone kind heaven
An everlasting soul has freely given;
Whom his creator took such care to make,
That from himself he did the image take,
And this fair frame<sup>o</sup> in shining reason dressed,
65 To dignify his nature above beast.

Reason, by whose aspiring influence
We take a flight beyond material sense;
Dive into mysteries, then soaring pierce
The flaming limits of the universe;
70 Search heaven and hell, find out what's acted there,
And give the world true grounds of hope and fear."<sup>8</sup>
    Hold, mighty man, I cry, all this we know,
From the pathetic pen of Ingelo,<sup>9</sup>
From Patrick's Pilgrim, Sibbs'<sup>1</sup> soliloquies;
And 'tis this very reason I despise;
75 This supernatural gift, that makes a mite
Think he's the image of the infinite,
Comparing his short life, void of all rest,
To the eternal and the ever blest;
This busy puzzling stirrer-up of doubt,
80 That frames deep mysteries, then finds them out;
Filling with frantic crowds of thinking fools
Those reverend Bedlams,<sup>0</sup> colleges and schools;
Borne on whose wings each heavy sot can pierce
The limits of the boundless universe;
85 So charming ointments make an old witch fly,
And bear a crippled carcass through the sky.
'Tis this exalted power whose business lies
In nonsense and impossibilities.
This made a whimsical philosopher
90 Before the spacious world his tub prefer.<sup>2</sup>
And we have modern cloistered coxcombs, who Retire to think, 'cause they have naught to do:
But thoughts are given for action's government,
Where action ceases, thought's impertinent.
95 Our sphere of action is life's happiness,
And he who thinks beyond, thinks like an ass.
Thus, whilst against false reasoning I inveigh,
I own<sup>0</sup> right reason, which I would obey:
That reason which distinguishes by sense,
100 And gives us rules of good and ill from thence;

That bounds desires with a reforming will,
 To keep them more in vigor, not to kill.
 Your reason hinders, mine helps to enjoy,
 Renewing appetites yours would destroy.
 105 My reason is my friend, yours is a cheat,
 Hunger calls out, my reason bids me eat;
 Perversely, yours your appetites does mock:
 They ask for food, that answers, "what's a clock?"<sup>o</sup>
 This plain distinction, Sir, your doubt secures,<sup>o</sup>
 110 'Tis not true reason I despise, but yours.
         Thus I think reason righted, but for man,
 I'll ne'er recant, defend him if you can.
 For all his pride and his philosophy,
 'Tis evident beasts are, in their degree,
 115 As wise at least, and better far than he.        }
 Those creatures are the wisest who attain
 By surest means, the ends at which they aim.
 If therefore Jowler<sup>3</sup> finds and kills his hares
 Better than Meres<sup>4</sup> supplies committee chairs,
 120 Though one's a statesman, th'other but a hound,
 Jowler in justice would be wiser found.
 You see how far man's wisdom here extends;
 Look next if human nature makes amends;
 Whose principles most generous are and just,
 125 And to whose morals you would sooner trust.
 Be judge yourself, I'll bring it to the test,
 Which is the basest creature, man or beast.
 Birds feed on birds, beasts on each other prey,
 But savage man alone does man betray;
 130 Pressed by necessity they kill for food,
 Man undoes man to do himself no good.
 With teeth and claws by nature armed, they hunt
 Nature's allowance to supply their want.
 But man with smiles, embraces, friendship, praise,
 135 Inhumanly his fellow's life betrays;
 With voluntary<sup>o</sup> pains works his distress,

Not through necessity, but wantonness.
For hunger or for love they fight and tear,
Whilst wretched man is still<sup>o</sup> in arms for fear;
140 For fear he arms, and is of arms afraid,
By fear to fear successively betrayed.
Base fear! The source whence his best passion came,
His boasted honor, and his dear bought fame;
That lust of power to which he's such a slave,
145 And for the which alone he dares be brave,
To which his various projects are designed,
Which makes him generous, affable, and kind;
For which he takes such pains to be thought wise
And screws his actions in a forced disguise;
150 Leading a tedious life in misery
Under laborious mean hypocrisy.
Look to the bottom of his vast design,
Wherein man's wisdom, power, and glory join;
The good he acts, the ill he does endure,
155 'Tis all from fear to make himself secure.
Merely for safety after fame we thirst,
For all men would be cowards if they durst.
And honesty's against all common sense;
Men must be knaves, 'tis in their own defense.
160 Mankind's dishonest, if you think it fair
Amongst known cheats to play upon the square,<sup>o</sup>
You'll be undone—
Nor can weak truth your reputation save;
The knaves will all agree to call you knave.
165 Wronged shall he live, insulted o'er, oppressed,
Who dares be less a villain than the rest.
Thus Sir, you see what human nature craves:
Most men are cowards, all men should be knaves.
The difference lies, as far as I can see,
170 Not in the thing itself, but the degree,
And all the subject matter of debate
Is only who's a knave of the first rate.

Addition<sup>5</sup>

175 All this with indignation have I hurled
At the pretending<sup>o</sup> part of the proud world,
Who swollen with selfish vanity, devise
False freedoms, holy cheats, and formal lies,
Over their fellow slaves to tyrannize. }

180 But if in court so just a man there be
(In court a just man yet unknown to me),
Who does his needful flattery direct,
Not to oppress and ruin, but protect (Since flattery, which way so ever laid,
Is still a tax on that unhappy trade);<sup>6</sup>
185 If so upright a statesman you can find,
Whose passions bend to his unbiased mind;
Who does his arts and policies apply
To raise his country, not his family,
Nor while his pride owned avarice withstands,
Receives close bribes from friends' corrupted hands<sup>7</sup>—

190 Is there a churchman who on God relies,
Whose life his faith and doctrine justifies?
Not one blown up with vain prelati<sup>8</sup>c pride,
Who for reproof of sins does man deride;
Whose envious heart makes preaching a pretense,
195 With his obstreperous saucy eloquence,
To chide at kings, and rail at men of sense;
Who from his pulpit vents more peevish lies,
More bitter railings, scandals, calumnies, }

200 Than at a gossiping are thrown about
When the good wives get drunk and then fall out;
None of that sensual tribe, whose talents lie
In avarice, pride, sloth and gluttony,
Who hunt good livings,<sup>9</sup> but abhor good lives, }

205 Whose lust exalted to that height arrives,
They act adultery with their own wives;<sup>1</sup> }

And ere a score of years completed be,

Can from the lofty pulpit proudly see
 Half a large parish their own progeny.
 Nor doating<sup>o</sup> bishop who would be adored
 210 For domineering at the council board,<sup>2</sup>
 A greater fop in business at fourscore,
 Fonder of serious toys,<sup>o</sup> affected more
 Than the gay glittering fool at twenty proves,
 With all his noise, his tawdry clothes and loves;
 215 But a meek humble man of honest sense,
 Who, preaching peace, does practice continence;
 Whose pious life's a proof he does believe
 Mysterious truths, which no man can conceive;
 If upon earth there dwell such God-like men,
 220 I'll here recant my paradox<sup>3</sup> to them;
 Adore those shrines of virtue, homage pay,
 And with the rabble world, their laws obey.
 If such there be, yet grant me this at least,
 225 Man differs more from man, than man from beast.

- Note 1: Rochester's poem draws on a skeptical tradition emphasizing the weakness of human reason. For instance, Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592), in his essay "An Apology for Raymond Sebond," had made much of the idea that animals are better equipped than humans to lead successful lives. In general, Rochester's poem loosely follows Satire VIII by the influential French poet and critic Nicolas Boileau (1636–1711), but Rochester—with his energetic intellect and embrace of paradox—makes these materials his own.Return to reference 1

Love and Life<sup>1</sup>

5 All my past life is mine no more,
The flying hours are gone;
Like transitory dreams giv'n o're
Whose images are kept in store,
By memory alone.

10 What ever is to come is not,
How can it then be mine?<sup>2</sup>
The present moment's all my lot,<sup>o</sup>
And that as fast as it is got,
Phillis is wholly thine.

15 Then talk not of inconstancy,
False hearts and broken vows:
If I by miracle can be
This live-long minute true to thee,
'Tis all that Heav'n allows.

To a Lady, in a Letter

Such perfect bliss, fair Cloris, we
In our enjoyment prove:
'Tis pity restless jealousy
Should mingle with our love.

5 Let us, since wit has taught us how,
Raise pleasure to the top:
You rival bottle must allow,
I'll suffer rival fop.<sup>o</sup><sub>—</sub>

10 Think not in this that I design
A treason 'gainst love's charms,
When following the God of Wine
I leave my Cloris arms.

15 Since you have that, for all your haste,
At which I'll ne're repine,<sup>o</sup><sub>—</sub>
Will take its liquor off as fast,
As I can take off mine.<sup>1</sup>

20 There's not a brisk insipid spark<sup>o</sup><sub>—</sub>
That flutters in the town:
But with your wanton eyes you mark
Him out to be your own.

Nor do you think it worth your care
How empty, and how dull
The heads of your admirers are,
So that their bags<sup>2</sup> be full.

25 All this you freely may confess,
Yet we ne'er disagree:

For did you love your pleasure less,
You were no match for me.

30      Whilst I, my pleasure to pursue,
            Whole nights am taking in
The lusty juice of grapes, take you
            The juice of lusty men.

Song [Love a woman! You're an ass]<sup>1</sup>

Love a woman! You're an ass,
'Tis a most insipid<sup>o</sup> passion,
To choose out for happiness
The idlest part of God's creation.

5 Let the porter and the groom,<sup>2</sup>
Things designed for dirty slaves,
Drudge in fair Aurelia's womb,
To get supplies for age and graves.

10 Farewell woman, I intend
Henceforth ev'ry night to sit
With my lewd well-natured friend,
Drinking, to engender<sup>o</sup> wit.

15 Then give me health, wealth, mirth, and wine,
And if busy love entrenches,<sup>o</sup>
There's a sweet soft page<sup>o</sup> of mine,
Does the trick worth forty wenches.

APHRA BEHN

1640?–1689

"A woman wit has often graced the stage," Dryden wrote in 1681. Soon after women actors first appeared in English public theaters, there was an even more striking debut by a woman writer who boldly signed her plays and talked back to her critics. In a dozen years, Aphra Behn turned out at least that many plays, discovering fresh dramatic possibilities in the new casts of women and men. She also drew attention as a warm and witty poet of love. When writing for the stage became less profitable, she turned to prose fiction, composing a pioneering epistolary novel, Love Letters between a Nobleman and His Sister, and diverse short tales—not to mention a raft of translations from the French, pindarics to her beloved Stuart rulers, compilations, prologues, complimentary verses, all the piecework and puffery that were the stock in trade of the Restoration town wit. She worked in haste and with flair for nearly two decades and more than held her own as a professional writer. She is one of the most versatile authors of her age—alive to new currents of thought and inventive in recasting fashionable forms.

Much of Behn's life remains a mystery. Although her books have been accompanied—and often all but buried—by volumes of rumor, hard facts are elusive. She was almost certainly from East Kent; she may well have been named Johnson. But she herself seems to have left no record of her date and place of birth, her family name and upbringing, or the identity of the shadowy Mr. Behn whom she reportedly married. Her many references to nuns and convents, as well as praise for prominent Catholic lords (Oroonoko is dedicated to one), have prompted speculation that she may have been raised as a Catholic and educated in a convent abroad. Without doubt, she drew on a range of worldly experience that would be closed to women in the more genteel ages to come. The circumstantial detail of Oroonoko supports her claim that she was in the new sugar colony of Surinam, on the northeastern Atlantic coast of South America, early in 1664. Perhaps she exaggerated her social position to enhance her tale, but many particulars—from dialect words and the location of plantations to methods of selling and torturing enslaved people—can be authenticated. During the trade war that broke out in 1665, Behn says regretfully, the “vast and charming world” she knew in Surinam was seized from the British by the Dutch; that year she traveled to the Low Countries on a spying mission for King Charles II. The king could be lax about payment, however, and Behn had to petition desperately to escape debtor’s prison. In 1670 she brought out her first plays, “forced to write for bread,” she confessed, “and not ashamed to own it.”

In London, Behn flourished in the cosmopolitan world of the playhouse and the court. Dryden and other wits encouraged her; she mixed with actresses and managers and playwrights and exchanged verses with a lively literary set that she called her “cabal.” Surviving letters record a passionate, troubled attachment to a lawyer named John Hoyle, a man with libertine views and bisexual desires. She kept up with the most advanced thinking and joined public debates with pointed satire against the Whigs. But the festivity of the Restoration world was fading out in bitter party acrimony. In 1682 Behn was placed under arrest for “abusive reflections” on the king’s illegitimate son, the Whig Duke of Monmouth (Dryden’s “Absalom”). Her Royalist opinions and the immodesty of her public role made her a target; gleeful lampoons declared that she was aging and ill and once again poor. She responded by bringing out her works at a still faster rate, composing Oroonoko, her dedication claims, “in a few hours . . . for I never rested my pen a moment for thought.” In some last works she recorded her hope that her writings would live: "I value fame as much as if I had been born a hero." When she died she was buried in Westminster Abbey.

"All women together ought to let flowers fall upon the grave of Aphra Behn," Virginia Woolf wrote, "for it was she who earned them the right to speak their minds." Behn herself spoke her mind. She scorned hypocrisy and calculation in her society and commented freely on religion, science, and philosophy. Moreover, she spoke as a woman. Denied the classical education available to men, she dismissed "musty rules" and lessons and relished the immediate human appeal of popular forms. Her first play, The Forced Marriage, exposes the bondage of matches arranged for money and status, and many later works invoke the powerful natural force of love, whose energy breaks through conventions. In a range of genres, from simple pastoral songs to complex plots of intrigue, she candidly explores the sexual feelings of women, their schooling in disguise, their need to "love upon the honest square" (for this her work was later denounced as coarse and impure). Oroonoko represents another departure for Behn and prose fiction. It achieves something new both in its narrative form and in extending some of her favorite themes to an original subject: the destiny of a Black male hero on a world historical stage.

Oroonoko cannot be classified as fact or fiction, realism or romance. In the still unshaped field of prose narrative—where a "history" could mean any story, true or false—Behn combined the attractions of three older forms. First, she presents the work as a memoir, a personal account of what she has heard and seen. According to a friend, Behn had told this tale over and over; perhaps that explains the conversational ease with which she turns back and forth, interpreting faraway scenes for her readers at home. Second, Oroonoko is a travel narrative in three parts. It turns west to a new world often extolled as a paradise, then east to Africa and the amorous intrigues of a corrupt old-world court (popular reading fare), then finally west again with its hero across the infamous Middle Passage—over which millions of enslaved people would be transported during the next century—to the conflicts of a raw colonial world. Exotic scenes fascinate Behn, but she wants even more to talk to people and learn about their ways of life. As in imaginary voyages, from Sir Thomas More's Utopia to Gulliver's Travels and Rasselas, encounters with foreign cultures sharply challenge Europeans to reexamine themselves. The uncorrupted Indigenous Americans and noble Africans portrayed by Behn live by a code of virtue, by principles of fidelity and honor, that "civilized" Christians often ignore or betray. Oroonoko embodies this code. Above all, the book is his biography. Courageous, high-minded, and great-hearted, he rivals the heroes of classical epics and Plutarch's Lives and is equally worthy of fame. Nor does he lack gentler virtues. Like the heroes of seventeenth-century heroic dramas and romances, he shines in the company of women and proves his nobility by his passionate and constant love for Imoinda, his ideal counterpart. Yet finally a contradiction dooms Oroonoko: he is at once prince and chattel, a "royal slave."

Behn handles her forms dynamically, drawing out their inner discords and tensions. In the biography, Oroonoko's deepest values are turned against him. His trust in friendship and scrupulous truth to his word expose him to the treachery of Europeans who calculate human worth on a yardstick of profit. A hero cannot survive in such a world. His self-respect demands action, even when he can find no clear path through the tangle of assurances and lies. Moreover, the colony too seems tangled in contradictions. Behn's travel narrative reveals a broken paradise where, in the absence of secure authority, the settlers descend into a series of unstable alliances, improvised power relations, and escalating suspicions. Here every term—friend and foe, tenderness and brutality, savagery and civilization—can suddenly turn into its opposite. And the author also seems caught between worlds. The cultivated Englishwoman who narrates and acts in this memoir thinks highly of her hero's code of honor and shares his contempt for the riffraff who plague him. Yet her own role is ambiguous: she lacks the power to save Oroonoko and might be viewed as implicated in his downfall. Only as a writer can she take control, preserving the hero in her work.

The story of Oroonoko did not end with Behn. Compassion for the royal slave and outrage at his fate were enlisted in the long battle against the trade in enslaved people. Reprinted, translated, serialized, dramatized, and much imitated, Oroonoko helped teach a mass audience to feel for all victims of the brutal commerce in human beings. A hundred years later, the popular writer Hannah More testified to the widening influence of the story: "No individual griefs my bosom melt, / For millions feel what Oroonoko felt." Behn, a "woman wit," had this widespread influence—she wrote poems and plays, helped shape the emerging novel, and gave future generations a powerful character through which to understand the pain of being treated as something less than fully human.

The Disappointment<sup>1</sup>

One day the amorous Lysander,
By an impatient passion swayed,
Surprised fair Cloris, that loved maid,
Who could defend herself no longer.
All things did with his love conspire;
5 The gilded planet of the day,<sup>o</sup>
In his gay chariot drawn by fire,
Was now descending to the sea,
And left no light to guide the world
But what from Cloris' brighter eyes was hurled.
10

In a lone thicket made for love,
Silent as yielding maid's consent,
She with a charming languishment,
Permits his force, yet gently strove;
Her hands his bosom softly meet,
15 But not to put him back designed,
Rather to draw 'em on inclined:
Whilst he lay trembling at her feet,
Resistance 'tis in vain to show:
She wants<sup>o</sup> the power to say—Ah! what d'ye do?
20

Her bright eyes sweet and yet severe,
Where love and shame confusedly strive,
Fresh vigor to Lysander give;
And breathing faintly in his ear,
She cried—Cease, cease—your vain desire,
25 Or I'll call out—what would you do?
My dearer honor even to you
I cannot, must not give—Retire,
Or take this life, whose chiefest part

30 I gave you with the conquest of my heart.

But he as much unused to fear,
As he was capable of love,
The blessed minutes to improve
Kisses her mouth, her neck, her hair;
Each touch her new desire alarms;
35 His burning, trembling hand he pressed
Upon her swelling snowy breast,
While she lay panting in his arms.
All her unguarded beauties lie
The spoils and trophies of the enemy.

40 And now without respect or fear
He seeks the object of his vows
(His love no modesty allows)
By swift degrees advancing—where
His daring hand that altar seized,
45 Where gods of love do sacrifice:
That awful throne, that paradise
Where rage is calmed, and anger pleased;
That fountain where delight still flows,
And gives the universal world repose.

50 Her balmy lips encountering his,
Their bodies, as their souls, are joined;
Where both in transports unconfined
Extend themselves upon the moss.
Cloris half dead and breathless lay;
55 Her soft eyes cast a humid light
Such as divides the day and night;
Or falling stars, whose fires decay:
And now no signs of life she shows,
But what in short-breathed sighs returns and goes.

60 He saw how at her length she lay;

He saw her rising bosom bare;
Her loose thin robes, through which appear
A shape designed for love and play;
Abandoned by her pride and shame
65 She does her softest joys dispense,
Offering her virgin innocence
A victim to love's sacred flame;
While the o'er-ravished shepherd lies
Unable to perform the sacrifice.
70

Ready to taste a thousand joys,
The too transported hapless swain
Found the vast pleasure turned to pain;
Pleasure which too much love destroys:
75 The willing garments by he laid,<sup>2</sup>
And heaven all opened to his view.
Mad to possess, himself he threw
On the defenseless lovely maid.
But oh what envying god conspires
To snatch his power, yet leave him the desire!
80

Nature's support (without whose aid
She can no human being give)
Itself now wants the art<sup>3</sup> to live;
Faintness its slackened nerves invade:
85 In vain th'enraged youth essayed
To call its fleeting vigor back;
No motion 'twill from motion take;
Excess of love his love betrayed:
In vain he toils, in vain commands:
90 The insensible<sup>4</sup> fell weeping in his hand.

In this so amorous cruel strife,
Where love and fate were too severe,
The poor Lysander in despair
Renounced his reason with his life:

95 Now all the brisk and active fire
That should the nobler part inflame
Served to increase his rage and shame,
And left no spark for new desire:
Not all her naked charms could move
Or calm that rage that had debauched his love.

100

Cloris returning from the trance
Which love and soft desire had bred,
Her timorous hand she gently laid
(Or guided by design or chance)
Upon that fabulous Priapus,<sup>5</sup>
105 That potent god, as poets feign:
But never did young shepherdess,
Gathering the fern upon the plain,
More nimbly draw her fingers back,
Finding beneath the verdant leaves a snake,

110

Than Cloris her fair hand withdrew,
Finding that god of her desires
Disarmed of all his awful fires,
And cold as flowers bathed in the morning dew.
Who can the nymph's confusion guess?
115 The blood forsook the hinder place,
And strewed with blushes all her face,
Which both disdain and shame expressed:
And from Lysander's arms she fled,
Leaving him fainting on the gloomy bed.

120

Like lightning through the grove she hies,
Or Daphne from the Delphic god;<sup>6</sup>
No print upon the grassy road
She leaves, to instruct pursuing eyes.
The wind that wantoned in her hair
125 And with her ruffled garments played,
Discovered in the flying maid

All that the gods e'er made, if fair.
 So Venus, when her love<sup>7</sup> was slain,
 With fear and haste flew o'er the fatal plain.
 130
 The nymph's resentments none but I
 Can well imagine or condole:
 But none can guess Lysander's soul,
 But those who swayed his destiny.
 135 His silent griefs swell up to storms,
 And not one god his fury spares;
 He cursed his birth, his fate, his stars;
 But more the shepherdess's charms,
 Whose soft bewitching influence
 140 Had damned him to the hell of impotence.<sup>8</sup>

- Note 1: This variation on the "imperfect enjoyment" genre compares with Rochester's (p. 134); it first appeared in a collection of his poems. But Behn gives the theme of impotence her own twist. Freely translating a French poem, Cantenac's "The Lost Chance Recovered," she cuts the conclusion, in which the French lover regained his potency, and she highlights the woman's feelings as well as the man's.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: He took off her compliant clothes.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Lacks the capacity.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Devoid of feeling and too small to be noticed.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Phallus. The ancient god Priapus is always pictured with an outstanding erection.Return to reference 5

To the Fair Clarinda, Who Made Love to Me, Imagined More than Woman. By Mrs.

B.<sup>1</sup>

Fair lovely maid, or if that title be
Too weak, too feminine for nobler thee,
Permit a name that more approaches truth:
And let me call thee lovely charming youth<sup>2</sup>
This last will justify my soft complaint,
5 While that<sup>3</sup> may serve to lessen my constraint;
And without blushes I the youth pursue,
When so much beauteous woman is in view.
Against thy charms we struggle but in vain
With thy deluding form thou giv'st us pain,
10 While the bright nymph betrays us to the swain.<sup>4</sup>
In pity to our sex sure thou wert sent,
That we might love, and yet be innocent:
For sure no crime with thee we can commit;
Or if we should—thy form excuses it.
15 For who that gathers fairest flowers believes
A snake lies hid beneath the fragrant leaves.

Thou beauteous wonder of a different kind,
Soft Cloris with the dear Alexis<sup>5</sup> joined;
When e'er the manly part of thee would plead
20 Thou tempts us with the image of the maid,
While we the noblest passions do extend
The love to Hermes, Aphrodite<sup>6</sup> the friend.

Oroonoko; or, The Royal Slave<sup>1</sup>

From Epistle Dedicatory

To the Right Honorable the Lord Maitland<sup>2</sup>

* * *

My lord, the obligations I have to some of the great men of your nation, particularly to your lordship, gives me an ambition of making my acknowledgements by all the opportunities I can; and such humble fruits as my industry produces I lay at your lordship's feet. This is a true story, of a man gallant enough to merit your protection, and, had he always been so fortunate, he had not made so inglorious an end. The Royal Slave I had the honor to know in my travels to the other world; and though I had none above me in that country, yet I wanted power to preserve this great man.<sup>3</sup> If there be anything that seems romantic,<sup>4</sup> I beseech your lordship to consider these countries do, in all things, so far differ from ours that they produce unconceivable wonders; at least, they appear so to us, because new and strange. What I have mentioned I have taken care should be truth, let the critical reader judge as he pleases. 'Twill be no commendation to the book to assure your lordship I writ it in a few hours, though it may serve to excuse some of its faults of connection, for I never rested my pen a moment for thought: 'Tis purely the merit of my slave<sup>5</sup> that must render it worthy of the honor it begs; and the author of that of subscribing herself,

My lord
Your Lordship's most obliged and obedient Servant
A. Behn.

I do not pretend, in giving you the history of this royal slave, to entertain my reader with the adventures of a feigned hero, whose life and fortunes fancy may manage at the poet's pleasure; nor in relating the truth, design to adorn it with any accidents but such as arrived in earnest to him. And it shall come simply into the world, recommended by its own proper merits and natural intrigues, there being enough of reality to support it, and to render it diverting, without the addition of invention.

I was myself an eyewitness to a great part of what you will find here set down, and what I could not be witness of, I received from the mouth of the chief actor in this history, the hero himself, who gave us the whole transactions of his youth; and though I shall omit for brevity's sake a thousand little accidents of his life, which, however pleasant to us, where history was scarce and adventures very rare, yet might prove tedious and heavy to my reader, in a world where he finds diversions for every minute, new and strange. But we who were perfectly charmed with the character of this great man were curious to gather every circumstance of his life.

The scene of the last part of his adventures lies in a colony in America called Surinam,<sup>6</sup> in the West Indies.

But before I give you the story of this gallant slave, 'tis fit I tell you the manner of bringing them to these new colonies, for those they make use of there are not natives of the place; for those we live with in perfect amity, without daring to command 'em, but on the contrary caress 'em with all the brotherly and friendly affection in the world, trading with 'em for their fish, venison, buffaloes, skins, and little rarities; as marmosets, a sort of monkey as big as a rat or weasel but of a marvelous and delicate shape, and has face and hands like a human creature, and cousheries,<sup>7</sup> a little beast in the form and fashion of a lion, as big as a kitten, but so exactly made in all parts like that noble beast, that it is it in miniature. Then for little parakeetoes, great parrots, macaws, and a thousand other birds and beasts of wonderful and surprising forms, shapes, and colors. For skins of prodigious snakes, of which there are some threescore yards in length, as is the skin of one that may be seen at his Majesty's antiquaries'; where are also some rare flies<sup>8</sup> of amazing forms and colors, presented to 'em by myself, some as big as my fist, some less, and all of various excellencies, such as art cannot imitate. Then we trade for feathers, which they order into all shapes, make themselves little short habits of 'em, and glorious wreaths for their heads, necks, arms and legs, whose tinctures are unconceivable. I had a set of these presented to me, and I gave 'em to the King's theater, and it was the dress of the Indian Queen,<sup>9</sup> infinitely admired by persons of quality, and were unimitable. Besides these, a thousand little knacks and rarities in nature, and some of art, as their baskets, weapons, aprons, et cetera. We dealt with 'em with beads of all colors, knives, axes, pins and needles, which they used only as tools to drill holes with in their ears, noses, and lips, where they hang a great many little things, as long beads, bits of tin, brass, or silver beat thin, and any shining trinket. The beads they weave into aprons about a quarter of an ell long, and of the same breadth,<sup>1</sup> working them very prettily in flowers of several colors of beads; which apron they wear just before 'em, as Adam and Eve did the fig leaves, the men wearing a long stripe of linen which they deal with us for. They thread these beads also on long cotton threads and make girdles to tie their aprons to, which come twenty times or more about the waist, and then cross, like a shoulder belt, both ways, and round their necks, arms, and legs. This adornment, with their long black hair, and the face painted in little specks or flowers here and there, makes 'em a wonderful figure to behold.

Some of the beauties which indeed are finely shaped, as almost all are, and who have pretty features, are very charming and novel; for they have all that is called beauty, except the color, which is a reddish yellow; or after a new oiling, which they often use to themselves, they are of the color of a new brick, but smooth, soft, and sleek. They are extreme<sup>2</sup> modest and bashful, very shy and nice of being touched. And though they are all thus naked, if one lives forever among 'em there is not to be seen an indecent action or glance; and being continually used to see one another so unadorned, so like our first parents before the Fall, it seems as if they had no wishes; there being nothing to heighten curiosity, but all you can see you see at once, and every moment see, and where there is no novelty there can be no curiosity. Not but I have seen a handsome young Indian dying for love of a very beautiful young Indian maid; but all his courtship was to fold his arms, pursue her with his eyes, and sighs were all his language; while she, as if no such lover were present, or rather, as if she desired none such, carefully guarded her eyes from beholding him, and never approached him but she looked down with all the blushing modesty I have seen in the most severe and cautious of our world. And these people represented to me an absolute idea of the first state of innocence, before man knew how to sin. And 'tis most evident and plain that simple Nature is the most harmless, inoffensive, and virtuous mistress. 'Tis she alone, if she were permitted, that better instructs the world than all the inventions of man. Religion would here but destroy that tranquillity they possess by ignorance, and laws would but teach 'em to know offense, of which now they have no notion. They once made mourning and fasting for the death of the English governor, who had given his hand to come on such a day to 'em and neither came nor sent, believing when once a man's word was passed, nothing but death could or should prevent his keeping it. And when they saw he was not dead, they asked him what name they had for a man who promised a thing he did not do. The governor told them, such a man was a liar, which was a word of infamy to a gentleman. Then one of 'em replied, "Governor, you are a liar, and guilty of that infamy." They have a native justice which knows no fraud, and they understand no vice or cunning, but when they are taught by the white men. They have plurality of wives, which, when they grow old, they serve those that succeed 'em, who are young, but with a servitude easy and respected; and unless they take slaves in war, they have no other attendants.

Those on that continent where I was had no king, but the oldest war captain was obeyed with great resignation. A war captain is a man who has led them on to battle with conduct<sup>3</sup> and success, of whom I shall have occasion to speak more hereafter, and of some other of their customs and manners, as they fall in my way.

With these people, as I said, we live in perfect tranquillity and good understanding, as it behooves us to do, they knowing all the places where to seek the best food of the country and the means of getting it, and for very small and unvaluable trifles, supply us with what 'tis impossible for us to get; for they do not only in the wood and over the savannas, in hunting, supply the parts of hounds, by swiftly scouring through those almost impassable places, and by the mere activity of their feet run down the nimblest deer and other eatable beasts; but in the water one would think they were gods of the rivers, or fellow citizens of the deep, so rare an art they have in swimming, diving, and almost living in water, by which they command the less swift inhabitants of the floods. And then for shooting, what they cannot take, or reach with their hands, they do with arrows, and have so admirable an aim that they will split almost a hair; and at any distance that an arrow can reach, they will shoot down oranges and other fruit, and only touch the stalk with the dart's point, that they may not hurt the fruit. So that they being, on all occasions, very useful to us, we find it absolutely necessary to caress 'em as friends, and not to treat 'em as slaves; nor dare we do other, their numbers so far surpassing ours in that continent.

Those then whom we make use of to work in our plantations of sugar are Negroes, black slaves altogether, which are transported thither in this manner. Those who want slaves make a bargain with a master or captain of a ship and contract to pay him so much apiece, a matter of twenty pound a head for as many as he agrees for, and to pay for 'em when they shall be delivered on such a plantation. So that when there arrives a ship laden with slaves, they who have so contracted go aboard and receive their number by lot; and perhaps in one lot that may be for ten, there may happen to be three or four men, the rest women and children. Or be there more or less of either sex, you are obliged to be contented with your lot.

Coramantien,<sup>4</sup> a country of blacks so called, was one of those places in which they found the most advantageous trading for these slaves, and thither most of our great traders in that merchandise trafficked; for that nation is very warlike and brave, and having a continual campaign, being always in hostility with one neighboring prince or other, they had the fortune to take a great many captives; for all they took in battle were sold as slaves, at least those common men who could not ransom themselves. Of these slaves so taken, the general only has all the profit; and of these generals, our captains and masters of ships buy all their freights.

The King of Coramantien was himself a man of a hundred and odd years old, and had no son, though he had many beautiful black wives; for most certainly there are beauties that can charm of that color. In his younger years he had had many gallant men to his sons, thirteen of which died in battle, conquering when they fell; and he had only left him for his successor one grandchild, son to one of these dead victors, who, as soon as he could bear a bow in his hand and a quiver at his back, was sent into the field, to be trained up by one of the oldest generals to war; where, from his natural inclination to arms and the occasions given him, with the good conduct of the old general, he became, at the age of seventeen, one of the most expert captains and bravest soldiers that ever saw the field of Mars. So that he was adored as the wonder of all that world, and the darling of the soldiers. Besides, he was adorned with a native beauty so transcending all those of his gloomy race that he struck an awe and reverence even in those that knew not his quality; as he did in me, who beheld him with surprise and wonder, when afterwards he arrived in our world.

He had scarce arrived at his seventeenth year, when fighting by his side, the general was killed with an arrow in his eye, which the Prince Oroonoko (for so was this gallant Moor<sup>5</sup> called) very narrowly avoided; nor had he, if the general, who saw the arrow shot, and perceiving it aimed at the Prince, had not bowed his head between, on purpose to receive it in his own body rather than it should touch that of the Prince, and so saved him.

'Twas then, afflicted as Oroonoko was, that he was proclaimed general in the old man's place; and then it was, at the finishing of that war, which had continued for two years, that the Prince came to court, where he had hardly been a month together from the time of his fifth year to that of seventeen; and 'twas amazing to imagine where it was he learned so much humanity; or to give his accomplishments a juster name, where 'twas he got that real greatness of soul, those refined notions of true honor, that absolute generosity, and that softness that was capable of the highest passions of love and gallantry, whose objects were almost continually fighting men, or those mangled or dead; who heard no sounds but those of war and groans. Some part of it we may attribute to the care of a Frenchman of wit and learning, who, finding it turn to very good account to be a sort of royal tutor to this young black, and perceiving him very ready, apt, and quick of apprehension, took a great pleasure to teach him morals, language, and science, and was for it extremely beloved and valued by him. Another reason was, he loved, when he came from war, to see all the English gentlemen that traded thither, and did not only learn their language but that of the Spaniards also, with whom he traded afterwards for slaves.

I have often seen and conversed with this great man, and been a witness to many of his mighty actions, and do assure my reader the most illustrious courts could not have produced a braver man, both for greatness of courage and mind, a judgment more solid, a wit more quick, and a conversation more sweet and diverting. He knew almost as much as if he had read much. He had heard of and admired the Romans; he had heard of the late civil wars in England, and the deplorable death of our great monarch,<sup>6</sup> and would discourse of it with all the sense and abhorrence of the injustice imaginable. He had an extreme good and graceful mien, and all the civility of a well-bred great man. He had nothing of barbarity in his nature, but in all points addressed himself as if his education had been in some European court.

This great and just character of Oroonoko gave me an extreme curiosity to see him, especially when I knew he spoke French and English, and that I could talk with him. But though I had heard so much of him, I was as greatly surprised when I saw him as if I had heard nothing of him, so beyond all report I found him. He came into the room and addressed himself to me, and some other women, with the best grace in the world. He was pretty tall, but of a shape the most exact that can be fancied. The most famous statuary<sup>7</sup> could not form the figure of a man more admirably turned from head to foot. His face was not of that brown, rusty black which most of that nation are, but a perfect ebony or polished jet. His eyes were the most awful that could be seen, and very piercing, the white of 'em being like snow, as were his teeth. His nose was rising and Roman, instead of African and flat; his mouth the finest shaped that could be seen, far from those great turned lips which are so natural to the rest of the Negroes. The whole proportion and air of his face was so noble and exactly formed that, bating<sup>8</sup> his color, there could be nothing in nature more beautiful, agreeable, and handsome. There was no one grace wanting that bears the standard of true beauty. His hair came down to his shoulders by the aids of art; which was by pulling it out with a quill and keeping it combed, of which he took particular care. Nor did the perfections of his mind come short of those of his person, for his discourse was admirable upon almost any subject; and whoever had heard him speak would have been convinced of their errors, that all fine wit is confined to the white men, especially to those of Christendom, and would have confessed that Oroonoko was as capable even of reigning well, and of governing as wisely, had as great a soul, as politic<sup>9</sup> maxims, and was as sensible of power, as any prince civilized in the most refined schools of humanity and learning, or the most illustrious courts.

This prince, such as I have described him, whose soul and body were so admirably adorned, was (while yet he was in the court of his grandfather), as I said, as capable of love as 'twas possible for a brave and gallant man to be; and in saying that, I have named the highest degree of love, for sure, great souls are most capable of that passion.

I have already said, the old general was killed by the shot of an arrow, by the side of this prince, in battle, and that Oroonoko was made general. This old dead hero had one only daughter left of his race, a beauty that, to describe her truly, one need say only she was female to the noble male, the beautiful black Venus to our young Mars, as charming in her person as he, and of delicate virtues. I have seen an hundred white men sighing after her, and making a thousand vows at her feet, all vain and unsuccessful. And she was, indeed, too great for any but a prince of her own nation to adore.

Oroonoko coming from the wars (which were now ended), after he had made his court to his grandfather, he thought in honor he ought to make a visit to Imoinda, the daughter of his foster-father, the dead general; and to make some excuses to her, because his preservation was the occasion of her father's death; and to present her with those slaves that had been taken in this last battle, as the trophies of her father's victories. When he came, attended by all the young soldiers of any merit, he was infinitely surprised at the beauty of this fair queen of night, whose face and person was so exceeding all he had ever beheld; that lovely modesty with which she received him; that softness in her look, and sighs, upon the melancholy occasion of this honor that was done by so great a man as Oroonoko, and a prince of whom she had heard such admirable things: the awfulness<sup>1</sup> wherewith she received him, and the sweetness of her words and behavior while he stayed, gained a perfect conquest over his fierce heart, and made him feel the victor could be subdued. So that having made his first compliments, and presented her a hundred and fifty slaves in fetters, he told her with his eyes that he was not insensible of her charms; while Imoinda, who wished for nothing more than so glorious a conquest, was pleased to believe she understood that silent language of newborn love, and from that moment put on all her additions to beauty.

The Prince returned to court with quite another humor than before; and though he did not speak much of the fair Imoinda, he had the pleasure to hear all his followers speak of nothing but the charms of that maid, insomuch that, even in the presence of the old king, they were extolling her and heightening, if possible, the beauties they had found in her. So that nothing else was talked of, no other sound was heard in every corner where there were whisperers, but "Imoinda! Imoinda!"

'Twill be imagined Oroonoko stayed not long before he made his second visit, nor, considering his quality, not much longer before he told her he adored her. I have often heard him say that he admired by what strange inspiration he came to talk things so soft and so passionate, who never knew love, nor was used to the conversation<sup>2</sup> of women; but (to use his own words) he said, most happily some new and till then unknown power instructed his heart and tongue in the language of love, and at the same time, in favor of him, inspired Imoinda with a sense of his passion. She was touched with what he said, and returned it all in such answers as went to his very heart, with a pleasure unknown before. Nor did he use those obligations<sup>3</sup> ill that love had done him, but turned all his happy moments to the best advantage; and as he knew no vice, his flame aimed at nothing but honor, if such a distinction may be made in love; and especially in that country, where men take to themselves as many as they can maintain, and where the only crime and sin with woman is to turn her off, to abandon her to want, shame, and misery. Such ill morals are only practiced in Christian countries, where they prefer the bare name of religion, and, without virtue or morality, think that's sufficient. But Oroonoko was none of those professors, but as he had right notions of honor, so he made her such propositions as were not only and barely such; but contrary to the custom of his country, he made her vows she should be the only woman he would possess while he lived; that no age or wrinkles should incline him to change, for her soul would be always fine and always young, and he should have an eternal idea in his mind of the charms she now bore, and should look into his heart for that idea when he could find it no longer in her face.

After a thousand assurances of his lasting flame, and her eternal empire over him, she condescended to receive him for her husband, or rather, received him as the greatest honor the gods could do her.

There is a certain ceremony in these cases to be observed, which I forgot to ask him how performed; but 'twas concluded on both sides that, in obedience to him, the grandfather was to be first made acquainted with the design, for they pay a most absolute resignation to the monarch, especially when he is a parent also.

On the other side, the old king, who had many wives and many concubines, wanted not court flatterers to insinuate in his heart a thousand tender thoughts for this young beauty, and who represented her to his fancy as the most charming he had ever possessed in all the long race of his numerous years. At this character his old heart, like an extinguished brand, most apt to take fire, felt new sparks of love and began to kindle; and now grown to his second childhood, longed with impatience to behold this gay thing, with whom, alas! he could but innocently play. But how he should be confirmed she was this wonder, before he used his power to call her to court (where maidens never came, unless for the King's private use), he was next to consider; and while he was so doing, he had intelligence brought him that Imoinda was most certainly mistress to the Prince Oroonoko. This gave him some chagrin; however, it gave him also an opportunity, one day when the Prince was a-hunting, to wait on a man of quality, as his slave and attendant, who should go and make a present to Imoinda as from the Prince; he should then, unknown, see this fair maid, and have an opportunity to hear what message she would return the Prince for his present, and from thence gather the state of her heart and degree of her inclination. This was put in execution, and the old monarch saw, and burned. He found her all he had heard, and would not delay his happiness, but found he should have some obstacle to overcome her heart; for she expressed her sense of the present the Prince had sent her in terms so sweet, so soft and pretty, with an air of love and joy that could not be dissembled, insomuch that 'twas past doubt whether she loved Oroonoko entirely. This gave the old king some affliction, but he salved it with this, that the obedience the people pay their king was not at all inferior to what they paid their gods; and what love would not oblige Imoinda to do, duty would compel her to.

He was therefore no sooner got to his apartment but he sent the royal veil to Imoinda, that is, the ceremony of invitation: he sends the lady he has a mind to honor with his bed a veil, with which she is covered, and secured for the King's use; and 'tis death to disobey, besides held a most impious disobedience.

'Tis not to be imagined the surprise and grief that seized this lovely maid at this news and sight. However, as delays in these cases are dangerous and pleading worse than treason, trembling, and almost fainting, she was obliged to suffer herself to be covered and led away.

They brought her thus to court; and the King, who had caused a very rich bath to be prepared, was led into it, where he sat under a canopy, in state, to receive this longed-for virgin; whom he having commanded should be brought to him, they (after disrobing her) led her to the bath, and making fast the doors, left her to descend. The King, without more courtship, bade her throw off her mantle and come to his arms. But Imoinda, all in tears, threw herself on the marble, on the brink of the bath, and besought him to hear her. She told him, as she was a maid, how proud of the divine glory she should have been, of having it in her power to oblige her king; but as by the laws he could not, and from his royal goodness would not, take from any man his wedded wife, so she believed she should be the occasion of making him commit a great sin, if she did not reveal her state and condition, and tell him she was another's, and could not be so happy to be his.

The King, enraged at this delay, hastily demanded the name of the bold man that had married a woman of her degree without his consent. Imoinda, seeing his eyes fierce and his hands tremble (whether with age or anger, I know not, but she fancied the last), almost repented she had said so much, for now she feared the storm would fall on the Prince. She therefore said a thousand things to appease the raging of his flame, and to prepare him to hear who it was with calmness; but before she spoke, he imagined who she meant, but would not seem to do so, but commanded her to lay aside her mantle and suffer herself to receive his caresses; or by his gods, he swore that happy man whom she was going to name should die, though it were even Oroonoko himself. "Therefore," said he, "deny this marriage, and swear thyself a maid." "That," replied Imoinda, "by all our powers I do, for I am not yet known to my husband." "'Tis enough," said the King; "'tis enough to satisfy both my conscience and my heart." And rising from his seat, he went and led her into the bath, it being in vain for her to resist.

In this time the Prince, who was returned from hunting, went to visit his Imoinda, but found her gone; and not only so, but heard she had received the royal veil. This raised him to a storm, and in his madness they had much ado to save him from laying violent hands on himself. Force first prevailed, and then reason. They urged all to him that might oppose his rage, but nothing weighed so greatly with him as the King's old age, incapable of injuring him with Imoinda. He would give way to that hope, because it pleased him most, and flattered best his heart. Yet this served not altogether to make him cease his different passions, which sometimes raged within him, and sometimes softened into showers. 'Twas not enough to appease him, to tell him his grandfather was old and could not that way injure him, while he retained that awful duty which the young men are used there to pay to their grave relations. He could not be convinced he had no cause to sigh and mourn for the loss of a mistress he could not with all his strength and courage retrieve. And he would often cry, "O my friends! Were she in walled cities or confined from me in fortifications of the greatest strength, did enchantments or monsters detain her from me, I would venture through any hazard to free her. But here, in the arms of a feeble old man, my youth, my violent love, my trade in arms, and all my vast desire of glory avail me nothing. Imoinda is as irrecoverably lost to me as if she were snatched by the cold arms of Death. Oh! she is never to be retrieved. If I would wait tedious years, till fate should bow the old king to his grave, even that would not leave me Imoinda free; but still that custom that makes it so vile a crime for a son to marry his father's wives or mistresses would hinder my happiness, unless I would either ignobly set an ill precedent to my successors, or abandon my country and fly with her to some unknown world, who never heard our story."

But it was objected to him that his case was not the same; for Imoinda being his lawful wife, by solemn contract, 'twas he was the injured man and might if he so pleased take Imoinda back, the breach of the law being on his grandfather's side; and that if he could circumvent him and redeem her from the Otan, which is the palace of the King's women, a sort of seraglio, it was both just and lawful for him so to do.

This reasoning had some force upon him, and he should have been entirely comforted, but for the thought that she was possessed by his grandfather. However, he loved so well that he was resolved to believe what most favored his hope, and to endeavor to learn from Imoinda's own mouth what only she could satisfy him in, whether she was robbed of that blessing which was only due to his faith and love. But as it was very hard to get a sight of the women (for no men ever entered into the Otan but when the King went to entertain himself with some one of his wives or mistresses, and 'twas death at any other time for any other to go in), so he knew not how to contrive to get a sight of her.

While Oroonoko felt all the agonies of love, and suffered under a torment the most painful in the world, the old king was not exempted from his share of affliction. He was troubled for having been forced by an irresistible passion to rob his son<sup>4</sup> of a treasure he knew could not but be extremely dear to him, since she was the most beautiful that ever had been seen, and had besides all the sweetness and innocence of youth and modesty, with a charm of wit surpassing all. He found that, however she was forced to expose her lovely person to his withered arms, she could only sigh and weep there, and think of Oroonoko; and oftentimes could not forbear speaking of him, though her life were, by custom, forfeited by owning her passion. But she spoke not of a lover only, but of a prince dear to him to whom she spoke, and of the praises of a man who, till now, filled the old man's soul with joy at every recital of his bravery, or even his name. And 'twas this dotage on our young hero that gave Imoinda a thousand privileges to speak of him without offending, and this condescension in the old king that made her take the satisfaction of speaking of him so very often.

Besides, he many times inquired how the Prince bore himself; and those of whom he asked, being entirely slaves to the merits and virtues of the Prince, still answered what they thought conduced best to his service; which was to make the old king fancy that the Prince had no more interest in Imoinda, and had resigned her willingly to the pleasure of the King; that he diverted himself with his mathematicians, his fortifications, his officers, and his hunting.

This pleased the old lover, who failed not to report these things again to Imoinda, that she might, by the example of her young lover, withdraw her heart, and rest better contented in his arms. But however she was forced to receive this unwelcome news, in all appearance with unconcern and content, her heart was bursting within, and she was only happy when she could get alone, to vent her griefs and moans with sighs and tears.

What reports of the Prince's conduct were made to the King, he thought good to justify as far as possibly he could by his actions, and when he appeared in the presence of the King, he showed a face not at all betraying his heart. So that in a little time, the old man being entirely convinced that he was no longer a lover of Imoinda, he carried him with him in his train to the Otan, often to banquet with his mistress. But as soon as he entered, one day, into the apartment of Imoinda with the King, at the first glance from her eyes, notwithstanding all his determined resolution, he was ready to sink in the place where he stood, and had certainly done so but for the support of Aboan, a young man who was next to him; which, with his change of countenance, had betrayed him, had the King chanced to look that way. And I have observed, 'tis a very great error, in those who laugh when one says a Negro can change color, for I have seen 'em as frequently blush, and look pale, and that as visibly as ever I saw in the most beautiful white. And 'tis certain that both these changes were evident, this day, in both these lovers. And Imoinda, who saw with some joy the change in the Prince's face, and found it in her own, strove to divert the King from beholding either by a forced caress, with which she met him, which was a new wound in the heart of the poor dying Prince. But as soon as the King was busied in looking on some fine thing of Imoinda's making, she had time to tell the Prince with her angry but love-darting eyes that she resented his coldness, and bemoaned her own miserable captivity. Nor were his eyes silent, but answered hers again, as much as eyes could do, instructed by the most tender and most passionate heart that ever loved. And they spoke so well and so effectually, as Imoinda no longer doubted but she was the only delight and the darling of that soul she found pleading in 'em its right of love, which none was more willing to resign than she. And 'twas this powerful language alone that in an instant conveyed all the thoughts of their souls to each other, that<sup>5</sup> they both found there wanted but opportunity to make them both entirely happy. But when he saw another door opened by Onahal, a former old wife of the King's who now had charge of Imoinda, and saw the prospect of a bed of state made ready with sweets and flowers for the dalliance of the King, who immediately led the trembling victim from his sight into that prepared repose, what rage, what wild frenzies seized his heart! which forcing to keep within bounds, and to suffer without noise, it became the more insupportable, and rent his soul with ten thousand pains. He was forced to retire to vent his groans, where he fell down on a carpet and lay struggling a long time, and only breathing now and then, "—O Imoinda!"

When Onahal had finished her necessary affair within, shutting the door, she came forth to wait till the King called; and hearing someone sighing in the other room, she passed on, and found the Prince in that deplorable condition, which she thought needed her aid. She gave him cordials, but all in vain, till finding the nature of his disease by his sighs and naming Imoinda. She told him, he had not so much cause as he imagined to afflict himself, for if he knew the King so well as she did, he would not lose a moment in jealousy, and that she was confident that Imoinda bore, at this minute, part in his affliction. Aboan was of the same opinion, and both together persuaded him to reassume his courage; and all sitting down on the carpet, the Prince said so many obliging things to Onahal that he half persuaded her to be of his party. And she promised him she would thus far comply with his just desires, that she would let Imoinda know how faithful he was, what he suffered, and what he said.

This discourse lasted till the King called, which gave Oroonoko a certain satisfaction, and with the hope Onahal had made him conceive, he assumed a look as gay as 'twas possible a man in his circumstances could do; and presently after, he was called in with the rest who waited without. The King commanded music to be brought, and several of his young wives and mistresses came all together by his command to dance before him; where Imoinda performed her part with an air and grace so passing all the rest as her beauty was above 'em, and received the present ordained as a prize. The Prince was every moment more charmed with the new beauties and graces he beheld in this fair one. And while he gazed, and she danced, Onahal was retired to a window with Aboan.

This Onahal, as I said, was one of the cast mistresses of the old king; and 'twas these (now past their beauty) that were made guardians or governants<sup>6</sup> to the new and the young ones, and whose business it was to teach them all those wanton arts of love with which they prevailed and charmed heretofore in their turn; and who now treated the triumphing happy ones with all the severity, as to liberty and freedom, that was possible, in revenge of those honors they rob them of; envying them those satisfactions, those gallantries and presents, that were once made to themselves, while youth and beauty lasted, and which they now saw pass regardless by, and paid only to the bloomings. And certainly nothing is more afflicting to a decayed beauty than to behold in itself declining charms that were once adored, and to find those caresses paid to new beauties to which once she laid a claim; to hear 'em whisper as she passes by, "That once was a delicate woman." These abandoned ladies therefore endeavor to revenge all the despites<sup>7</sup> and decays of time on these flourishing happy ones. And 'twas this severity that gave Oroonoko a thousand fears he should never prevail with Onahal to see Imoinda. But, as I said, she was now retired to a window with Aboan.

This young man was not only one of the best quality,<sup>8</sup> but a man extremely well made and beautiful; and coming often to attend the King to the Otan, he had subdued the heart of the antiquated Onahal, which had not forgot how pleasant it was to be in love. And though she had some decays in her face, she had none in her sense and wit; she was there agreeable still, even to Aboan's youth, so that he took pleasure in entertaining her with discourses of love. He knew also that to make his court to these she-favorites was the way to be great, these being the persons that do all affairs and business at court. He had also observed that she had given him glances more tender and inviting than she had done to others of his quality. And now, when he saw that her favor could so absolutely oblige the Prince, he failed not to sigh in her ear and to look with eyes all soft upon her, and give her hope that she had made some impressions on his heart. He found her pleased at this, and making a thousand advances to him; but the ceremony ending and the King departing broke up the company for that day, and his conversation.

Aboan failed not that night to tell the Prince of his success, and how advantageous the service of Onahal might be to his amour with Imoinda. The Prince was overjoyed with this good news and besought him, if it were possible, to caress her so as to engage her entirely, which he could not fail to do, if he complied with her desires. "For then," said the Prince, "her life lying at your mercy, she must grant you the request you make in my behalf." Aboan understood him, and assured him he would make love so effectually that he would defy the most expert mistress of the art to find out whether he dissembled it or had it really. And 'twas with impatience they waited the next opportunity of going to the Otan.

The wars came on, the time of taking the field approached, and 'twas impossible for the Prince to delay his going at the head of his army to encounter the enemy. So that every day seemed a tedious year till he saw his Imoinda, for he believed he could not live if he were forced away without being so happy. 'Twas with impatience, therefore, that he expected the next visit the King would make, and according to his wish, it was not long.

The parley of the eyes of these two lovers had not passed so secretly but an old jealous lover could spy it; or rather, he wanted not flatterers who told him they observed it. So that the Prince was hastened to the camp, and this was the last visit he found he should make to the Otan; he therefore urged Aboan to make the best of this last effort, and to explain himself so to Onahal that she, deferring her enjoyment of her young lover no longer, might make way for the Prince to speak to Imoinda.

The whole affair being agreed on between the Prince and Aboan, they attended the King, as the custom was, to the Otan, where, while the whole company was taken up in beholding the dancing and antic postures the women-royal made to divert the King, Onahal singled out Aboan, whom she found most pliable to her wish. When she had him where she believed she could not be heard, she sighed to him, and softly cried, "Ah, Aboan! When will you be sensible of my passion? I confess it with my mouth, because I would not give my eyes the lie; and you have but too much already perceived they have confessed my flame. Nor would I have you believe that because I am the abandoned mistress of a king, I esteem myself altogether divested of charms. No, Aboan; I have still a rest<sup>9</sup> of beauty enough engaging, and have learned to please too well not to be desirable. I can have lovers still, but will have none but Aboan." "Madam," replied the half-feigning youth, "you have already, by my eyes, found you can still conquer, and I believe 'tis in pity of me you condescend to this kind confession. But, Madam, words are used to be so small a part of our country courtship, that 'tis rare one can get so happy an opportunity as to tell one's heart, and those few minutes we have are forced to be snatched for more certain proofs of love than speaking and sighing; and such I languish for."

He spoke this with such a tone that she hoped it true, and could not forbear believing it; and being wholly transported with joy, for having subdued the finest of all the King's subjects to her desires, she took from her ears two large pearls and commanded him to wear 'em in his. He would have refused 'em, crying, "Madam, these are not the proofs of your love that I expect; 'tis opportunity, 'tis a lone hour only, that can make me happy." But forcing the pearls into his hand, she whispered softly to him, "Oh! Do not fear a woman's invention, when love sets her a-thinking." And pressing his hand, she cried, "This night you shall be happy. Come to the gate of the orange groves behind the Otan, and I will be ready, about midnight, to receive you." 'Twas thus agreed, and she left him, that no notice might be taken of their speaking together.

The ladies were still dancing, and the King, laid on a carpet, with a great deal of pleasure was beholding them, especially Imoinda, who that day appeared more lovely than ever, being enlivened with the good tidings Onahal had brought her of the constant passion the Prince had for her. The Prince was laid on another carpet at the other end of the room, with his eyes fixed on the object of his soul; and as she turned or moved, so did they, and she alone gave his eyes and soul their motions. Nor did Imoinda employ her eyes to any other use than in beholding with infinite pleasure the joy she produced in those of the Prince. But while she was more regarding him than the steps she took, she chanced to fall, and so near him as that, leaping with extreme force from the carpet, he caught her in his arms as she fell; and 'twas visible to the whole presence<sup>1</sup> the joy wherewith he received her. He clasped her close to his bosom, and quite forgot that reverence that was due to the mistress of a king, and that punishment that is the reward of a boldness of this nature; and had not the presence of mind of Imoinda (fonder of his safety than her own) befriended him, in making her spring from his arms and fall into her dance again, he had at that instant met his death; for the old king, jealous to the last degree, rose up in rage, broke all the diversion, and led Imoinda to her apartment, and sent out word to the Prince to go immediately to the camp, and that if he were found another night in court he should suffer the death ordained for disobedient offenders.

You may imagine how welcome this news was to Oroonoko, whose unseasonable transport and caress of Imoinda was blamed by all men that loved him; and now he perceived his fault, yet cried that for such another moment, he would be content to die.

All the Otan was in disorder about this accident; and Onahal was particularly concerned, because on the Prince's stay depended her happiness, for she could no longer expect that of Aboan. So that ere they departed, they contrived it so that the Prince and he should come both that night to the grove of the Otan, which was all of oranges and citrons, and that there they should wait her orders.

They parted thus, with grief enough, till night, leaving the King in possession of the lovely maid. But nothing could appease the jealousy of the old lover. He would not be imposed on, but would have it that Imoinda made a false step on purpose to fall into Oroonoko's bosom, and that all things looked like a design on both sides; and 'twas in vain she protested her innocence. He was old and obstinate, and left her more than half assured that his fear was true.

The King going to his apartment sent to know where the Prince was, and if he intended to obey his command. The messenger returned and told him, he found the Prince pensive and altogether unpreparing for the campaign, that he lay negligently on the ground, and answered very little. This confirmed the jealousy of the King, and he commanded that they should very narrowly and privately watch his motions, and that he should not stir from his apartment but one spy or other should be employed to watch him. So that the hour approaching wherein he was to go to the citron grove, and taking only Aboan along with him, he leaves his apartment, and was watched to the very gate of the Otan, where he was seen to enter, and where they left him, to carry back the tidings to the King.

Oroonoko and Aboan were no sooner entered but Onahal led the Prince to the apartment of Imoinda, who, not knowing anything of her happiness, was laid in bed. But Onahal only left him in her chamber, to make the best of his opportunity, and took her dear Aboan to her own, where he showed the height of complaisance for his prince, when, to give him an opportunity, he suffered himself to be caressed in bed by Onahal.

The Prince softly wakened Imoinda, who was not a little surprised with joy to find him there; and yet she trembled with a thousand fears. I believe he omitted saying nothing to this young maid that might persuade her to suffer him to seize his own, and take the rights of love; and I believe she was not long resisting those arms where she so longed to be; and having opportunity, night and silence, youth, love and desire, he soon prevailed, and ravished in a moment what his old grandfather had been endeavoring for so many months.

'Tis not to be imagined the satisfaction of these two young lovers; nor the vows she made him that she remained a spotless maid till that night, and that what she did with his grandfather had robbed him of no part of her virgin honor, the gods in mercy and justice having reserved that for her plighted lord, to whom of right it belonged. And 'tis impossible to express the transports he suffered, while he listened to a discourse so charming from her loved lips, and clasped that body in his arms for whom he had so long languished; and nothing now afflicted him but his sudden departure from her; for he told her the necessity and his commands, but should depart satisfied in this, that since the old king had hitherto not been able to deprive him of those enjoyments which only belonged to him, he believed for the future he would be less able to injure him; so that abating the scandal of the veil, which was no otherwise so than that she was wife to another, he believed her safe, even in the arms of the King, and innocent; yet would he have ventured at the conquest of the world, and have given it all, to have had her avoided that honor of receiving the royal veil. 'Twas thus, between a thousand caresses, that both bemoaned the hard fate of youth and beauty, so liable to that cruel promotion. 'Twas a glory that could well have been spared here, though desired and aimed at by all the young females of that kingdom.

But while they were thus fondly employed, forgetting how time ran on, and that the dawn must conduct him far away from his only happiness, they heard a great noise in the Otan, and unusual voices of men; at which the Prince, starting from the arms of the frightened Imoinda, ran to a little battle-ax he used to wear by his side, and having not so much leisure as to put on his habit, he opposed himself against some who were already opening the door; which they did with so much violence that Oroonoko was not able to defend it, but was forced to cry out with a commanding voice, "Whoever ye are that have the boldness to attempt to approach this apartment thus rudely, know that I, the Prince Oroonoko, will revenge it with the certain death of him that first enters. Therefore stand back, and know, this place is sacred to love and me this night; tomorrow 'tis the King's."

This he spoke with a voice so resolved and assured that they soon retired from the door, but cried, "'Tis by the King's command we are come; and being satisfied by thy voice, O Prince, as much as if we had entered, we can report to the King the truth of all his fears, and leave thee to provide for thy own safety, as thou art advised by thy friends."

At these words they departed, and left the Prince to take a short and sad leave of his Imoinda, who, trusting in the strength of her charms, believed she should appease the fury of a jealous king by saying she was surprised, and that it was by force of arms he got into her apartment. All her concern now was for his life, and therefore she hastened him to the camp, and with much ado prevailed on him to go. Nor was it she alone that prevailed; Aboan and Onahal both pleaded, and both assured him of a lie that should be well enough contrived to secure Imoinda. So that at last, with a heart sad as death, dying eyes, and sighing soul, Oroonoko departed and took his way to the camp.

It was not long after the King in person came to the Otan, where, beholding Imoinda with rage in his eyes, he upbraided her wickedness and perfidy, and threatening her royal lover, she fell on her face at his feet, bedewing the floor with her tears and imploring his pardon for a fault which she had not with her will committed, as Onahal, who was also prostrate with her, could testify; that unknown to her, he had broke into her apartment, and ravished her. She spoke this much against her conscience, but to save her own life 'twas absolutely necessary she should feign this falsity. She knew it could not injure the Prince, he being fled to an army that would stand by him against any injuries that should assault him. However, this last thought of Imoinda's being ravished changed the measures of his revenge; and whereas before he designed to be himself her executioner, he now resolved she should not die. But as it is the greatest crime in nature amongst 'em to touch a woman after having been possessed by a son, a father, or a brother, so now he looked on Imoinda as a polluted thing, wholly unfit for his embrace; nor would he resign her to his grandson, because she had received the royal veil. He therefore removes her from the Otan, with Onahal; whom he put into safe hands, with order they should be both sold off as slaves to another country, either Christian or heathen; 'twas no matter where.

This cruel sentence, worse than death, they implored might be reversed; but their prayers were vain, and it was put in execution accordingly, and that with so much secrecy that none, either without or within the Otan, knew anything of their absence or their destiny.

The old king, nevertheless, executed this with a great deal of reluctancy; but he believed he had made a very great conquest over himself, when he had once resolved, and had performed what he resolved. He believed now that his love had been unjust, and that he could not expect the gods, or Captain of the Clouds (as they call the unknown power), should suffer a better consequence from so ill a cause. He now begins to hold Oroonoko excused, and to say he had reason for what he did. And now everybody could assure the King how passionately Imoinda was beloved by the Prince; even those confessed it now, who said the contrary before his flame was abated. So that the King being old, and not able to defend himself in war, and having no sons of all his race remaining alive but only this, to maintain him on his throne; and looking on this as a man disoblged, first by the rape of his mistress, or rather wife; and now by depriving of him wholly of her, he feared, might make him desperate and do some cruel thing, either to himself or his old grandfather, the offender: he began to repent him extremely of the contempt he had, in his rage, put on Imoinda. Besides, he considered he ought in honor to have killed her for this offense, if it had been one. He ought to have had so much value and consideration for a maid of her quality as to have nobly put her to death, and not to have sold her like a common slave, the greatest revenge and the most disgraceful of any; and to which they a thousand times prefer death, and implore it, as Imoinda did, but could not obtain that honor. Seeing therefore it was certain that Oroonoko would highly resent this affront, he thought good to make some excuse for his rashness to him; and to that end he sent a messenger to the camp, with orders to treat with him about the matter, to gain his pardon, and to endeavor to mitigate his grief; but that by no means he should tell him she was sold, but secretly put to death, for he knew he should never obtain his pardon for the other.

When the messenger came, he found the Prince upon the point of engaging with the enemy; but as soon as he heard of the arrival of the messenger, he commanded him to his tent, where he embraced him and received him with joy; which was soon abated by the downcast looks of the messenger, who was instantly demanded the cause by Oroonoko, who, impatient of delay, asked a thousand questions in a breath, and all concerning Imoinda. But there needed little return, for he could almost answer himself of all he demanded, from his sighs and eyes. At last, the messenger casting himself at the Prince's feet, and kissing them with all the submission of a man that had something to implore which he dreaded to utter, he besought him to hear with calmness what he had to deliver to him, and to call up all his noble and heroic courage to encounter with his words, and defend himself against the ungrateful<sup>2</sup> things he must relate. Oroonoko replied, with a deep sigh and a languishing voice, "I am armed against their worst efforts—; for I know they will tell me, Imoinda is no more—and after that, you may spare the rest." Then, commanding him to rise, he laid himself on a carpet, under a rich pavilion, and remained a good while silent, and was hardly heard to sigh. When he was come a little to himself, the messenger asked him leave to deliver that part of his embassy which the Prince had not yet divined. And the Prince cried, "I permit thee—." Then he told him the affliction the old king was in, for the rashness he had committed in his cruelty to Imoinda; and how he deigned to ask pardon for his offense, and to implore the Prince would not suffer that loss to touch his heart too sensibly, which now all the gods could not restore him, but might recompense him in glory, which he begged he would pursue; and that Death, that common revenger of all injuries, would soon even the account between him and a feeble old man.

Oroonoko bade him return his duty to his lord and master, and to assure him, there was no account of revenge to be adjusted between them; if there were, 'twas he was the aggressor, and that Death would be just and, maugre<sup>3</sup> his age, would see him righted; and he was contented to leave his share of glory to youths more fortunate and worthy of that favor from the gods. That henceforth he would never lift a weapon or draw a bow, but abandon the small remains of his life to sighs and tears, and the continual thoughts of what his lord and grandfather had thought good to send out of the world, with all that youth, that innocence, and beauty.

After having spoken this, whatever his greatest officers and men of the best rank could do, they could not raise him from the carpet, or persuade him to action and resolutions of life; but commanding all to retire, he shut himself into his pavilion all that day, while the enemy was ready to engage; and wondering at the delay, the whole body of the chief of the army then addressed themselves to him, and to whom they had much ado to get admittance. They fell on their faces at the foot of his carpet, where they lay and besought him with earnest prayers and tears to lead 'em forth to battle, and not let the enemy take advantages of them; and implored him to have regard to his glory, and to the world, that depended on his courage and conduct. But he made no other reply to all their supplications but this, that he had now no more business for glory; and for the world, it was a trifle not worth his care. "Go," continued he, sighing, "and divide it amongst you; and reap with joy what you so vainly prize, and leave me to my more welcome destiny."

They then demanded what they should do, and whom he would constitute in his room, that the confusion of ambitious youth and power might not ruin their order and make them a prey to the enemy. He replied, he would not give himself the trouble—; but wished 'em to choose the bravest man amongst 'em, let his quality or birth be what it would. "For, O my friends!" said he, "it is not titles make men brave or good, or birth that bestows courage and generosity, or makes the owner happy. Believe this, when you behold Oroonoko, the most wretched and abandoned by fortune of all the creation of the gods." So turning himself about, he would make no more reply to all they could urge or implore.

The army, beholding their officers return unsuccessful, with sad faces and ominous looks that presaged no good luck, suffered a thousand fears to take possession of their hearts, and the enemy to come even upon 'em, before they would provide for their safety by any defense; and though they were assured by some, who had a mind to animate 'em, that they should be immediately headed by the Prince, and that in the meantime Aboan had orders to command as general, yet they were so dismayed for want of that great example of bravery that they could make but a very feeble resistance; and at last downright fled before the enemy, who pursued 'em to the very tents, killing 'em. Nor could all Aboan's courage, which that day gained him immortal glory, shame 'em into a manly defense of themselves. The guards that were left behind about the Prince's tent, seeing the soldiers flee before the enemy and scatter themselves all over the plain, in great disorder, made such outcries as roused the Prince from his amorous slumber, in which he had remained buried for two days without permitting any sustenance to approach him. But in spite of all his resolutions, he had not the constancy of grief to that degree, as to make him insensible of the danger of his army; and in that instant he leaped from his couch and cried, "—Come, if we must die, let us meet Death the noblest way; and 'twill be more like Oroonoko to encounter him at an army's head, opposing the torrent of a conquering foe, than lazily on a couch to wait his lingering pleasure, and die every moment by a thousand wrecking<sup>4</sup> thoughts; or be tamely taken by an enemy, and led a whining, lovesick slave to adorn the triumphs of Jamoan, that young victor, who already is entered beyond the limits I had prescribed him."

While he was speaking, he suffered his people to dress him for the field, and sallying out of his pavilion, with more life and vigor in his countenance than ever he showed, he appeared like some divine power descended to save his country from destruction; and his people had purposely put on him all things that might make him shine with most splendor, to strike a reverend awe into the beholders. He flew into the thickest of those that were pursuing his men, and being animated with despair, he fought as if he came on purpose to die, and did such things as will not be believed that human strength could perform, and such as soon inspired all the rest with new courage and new order. And now it was that they began to fight indeed, and so as if they would not be outdone even by their adored hero; who, turning the tide of the victory, changing absolutely the fate of the day, gained an entire conquest; and Oroonoko having the good fortune to single out Jamoan, he took him prisoner with his own hand, having wounded him almost to death.

This Jamoan afterwards became very dear to him, being a man very gallant and of excellent graces and fine parts; so that he never put him amongst the rank of captives, as they used to do, without distinction, for the common sale or market; but kept him in his own court, where he retained nothing of the prisoner but the name, and returned no more into his own country, so great an affection he took for Oroonoko; and by a thousand tales and adventures of love and gallantry flattered<sup>5</sup> his disease of melancholy and languishment, which I have often heard him say had certainly killed him, but for the conversation of this prince and Aboan, and the French governor he had from his childhood, of whom I have spoken before, and who was a man of admirable wit, great ingenuity and learning, all which he had infused into his young pupil. This Frenchman was banished out of his own country for some heretical notions he held, and though he was a man of very little religion, he had admirable morals and a brave soul.

After the total defeat of Jamoan's army, which all fled, or were left dead upon the place, they spent some time in the camp, Oroonoko choosing rather to remain a while there in his tents than enter into a palace or live in a court where he had so lately suffered so great a loss. The officers, therefore, who saw and knew his cause of discontent, invented all sorts of diversions and sports to entertain their prince; so that what with those amusements abroad and others at home, that is, within their tents, with the persuasions, arguments, and care of his friends and servants that he more peculiarly prized, he wore off in time a great part of that chagrin and torture of despair which the first efforts of Imoinda's death had given him. Insomuch as having received a thousand kind embassies from the King, and invitations to return to court, he obeyed, though with no little reluctance; and when he did so, there was a visible change in him, and for a long time he was much more melancholy than before. But time lessens all extremes, and reduces 'em to mediums and unconcern; but no motives or beauties, though all endeavored it, could engage him in any sort of amour, though he had all the invitations to it, both from his own youth and others' ambitions and designs.

Oroonoko was no sooner returned from this last conquest, and received at court with all the joy and magnificence that could be expressed to a young victor, who was not only returned triumphant but beloved like a deity, when there arrived in the port an English ship.

This person<sup>6</sup> had often before been in these countries and was very well known to Oroonoko, with whom he had trafficked for slaves, and had used to do the same with his predecessors.

This commander was a man of a finer sort of address and conversation, better bred and more engaging than most of that sort of men are, so that he seemed rather never to have been bred out of a court than almost all his life at sea. This captain therefore was always better received at court than most of the traders to those countries were; and especially by Oroonoko, who was more civilized, according to the European mode, than any other had been, and took more delight in the white nations, and above all men of parts and wit. To this captain he sold abundance of his slaves, and for the favor and esteem he had for him, made him many presents, and obliged him to stay at court as long as possibly he could. Which the captain seemed to take as a very great honor done him, entertaining the Prince every day with globes and maps, and mathematical discourses and instruments; eating, drinking, hunting, and living with him with so much familiarity that it was not to be doubted but he had gained very greatly upon the heart of this gallant young man. And the captain, in return of all these mighty favors, besought the Prince to honor his vessel with his presence, some day or other, to dinner, before he should set sail; which he condescended to accept, and appointed his day. The captain, on his part, failed not to have all things in a readiness, in the most magnificent order he could possibly. And the day being come, the captain in his boat, richly adorned with carpets and velvet cushions, rowed to the shore to receive the Prince, with another longboat where was placed all his music and trumpets, with which Oroonoko was extremely delighted; who met him on the shore attended by his French governor, Jamoan, Aboan, and about a hundred of the noblest of the youths of the court. And after they had first carried the Prince on board, the boats fetched the rest off; where they found a very splendid treat, with all sorts of fine wines, and were as well entertained as 'twas possible in such a place to be.

The Prince, having drunk hard of punch and several sorts of wine, as did all the rest (for great care was taken they should want nothing of that part of the entertainment), was very merry, and in great admiration of the ship, for he had never been in one before; so that he was curious of beholding every place where he decently might descend. The rest, no less curious, who were not quite overcome with drinking, rambled at their pleasure fore and aft, as their fancies guided 'em. So that the captain, who had well laid his design before, gave the word, and seized on all his guests; they clapping great irons suddenly on the Prince, when he was leaped down in the hold to view that part of the vessel, and locking him fast down, secured him. The same treachery was used to all the rest; and all in one instant, in several places of the ship, were lashed fast in irons, and betrayed to slavery. That great design over, they set all hands to work to hoise<sup>z</sup> sail; and with as treacherous and fair a wind, they made from the shore with this innocent and glorious prize, who thought of nothing less than such an entertainment.

Some have commended this act as brave in the captain; but I will spare my sense of it, and leave it to my reader to judge as he pleases.

It may be easily guessed in what manner the Prince resented this indignity, who may be best resembled to a lion taken in a toil; so he raged, so he struggled for liberty, but all in vain; and they had so wisely managed his fetters that he could not use a hand in his defense, to quit himself of a life that would by no means endure slavery, nor could he move from the place where he was tied to any solid part of the ship, against which he might have beat his head, and have finished his disgrace that way. So that being deprived of all other means, he resolved to perish for want of food. And pleased at last with that thought, and toiled and tired by rage and indignation, he laid himself down, and sullenly resolved upon dying, and refused all things that were brought him.

This did not a little vex the captain, and the more so because he found almost all of 'em of the same humor; so that the loss of so many brave slaves, so tall and goodly to behold, would have been very considerable. He therefore ordered one to go from him (for he would not be seen himself) to Oroonoko, and to assure him he was afflicted for having rashly done so unhospitable a deed, and which could not be now remedied, since they were far from shore; but since he resented it in so high a nature, he assured him he would revoke his resolution, and set both him and his friends ashore on the next land they should touch at; and of this the messenger gave him his oath, provided he would resolve to live. And Oroonoko, whose honor was such as he never had violated a word in his life himself, much less a solemn asseveration, believed in an instant what this man said, but replied, he expected for a confirmation of this to have his shameful fetters dismissed. This demand was carried to the captain, who returned him answer that the offense had been so great which he had put upon the Prince that he durst not trust him with liberty while he remained in the ship, for fear lest by a valor natural to him, and a revenge that would animate that valor, he might commit some outrage fatal to himself and the King his master, to whom his vessel did belong. To this Oroonoko replied, he would engage his honor to behave himself in all friendly order and manner, and obey the command of the captain, as he was lord of the King's vessel and general of those men under his command.

This was delivered to the still doubting captain, who could not resolve to trust a heathen, he said, upon his parole,<sup>8</sup> a man that had no sense or notion of the God that he worshipped. Oroonoko then replied, he was very sorry to hear that the captain pretended to the knowledge and worship of any gods who had taught him no better principles than not to credit as he would be credited; but they told him the difference of their faith occasioned that distrust. For the captain had protested to him upon the word of a Christian, and sworn in the name of a great god, which if he should violate, he would expect eternal torment in the world to come. "Is that all the obligation he has to be just to his oath?" replied Oroonoko. "Let him know I swear by my honor; which to violate, would not only render me contemptible and despised by all brave and honest men, and so give myself perpetual pain, but it would be eternally offending and diseasing all mankind, harming, betraying, circumventing and outraging all men; but punishments hereafter are suffered by one's self, and the world takes no cognizances whether this god have revenged 'em or not, 'tis done so secretly and deferred so long. While the man of no honor suffers every moment the scorn and contempt of the honester world, and dies every day ignominiously in his fame, which is more valuable than life. I speak not this to move belief, but to show you how you mistake, when you imagine that he who will violate his honor will keep his word with his gods." So turning from him with a disdainful smile, he refused to answer him, when he urged him to know what answer he should carry back to his captain; so that he departed without saying any more.

The captain pondering and consulting what to do, it was concluded that nothing but Oroonoko's liberty would encourage any of the rest to eat, except the Frenchman, whom the captain could not pretend to keep prisoner, but only told him he was secured because he might act something in favor of the Prince, but that he should be freed as soon as they came to land. So that they concluded it wholly necessary to free the Prince from his irons, that he might show himself to the rest; that they might have an eye upon him, and that they could not fear a single man.

This being resolved, to make the obligation the greater, the captain himself went to Oroonoko; where after many compliments, and assurances of what he had already promised, he receiving from the Prince his parole and his hand for his good behavior, dismissed his irons and brought him to his own cabin; where after having treated and reposed him a while, for he had neither eat<sup>9</sup> nor slept in four days before, he besought him to visit those obstinate people in chains, who refused all manner of sustenance, and entreated him to oblige 'em to eat, and assure 'em of their liberty the first opportunity.

Oroonoko, who was too generous not to give credit to his words, showed himself to his people, who were transported with excess of joy at the sight of their darling prince, falling at his feet and kissing and embracing 'em, believing, as some divine oracle, all he assured 'em. But he besought 'em to bear their chains with that bravery that became those whom he had seen act so nobly in arms; and that they could not give him greater proofs of their love and friendship, since 'twas all the security the captain (his friend) could have, against the revenge, he said, they might possibly justly take for the injuries sustained by him. And they all with one accord assured him, they could not suffer enough, when it was for his repose and safety.

After this they no longer refused to eat, but took what was brought 'em, and were pleased with their captivity, since by it they hoped to redeem the Prince, who, all the rest of the voyage, was treated with all the respect due to his birth, though nothing could divert his melancholy; and he would often sigh for Imoinda, and think this a punishment due to his misfortune, in having left that noble maid behind him that fatal night, in the Otan, when he fled to the camp.

Possessed with a thousand thoughts of past joys with this fair young person, and a thousand griefs for her eternal loss, he endured a tedious voyage, and at last arrived at the mouth of the river of Surinam, a colony belonging to the King of England, and where they were to deliver some part of their slaves. There the merchants and gentlemen of the country going on board to demand those lots of slaves they had already agreed on, and, amongst those, the overseers of those plantations where I then chanced to be, the captain, who had given the word, ordered his men to bring up those noble slaves in fetters whom I have spoken of; and having put 'em some in one and some in other lots, with women and children (which they call pickaninnies), they sold 'em off as slaves to several merchants and gentlemen; not putting any two in one lot, because they would separate 'em far from each other, not daring to trust 'em together, lest rage and courage should put 'em upon contriving some great action, to the ruin of the colony.

Oroonoko was first seized on, and sold to our overseer, who had the first lot, with seventeen more of all sorts and sizes, but not one of quality with him. When he saw this, he found what they meant, for, as I said, he understood English pretty well; and being wholly unarmed and defenseless, so as it was in vain to make any resistance, he only beheld the captain with a look all fierce and disdainful, upbraiding him with eyes that forced blushes on his guilty cheeks; he only cried, in passing over the side of the ship, "Farewell, sir. 'Tis worth my suffering, to gain so true a knowledge both of you and of your gods by whom you swear." And desiring those that held him to forbear their pains, and telling 'em he would make no resistance, he cried, "Come, my fellow slaves; let us descend, and see if we can meet with more honor and honesty in the next world we shall touch upon." So he nimbly leaped into the boat, and showing no more concern, suffered himself to be rowed up the river with his seventeen companions.

The gentleman that bought him was a young Cornish gentleman whose name was Trefry, a man of great wit and fine learning, and was carried into those parts by the Lord —, Governor,<sup>1</sup> to manage all his affairs. He reflecting on the last words of Oroonoko to the captain, and beholding the richness of his vest,<sup>2</sup> no sooner came into the boat but he fixed his eyes on him; and finding something so extraordinary in his face, his shape and mien, a greatness of look and haughtiness in his air, and finding he spoke English, had a great mind to be inquiring into his quality and fortune; which, though Oroonoko endeavored to hide, by only confessing he was above the rank of common slaves, Trefry soon found he was yet something greater than he confessed, and from that moment began to conceive so vast an esteem for him that he ever after loved him as his dearest brother, and showed him all the civilities due to so great a man.

Trefry was a very good mathematician and a linguist, could speak French and Spanish; and in the three days they remained in the boat (for so long were they going from the ship to the plantation) he entertained Oroonoko so agreeably with his art and discourse, that he was no less pleased with Trefry than he was with the Prince; and he thought himself at least fortunate in this, that since he was a slave, as long as he would suffer himself to remain so, he had a man of so excellent wit and parts for a master. So that before they had finished their voyage up the river, he made no scruple of declaring to Trefry all his fortunes, and most part of what I have here related, and put himself wholly into the hands of his new friend, whom he found resenting all the injuries were done him, and was charmed with all the greatness of his actions; which were recited with that modesty and delicate sense as wholly vanquished him, and subdued him to his interest. And he promised him on his word and honor, he would find the means to reconduct him to his own country again, assuring him, he had a perfect abhorrence of so dishonorable an action, and that he would sooner have died than have been the author of such a perfidy. He found the Prince was very much concerned to know what became of his friends, and how they took their slavery; and Trefry promised to take care about the inquiring after their condition, and that he should have an account of 'em.

Though, as Oroonoko afterwards said, he had little reason to credit the words of a backearary,<sup>3</sup> yet he knew not why, but he saw a kind of sincerity and awful truth in the face of Trefry; he saw an honesty in his eyes, and he found him wise and witty enough to understand honor; for it was one of his maxims, a man of wit could not be a knave or villain.

In their passage up the river they put in at several houses for refreshment, and ever when they landed, numbers of people would flock to behold this man; not but their eyes were daily entertained with the sight of slaves, but the fame of Oroonoko was gone before him, and all people were in admiration of his beauty. Besides, he had a rich habit on, in which he was taken, so different from the rest, and which the captain could not strip him of, because he was forced to surprise his person in the minute he sold him. When he found his habit made him liable, as he thought, to be gazed at the more, he begged Trefry to give him something more befitting a slave, which he did, and took off his robes. Nevertheless, he shone through all; and his osenbrigs (a sort of brown holland<sup>4</sup> suit he had on) could not conceal the graces of his looks and mien, and he had no less admirers than when he had his dazzling habit on. The royal youth appeared in spite of the slave, and people could not help treating him after a different manner, without designing it. As soon as they approached him, they venerated and esteemed him; his eyes insensibly commanded respect, and his behavior insinuated it into every soul. So that there was nothing talked of but this young and gallant slave, even by those who yet knew not that he was a prince.

I ought to tell you that the Christians never buy any slaves but they give 'em some name of their own, their native ones being likely very barbarous and hard to pronounce; so that Mr. Trefry gave Oroonoko that of Caesar, which name will live in that country as long as that (scarce more) glorious one of the great Roman; for 'tis most evident, he wanted<sup>5</sup> no part of the personal courage of that Caesar, and acted things as memorable, had they been done in some part of the world replenished with people and historians that might have given him his due. But his misfortune was to fall in an obscure world, that afforded only a female pen to celebrate his fame; though I doubt not but it had lived from others' endeavors, if the Dutch, who immediately after his time took that country,<sup>6</sup> had not killed, banished, and dispersed all those that were capable of giving the world this great man's life, much better than I have done. And Mr.

Trefry, who designed it, died before he began it, and bemoaned himself for not having undertook it in time.

For the future, therefore, I must call Oroonoko Caesar, since by that name only he was known in our western world, and by that name he was received on shore at Parham House, where he was destined a slave. But if the King himself (God bless him) had come ashore, there could not have been greater expectations by all the whole plantation, and those neighboring ones, than was on ours at that time; and he was received more like a governor than a slave. Notwithstanding, as the custom was, they assigned him his portion of land, his house, and his business, up in the plantation. But as it was more for form than any design to put him to his task, he endured no more of the slave but the name, and remained some days in the house, receiving all visits that were made him, without stirring towards that part of the plantation where the Negroes were.

At last he would needs go view his land, his house, and the business assigned him. But he no sooner came to the houses of the slaves, which are like a little town by itself, the Negroes all having left work, but they all came forth to behold him, and found he was that prince who had, at several times, sold most of 'em to these parts; and from a veneration they pay to great men, especially if they know 'em, and from the surprise and awe they had at the sight of him, they all cast themselves at his feet, crying out in their language, "Live, O King! Long live, O King!" and kissing his feet, paid him even divine homage.

Several English gentlemen were with him; and what Mr. Trefry had told 'em was here confirmed, of which he himself before had no other witness than Caesar himself. But he was infinitely glad to find his grandeur confirmed by the adoration of all the slaves.

Caesar, troubled with their over-joy and over-ceremony, besought 'em to rise and to receive him as their fellow slave, assuring them he was no better. At which they set up with one accord a most terrible and hideous mourning and condoling, which he and the English had much ado to appease; but at last they prevailed with 'em, and they prepared all their barbarous music, and everyone killed and dressed something of his own stock (for every family has their land apart, on which, at their leisure times, they breed all eatable things), and clubbing it together,<sup>7</sup> made a most magnificent supper, inviting their Grandee Captain, their prince, to honor it with his presence; which he did, and several English with him; where they all waited on him, some playing, others dancing before him all the time, according to the manners of their several nations, and with unwearied industry endeavoring to please and delight him.

While they sat at meat Mr. Trefry told Caesar that most of these young slaves were undone in love with a fine she-slave, whom they had had about six months on their land. The Prince, who never heard the name of love without a sigh, nor any mention of it without the curiosity of examining further into that tale, which of all discourses was most agreeable to him, asked how they came to be so unhappy as to be all undone for one fair slave. Trefry, who was naturally amorous and loved to talk of love as well as anybody, proceeded to tell him, they had the most charming black that ever was beheld on their plantation, about fifteen or sixteen years old, as he guessed; that for his part, he had done nothing but sigh for her ever since she came, and that all the white beauties he had seen never charmed him so absolutely as this fine creature had done; and that no man, of any nation, ever beheld her that did not fall in love with her; and that she had all the slaves perpetually at her feet, and the whole country resounded with the fame of Clemene, “for so,” said he, “we have christened her. But she denies us all with such a noble disdain, that ’tis a miracle to see that she, who can give such eternal desires, should herself be all ice and all unconcern. She is adorned with the most graceful modesty that ever beautified youth; the softest sigher—that, if she were capable of love, one would swear she languished for some absent happy man; and so retired, as if she feared a rape even from the god of day,<sup>8</sup> or that the breezes would steal kisses from her delicate mouth. Her task of work some sighing lover every day makes it his petition to perform for her, which she accepts blushing and with reluctance, for fear he will ask her a look for a recompense, which he dares not presume to hope, so great an awe she strikes into the hearts of her admirers." "I do not wonder," replied the Prince, "that Clemene should refuse slaves, being as you say so beautiful, but wonder how she escapes those who can entertain her as you can do; or why, being your slave, you do not oblige her to yield." "I confess," said Trefry, "when I have, against her will, entertained her with love so long as to be transported with my passion, even above decency, I have been ready to make use of those advantages of strength and force nature has given me. But oh! she disarms me with that modesty and weeping, so tender and so moving that I retire, and thank my stars she overcame me." The company laughed at his civility to a slave, and Caesar only applauded the nobleness of his passion and nature, since that slave might be noble or, what was better, have true notions of honor and virtue in her. Thus passed they this night, after having received from the slaves all imaginable respect and obedience.

The next day Trefry asked Caesar to walk, when the heat was allayed, and designedly carried him by the cottage of the fair slave, and told him she whom he spoke of last night lived there retired. "But," says he, "I would not wish you to approach, for I am sure you will be in love as soon as you behold her." Caesar assured him he was proof against all the charms of that sex, and that if he imagined his heart could be so perfidious to love again, after Imoinda, he believed he should tear it from his bosom. They had no sooner spoke, but a little shock dog<sup>9</sup> that Clemene had presented her, which she took great delight in, ran out; and she, not knowing anybody was there, ran to get it in again, and bolted out on those who were just speaking of her. When seeing them, she would have run in again, but Trefry caught her by the hand and cried, "Clemene, however you fly a lover, you ought to pay some respect to this stranger" (pointing to Caesar). But she, as if she had resolved never to raise her eyes to the face of a man again, bent 'em the more to the earth when he spoke, and gave the Prince the leisure to look the more at her. There needed no long gazing or consideration to examine who this fair creature was; he soon saw Imoinda all over her; in a minute he saw her face, her shape, her air, her modesty, and all that called forth his soul with joy at his eyes, and left his body destitute of almost life; it stood without motion, and for a minute knew not that it had a being; and I believe he had never come to himself, so oppressed he was with over-joy, if he had not met with this allay, that he perceived Imoinda fall dead in the hands of Trefry. This awakened him, and he ran to her aid and caught her in his arms, where by degrees she came to herself; and 'tis needless to tell with what transports, what ecstasies of joy, they both a while beheld each other, without speaking; then snatched each other to their arms; then gaze again, as if they still doubted whether they possessed the blessing they grasped; but when they recovered their speech, 'tis not to be imagined what tender things they expressed to each other, wondering what strange fate had brought 'em again together. They soon informed each other of their fortunes, and equally bewailed their fate; but at the same time they mutually protested that even fetters and slavery were soft and easy, and would be supported with joy and pleasure, while they could be so happy to possess each other and to be able to make good their vows. Caesar swore he disdained the empire of the world while he could behold his Imoinda; and she despised grandeur and pomp, those vanities of her sex, when she could gaze on Oroonoko. He adored the very cottage where she resided, and said that little inch of the world would give him more happiness than all the universe could do; and she vowed it was a palace, while adorned with the presence of Oroonoko.

Trefry was infinitely pleased with this novel,<sup>1</sup> and found this Clemene was the fair mistress of whom Caesar had before spoke; and was not a little satisfied that heaven was so kind to the Prince as to sweeten his misfortunes by so lucky an accident; and leaving the lovers to themselves, was impatient to come down to Parham House (which was on the same plantation) to give me an account of what had happened. I was as impatient to make these lovers a visit, having already made a friendship with Caesar, and from his own mouth learned what I have related; which was confirmed by his Frenchman, who was set on shore to seek his fortunes, and of whom they could not make a slave, because a Christian, and he came daily to Parham Hill to see and pay his respects to his pupil prince. So that concerning and interesting myself in all that related to Caesar, whom I had assured of liberty as soon as the Governor arrived, I hasted presently to the place where the lovers were, and was infinitely glad to find this beautiful young slave (who had already gained all our esteems, for her modesty and her extraordinary prettiness) to be the same I had heard Caesar speak so much of. One may imagine then we paid her a treble respect; and though, from her being carved in fine flowers and birds all over her body, we took her to be of quality before, yet when we knew Clemene was Imoinda, we could not enough admire her.

I had forgot to tell you that those who are nobly born of that country are so delicately cut and rased<sup>2</sup> all over the forepart of the trunk of their bodies, that it looks as if it were japanned, the works being raised like high point round the edges of the flowers. Some are only carved with a little flower or bird at the sides of the temples, as was Caesar; and those who are so carved over the body resemble our ancient Picts,<sup>3</sup> that are figured in the chronicles, but these carvings are more delicate.

From that happy day Caesar took Clemene for his wife, to the general joy of all people; and there was as much magnificence as the country would afford at the celebration of this wedding: and in a very short time after she conceived with child, which made Caesar even adore her, knowing he was the last of his great race. This new accident made him more impatient of liberty, and he was every day treating with Trefry for his and Clemene's liberty, and offered either gold or a vast quantity of slaves, which should be paid before they let him go, provided he could have any security that he should go when his ransom was paid. They fed him from day to day with promises, and delayed him till the Lord Governor should come; so that he began to suspect them of falsehood, and that they would delay him till the time of his wife's delivery and make a slave of that too, for all the breed is theirs to whom the parents belong. This thought made him very uneasy, and his sullenness gave them some jealousies<sup>4</sup> of him; so that I was obliged, by some persons who feared a mutiny (which is very fatal sometimes in those colonies, that abound so with slaves that they exceed the whites in vast numbers), to discourse with Caesar, and to give him all the satisfaction I possibly could; they knew he and Clemene were scarce an hour in a day from my lodgings, that they eat with me, and that I obliged 'em in all things I was capable of. I entertained him with the lives of the Romans, and great men, which charmed him to my company, and her with teaching her all the pretty works<sup>5</sup> that I was mistress of, and telling her stories of nuns, and endeavoring to bring her to the knowledge of the true God. But of all discourses Caesar liked that the worst, and would never be reconciled to our notions of the Trinity, of which he ever made a jest; it was a riddle, he said, would turn his brain to conceive, and one could not make him understand what faith was. However, these conversations failed not altogether so well to divert him that he liked the company of us women much above the men, for he could not drink, and he is but an ill companion in that country that cannot. So that obliging him to love us very well, we had all the liberty of speech with him, especially myself, whom he called his Great Mistress; and indeed my word would go a great way with him. For these reasons, I had opportunity to take notice to him that he was not well pleased of late as he used to be; was more retired and thoughtful; and told him I took it ill he should suspect we would break our words with him, and not permit both him and Clemene to return to his own kingdom, which was not so long a way but when he was once on his voyage he would quickly arrive there. He made me some answers that showed a doubt in him, which made me ask him what advantage it would be to doubt. It would but give us a fear of him, and possibly compel us to treat him so as I should be very loath to behold; that is, it might occasion his confinement. Perhaps this was not so luckily spoke of me, for I perceived he resented that word, which I strove to soften again in vain. However, he assured me that whatsoever resolutions he should take, he would act nothing upon the white people; and as for myself and those upon that plantation where he was, he would sooner forfeit his eternal liberty, and life itself, than lift his hand against his greatest enemy on that place. He besought me to suffer no fears upon his account, for he could do nothing that honor should not dictate; but he accused himself for having suffered slavery so long; yet he charged that weakness on Love alone, who was capable of making him neglect even glory itself, and for which now he reproaches himself every moment of the day. Much more to this effect he spoke, with an air impatient enough to make me know he would not be long in bondage; and though he suffered only the name of a slave, and had nothing of the toil and labor of one, yet that was sufficient to render him uneasy; and he had been too long idle, who used to be always in action and in arms. He had a spirit all rough and fierce, and that could not be tamed to lazy rest; and though all endeavors were used to exercise himself in such actions and sports as this world afforded, as running, wrestling, pitching the bar, hunting and fishing, chasing and killing tigers of a monstrous size, which this continent affords in abundance, and wonderful snakes, such as Alexander is reported to have encountered at the river of Amazons,<sup>6</sup> and which Caesar took great delight to overcome, yet these were not actions great enough for his large soul, which was still panting after more renowned action.

Before I parted that day with him, I got, with much ado, a promise from him to rest yet a little longer with patience, and wait the coming of the Lord Governor, who was every day expected on our shore; he assured me he would, and this promise he desired me to know was given perfectly in complaisance to me, in whom he had an entire confidence.

After this, I neither thought it convenient to trust him much out of our view, nor did the country, who feared him; but with one accord it was advised to treat him fairly, and oblige him to remain within such a compass, and that he should be permitted as seldom as could be to go up to the plantations of the Negroes or, if he did, to be accompanied by some that should be rather in appearance attendants than spies. This care was for some time taken, and

Caesar looked upon it as a mark of extraordinary respect, and was glad his discontent had obliged 'em to be more observant to him. He received new assurance from the overseer, which was confirmed to him by the opinion of all the gentlemen of the country, who made their court to him. During this time that we had his company more frequently than hitherto we had had, it may not be unpleasant to relate to you the diversions we entertained him with, or rather he us.

My stay was to be short in that country, because my father died at sea, and never arrived to possess the honor was designed him (which was lieutenant general of six and thirty islands, besides the continent<sup>7</sup> of Surinam) nor the advantages he hoped to reap by them; so that though we were obliged to continue on our voyage, we did not intend to stay upon the place. Though, in a word, I must say thus much of it, that certainly had his late Majesty, of sacred memory, but seen and known what a vast and charming world he had been master of in that continent, he would never have parted so easily with it to the Dutch. 'Tis a continent whose vast extent was never yet known, and may contain more noble earth than all the universe besides, for, they say, it reaches from east to west, one way as far as China and another to Peru. It affords all things both for beauty and use; 'tis there eternal spring, always the very months of April, May, and June; the shades are perpetual, the trees bearing at once all degrees of leaves and fruit, from blooming buds to ripe autumn: groves of oranges, lemons, citrons, figs, nutmegs, and noble aromatics, continually bearing their fragrances. The trees appearing all like nosegays adorned with flowers of different kinds; some are all white, some purple, some scarlet, some blue, some yellow; bearing, at the same time, ripe fruit and blooming young, or producing every day new. The very wood of all these trees has an intrinsic value above common timber, for they are, when cut, of different colors, glorious to behold, and bear a price considerable, to inlay withal. Besides this they yield rich balm and gums, so that we make our candles of such an aromatic substance as does not only give a sufficient light, but, as they burn, they cast their perfumes all about. Cedar is the common firing, and all the houses are built with it. The very meat we eat, when set on the table, if it be native, I mean of the country, perfumes the whole room; especially a little beast called an armadillo, a thing which I can liken to nothing so well as a rhinoceros; 'tis all in white armor, so jointed that it moves as well in it as if it had nothing on; this beast is about the bigness of a pig of six weeks old. But it were endless to give an account of all the diverse wonderful and strange things that country affords, and which we took a very great delight to go in search of, though those adventures are oftentimes fatal and at least dangerous. But while we had Caesar in our company on these designs we feared no harm, nor suffered any.

As soon as I came into the country, the best house in it was presented me, called St. John's Hill. It stood on a vast rock of white marble, at the foot of which the river ran a vast depth down, and not to be descended on that side; the little waves still dashing and washing the foot of this rock made the softest murmurs and purlings in the world; and the opposite bank was adorned with such vast quantities of different flowers eternally blowing,<sup>8</sup> and every day and hour new, fenced behind 'em with lofty trees of a thousand rare forms and colors, that the prospect was the most ravishing that fancy can create. On the edge of this white rock, towards the river, was a walk or grove of orange and lemon trees, about half the length of the Mall<sup>9</sup> here, whose flowery and fruit-bearing branches met at the top and hindered the sun, whose rays are very fierce there, from entering a beam into the grove; and the cool air that came from the river made it not only fit to entertain people in, at all the hottest hours of the day, but refreshed the sweet blossoms and made it always sweet and charming; and sure the whole globe of the world cannot show so delightful a place as this grove was. Not all the gardens of boasted Italy can produce a shade to outvie this, which nature had joined with art to render so exceeding fine; and 'tis a marvel to see how such vast trees, as big as English oaks, could take footing on so solid a rock and in so little earth as covered that rock; but all things by nature there are rare, delightful, and wonderful. But to our sports.

Sometimes we would go surprising,<sup>1</sup> and in search of young tigers in their dens, watching when the old ones went forth to forage for prey; and oftentimes we have been in great danger and have fled apace for our lives when surprised by the dams. But once, above all other times, we went on this design, and Caesar was with us, who had no sooner stolen a young tiger from her nest but, going off, we encountered the dam, bearing a buttock of a cow which he<sup>2</sup> had torn off with his mighty paw, and going with it towards his den. We had only four women, Caesar, and an English gentleman, brother to Harry Martin, the great Oliverian;<sup>3</sup> we found there was no escaping this enraged and ravenous beast. However, we women fled as fast as we could from it; but our heels had not saved our lives if Caesar had not laid down his cub, when he found the tiger quit her prey to make the more speed towards him, and taking Mr. Martin's sword, desired him to stand aside, or follow the ladies. He obeyed him, and Caesar met this monstrous beast of might, size, and vast limbs, who came with open jaws upon him; and fixing his awful stern eyes full upon those of the beast, and putting himself into a very steady and good aiming posture of defense, ran his sword quite through his breast down to his very heart, home to the hilt of the sword. The dying beast stretched forth her paw, and going to grasp his thigh, surprised with death in that very moment, did him no other harm than fixing her long nails in his flesh very deep, feebly wounded him, but could not grasp the flesh to tear off any. When he had done this, he halloed to us to return, which, after some assurance of his victory, we did, and found him lugging out the sword from the bosom of the tiger, who was laid in her blood on the ground; he took up the cub, and with an unconcern that had nothing of the joy or gladness of a victory, he came and laid the whelp at my feet. We all extremely wondered at his daring, and at the bigness of the beast, which was about the heighth of a heifer but of mighty, great, and strong limbs.

Another time, being in the woods, he killed a tiger which had long infested that part, and borne away abundance of sheep and oxen, and other things that were for the support of those to whom they belonged; abundance of people assailed this beast, some affirming they had shot her with several bullets quite through the body at several times, and some swearing they shot her through the very heart, and they believed she was a devil rather than a mortal thing. Caesar had often said he had a mind to encounter this monster, and spoke with several gentlemen who had attempted her, one crying, "I shot her with so many poisoned arrows," another with his gun in this part of her, and another in that; so that he, remarking all these places where she was shot, fancied still he should overcome her by giving her another sort of a wound than any had yet done; and one day said (at the table), "What trophies and garlands, ladies, will you make me, if I bring you home the heart of this ravenous beast that eats up all your lambs and pigs?" We all promised he should be rewarded at all our hands. So taking a bow, which he choosed out of a great many, he went up in the wood, with two gentlemen, where he imagined this devourer to be; they had not passed very far in it but they heard her voice, growling and grumbling, as if she were pleased with something she was doing. When they came in view, they found her muzzling in the belly of a new ravished sheep, which she had torn open; and seeing herself approached, she took fast hold of her prey with her forepaws and set a very fierce raging look on Caesar, without offering to approach him, for fear at the same time of losing what she had in possession. So that Caesar remained a good while, only taking aim, and getting an opportunity to shoot her where he designed; 'twas some time before he could accomplish it, and to wound her and not kill her would but have enraged her more, and endangered him. He had a quiver of arrows at his side, so that if one failed he could be supplied; at last, retiring a little, he gave her opportunity to eat, for he found she was ravenous, and fell to as soon as she saw him retire, being more eager of her prey than of doing new mischiefs. When he going softly to one side of her, and hiding his person behind certain herbage that grew high and thick, he took so good aim that, as he intended, he shot her just into the eye, and the arrow was sent with so good a will and so sure a hand that it stuck in her brain, and made her caper and become mad for a moment or two; but being seconded by another arrow, he fell dead upon the prey. Caesar cut him open with a knife, to see where those wounds were that had been reported to him, and why he did not die of 'em. But I shall now relate a thing that possibly will find no credit among men, because 'tis a notion commonly received with us, that nothing can receive a wound in the heart and live; but when the heart of this courageous animal was taken out, there were seven bullets of lead in it, and the wounds seamed up with great scars, and she lived with the bullets a great while, for it was long since they were shot. This heart the conqueror brought up to us, and 'twas a very great curiosity, which all the country came to see, and which gave Caesar occasion of many fine discourses, of accidents in war and strange escapes.

At other times he would go a-fishing; and discoursing on that diversion, he found we had in that country a very strange fish, called a numb eel<sup>4</sup> (an eel of which I have eaten), that while it is alive, it has a quality so cold, that those who are angling, though with a line of never so great a length with a rod at the end of it, it shall, in the same minute the bait is touched by this eel, seize him or her that holds the rod with benumbedness, that shall deprive 'em of sense for a while; and some have fallen into the water, and others dropped as dead on the banks of the rivers where they stood, as soon as this fish touches the bait. Caesar used to laugh at this, and believed it impossible a man could lose his force at the touch of a fish, and could not understand that philosophy,<sup>5</sup> that a cold quality should be of that nature. However, he had a great curiosity to try whether it would have the same effect on him it had on others, and often tried, but in vain. At last the sought for fish came to the bait, as he stood angling on the bank; and instead of throwing away the rod or giving it a sudden twitch out of the water, whereby he might have caught both the eel and have dismissed the rod, before it could have too much power over him, for experiment sake he grasped it but the harder, and fainting fell into the river; and being still possessed of the rod, the tide carried him, senseless as he was, a great way, till an Indian boat took him up, and perceived when they touched him a numbness seize them, and by that knew the rod was in his hand; which with a paddle (that is, a short oar) they struck away, and snatched it into the boat, eel and all. If Caesar were almost dead with the effect of this fish, he was more so with that of the water, where he had remained the space of going a league, and they found they had much ado to bring him back to life. But at last they did, and brought him home, where he was in a few hours well recovered and refreshed, and not a little ashamed to find he should be overcome by an eel, and that all the people who heard his defiance would laugh at him. But we cheered him up; and he being convinced, we had the eel at supper, which was a quarter of an ell about and most delicate meat, and was of the more value, since it cost so dear as almost the life of so gallant a man.

About this time we were in many mortal fears about some disputes the English had with the Indians, so that we could scarce trust ourselves, without great numbers, to go to any Indian towns or place where they abode, for fear they should fall upon us, as they did immediately after my coming away; and that it was in the possession of the Dutch, who used 'em not so civilly as the English, so that they cut in pieces all they could take, getting into houses and hanging up the mother and all her children about her, and cut a footman I left behind me all in joints, and nailed him to trees.

This feud began while I was there, so that I lost half the satisfaction I proposed, in not seeing and visiting the Indian towns. But one day, bemoaning of our misfortunes upon this account, Caesar told us we need not fear, for if we had a mind to go, he would undertake to be our guard. Some would, but most would not venture; about eighteen of us resolved and took barge, and after eight days arrived near an Indian town. But approaching it, the hearts of some of our company failed, and they would not venture on shore; so we polled who would and who would not. For my part, I said if Caesar would, I would go; he resolved; so did my brother and my woman, a maid of good courage. Now none of us speaking the language of the people, and imagining we should have a half diversion in gazing only and not knowing what they said, we took a fisherman that lived at the mouth of the river, who had been a long inhabitant there, and obliged him to go with us. But because he was known to the Indians, as trading among 'em, and being by long living there become a perfect Indian in color, we, who resolved to surprise 'em by making 'em see something they never had seen (that is, white people), resolved only myself, my brother and woman should go; so Caesar, the fisherman, and the rest, hiding behind some thick reeds and flowers that grew on the banks, let us pass on towards the town, which was on the bank of the river all along. A little distant from the houses, or huts, we saw some dancing, others busied in fetching and carrying of water from the river. They had no sooner spied us but they set up a loud cry, that frightened us at first; we thought it had been for those that should kill us, but it seems it was of wonder and amazement. They were all naked, and we were dressed so as is most comode for the hot countries, very glittering and rich, so that we appeared extremely fine; my own hair was cut short, and I had a taffety cap with black feathers on my head; my brother was in a stuff<sup>6</sup> suit, with silver loops and buttons and abundance of green ribbon. This was all infinitely surprising to them, and because we saw them stand still till we approached 'em, we took heart and advanced, came up to 'em, and offered 'em our hands; which they took, and looked on us round about, calling still for more company; who came swarming out, all wondering and crying out "Tepeeme," taking their hair up in their hands and spreading it wide to those they called out to, as if they would say (as indeed it signified) "Numberless wonders," or not to be recounted, no more than to number the hair of their heads. By degrees they grew more bold, and from gazing upon us round, they touched us, laying their hands upon all the features of our faces, feeling our breasts and arms, taking up one petticoat, then wondering to see another; admiring our shoes and stockings, but more our garters, which we gave 'em, and they tied about their legs, being laced with silver lace at the ends, for they much esteem any shining things. In fine, we suffered 'em to survey us as they pleased, and we thought they would never have done admiring us. When Caesar and the rest saw we were received with such wonder, they came up to us; and finding the Indian trader whom they knew (for 'tis by these fishermen, called Indian traders, we hold a commerce with 'em, for they love not to go far from home, and we never go to them), when they saw him therefore they set up a new joy, and cried, in their language, "Oh! here's our tiguamy, and we shall now know whether those things can speak." So advancing to him, some of 'em gave him their hands and cried, "Amora tiguamy," which is as much as, "How do you?" or "Welcome, friend," and all with one din began to gabble to him, and asked if we had sense and wit; if we could talk of affairs of life and war, as they could do; if we could hunt, swim, and do a thousand things they use. He answered 'em, we could. Then they invited us into their houses, and dressed venison and buffalo for us; and going out, gathered a leaf of a tree called a sarumbo leaf, of six yards long, and spread it on the ground for a tablecloth; and cutting another in pieces instead of plates, setting us on little bow Indian stools, which they cut out of one entire piece of wood and paint in a sort of japan work. They serve everyone their mess<sup>7</sup> on these pieces of leaves, and it was very good, but too high seasoned with pepper. When we had eat, my brother and I took out our flutes and played to 'em, which gave 'em new wonder; and I soon perceived, by an admiration that is natural to these people, and by the extreme ignorance and simplicity of 'em, it were not difficult to establish any unknown or extravagant religion among them, and to impose any notions or fictions upon 'em. For seeing a kinsman of mine set some paper afire with a burning glass, a trick they had never before seen, they were like to have adored him for a god, and begged he would give them the characters or figures of his name, that they might oppose it against winds and storms; which he did, and they held it up in those seasons, and fancied it had a charm to conquer them, and kept it like a holy relic. They are very superstitious, and called him the great Peeie, that is, prophet. They showed us their Indian Peeie, a youth of about sixteen years old, as handsome as nature could make a man. They consecrate a beautiful youth from his infancy, and all arts are used to complete him in the finest manner, both in beauty and shape. He is bred to all the little arts and cunning they are capable of, to all the legerdemain tricks and sleight of hand, whereby he imposes upon the rabble, and is both a doctor in physic<sup>8</sup> and divinity; and by these tricks makes the sick believe he sometimes eases their pains, by drawing from the afflicted part little serpents, or odd flies, or worms, or any strange thing; and though they have besides undoubted good remedies for almost all their diseases, they cure the patient more by fancy than by medicines, and make themselves feared, loved, and revered. This young Peeie had a very young wife, who seeing my brother kiss her, came running and kissed me; after this they kissed one another, and made it a very great jest, it being so novel; and new admiration and laughing went round the multitude, that they never will forget that ceremony, never before used or known. Caesar had a mind to see and talk with their war captains, and we were conducted to one of their houses, where we beheld several of the great captains, who had been at council. But so frightful a vision it was to see 'em no fancy can create; no such dreams can represent so dreadful a spectacle. For my part I took 'em for hobgoblins or fiends rather than men; but however their shapes appeared, their souls were very humane and noble; but some wanted their noses, some their lips, some both noses and lips, some their ears, and others cut through each cheek with long slashes, through which their teeth appeared; they had other several formidable wounds and scars, or rather dismemberings. They had comitias or little aprons before 'em, and girdles of cotton, with their knives naked, stuck in it; a bow at their backs and a quiver of arrows on their thighs; and most had feathers on their heads of diverse colors. They cried "Amora tiguamy" to us at our entrance, and were pleased we said as much to 'em; they seated us, and gave us drink of the best sort, and wondered, as much as the others had done before, to see us. Caesar was marveling as much at their faces, wondering how they should all be so wounded in war; he was impatient to know how they all came by those frightful marks of rage or malice, rather than wounds got in noble battle. They told us, by our interpreter, that when any war was waging, two men chosen out by some old captain whose fighting was past, and who could only teach the theory of war, these two men were to stand in competition for the generalship, or great war captain; and being brought before the old judges, now past labor, they are asked what they dare do to show they are worthy to lead an army. When he who is first asked, making no reply, cuts off his nose, and throws it contemptibly<sup>9</sup> on the ground; and the other does something to himself that he thinks surpasses him, and perhaps deprives himself of lips and an eye; so they slash on till one gives out, and many have died in this debate. And 'tis by a passive valor they show and prove their activity, a sort of courage too brutal to be applauded by our black hero; nevertheless he expressed his esteem of 'em.

In this voyage Caesar begot so good an understanding between the Indians and the English that there were no more fears or heart-burnings during our stay, but we had a perfect, open, and free trade with 'em. Many things remarkable and worthy reciting we met with in this short voyage, because Caesar made it his business to search out and provide for our entertainment, especially to please his dearly adored Imoinda, who was a sharer in all our adventures; we being resolved to make her chains as easy as we could, and to compliment the Prince in that manner that most obliged him.

As we were coming up again, we met with some Indians of strange aspects; that is, of a larger size and other sort of features than those of our country. Our Indian slaves that rowed us asked 'em some questions, but they could not understand us; but showed us a long cotton string with several knots on it, and told us, they had been coming from the mountains so many moons as there were knots. They were habited in skins of a strange beast, and brought along with 'em bags of gold dust, which, as well as they could give us to understand, came streaming in little small channels down the high mountains when the rains fell; and offered to be the convoy to any body or persons that would go to the mountains. We carried these men up to Parham, where they were kept till the Lord Governor came. And because all the country was mad to be going on this golden adventure, the Governor by his letters commanded (for they sent some of the gold to him) that a guard should be set at the mouth of the river of Amazons<sup>1</sup> (a river so called, almost as broad as the river of Thames) and prohibited all people from going up that river, it conducting to those mountains of gold. But we going off for England before the project was further prosecuted, and the Governor being drowned in a hurricane, either the design died, or the Dutch have the advantage of it. And 'tis to be bemoaned what his Majesty lost by losing that part of America.

Though this digression is a little from my story, however since it contains some proofs of the curiosity and daring of this great man, I was content to omit nothing of his character.

It was thus for some time we diverted him; but now Imoinda began to show she was with child, and did nothing but sigh and weep for the captivity of her lord, herself, and the infant yet unborn, and believed if it were so hard to gain the liberty of two, 'twould be more difficult to get that for three. Her griefs were so many darts in the great heart of Caesar; and taking his opportunity one Sunday when all the whites were overtaken in drink, as there were abundance of several trades and slaves for four years<sup>2</sup> that inhabited among the Negro houses, and Sunday was their day of debauch (otherwise they were a sort of spies upon Caesar), he went pretending out of goodness to 'em to feast amongst 'em; and sent all his music, and ordered a great treat for the whole gang, about three hundred Negroes; and about a hundred and fifty were able to bear arms, such as they had, which were sufficient to do execution<sup>3</sup> with spirits accordingly. For the English had none but rusty swords that no strength could draw from a scabbard, except the people of particular quality, who took care to oil 'em and keep 'em in good order. The guns also, unless here and there one, or those newly carried from England, would do no good or harm; for 'tis the nature of that country to rust and eat up iron, or any metals but gold and silver. And they are very unexpert at the bow, which the Negroes and Indians are perfect masters of.

Caesar, having singled out these men from the women and children, made an harangue to 'em of the miseries and ignominies of slavery, counting up all their toils and sufferings, under such loads, burdens, and drudgeries as were fitter for beasts than men, senseless brutes than human souls. He told 'em, it was not for days, months, or years, but for eternity; there was no end to be of their misfortunes. They suffered not like men, who might find a glory and fortitude in oppression, but like dogs that loved the whip and bell,<sup>4</sup> and fawned the more they were beaten. That they had lost the divine quality of men and were become insensible asses, fit only to bear; nay, worse: an ass, or dog, or horse, having done his duty, could lie down in retreat and rise to work again, and while he did his duty endured no stripes; but men, villainous, senseless men such as they, toiled on all the tedious week till Black Friday;<sup>5</sup> and then, whether they worked or not, whether they were faulty or meriting, they promiscuously, the innocent with the guilty, suffered the infamous whip, the sordid stripes, from their fellow slaves, till their blood trickled from all parts of their body, blood whose every drop ought to be revenged with a life of some of those tyrants that impose it. "And why," said he, "my dear friends and fellow sufferers, should we be slaves to an unknown people? Have they vanquished us nobly in fight? Have they won us in honorable battle? And are we by the chance of war become their slaves? This would not anger a noble heart, this would not animate a soldier's soul; no, but we are bought and sold like apes or monkeys, to be the sport of women, fools, and cowards, and the support of rogues, runagades,<sup>6</sup> that have abandoned their own countries for rapine, murders, thefts, and villainies. Do you not hear every day how they upbraid each other with infamy of life, below the wildest savages; and shall we render obedience to such a degenerate race, who have no one human virtue left to distinguish 'em from the vilest creatures? Will you, I say, suffer the lash from such hands?" They all replied, with one accord, "No, no, no; Caesar has spoke like a great captain, like a great king."

After this he would have proceeded, but was interrupted by a tall Negro of some more quality than the rest; his name was Tuscan; who bowing at the feet of Caesar, cried, "My lord, we have listened with joy and attention to what you have said, and, were we only men, would follow so great a leader through the world. But oh! consider, we are husbands and parents too, and have things more dear to us than life, our wives and children, unfit for travel in these unpassable woods, mountains, and bogs; we have not only difficult lands to overcome, but rivers to wade, and monsters to encounter, ravenous beasts of prey—.” To this, Caesar replied that honor was the first principle in nature that was to be obeyed; but as no man would pretend to that, without all the acts of virtue, compassion, charity, love, justice, and reason, he found it not inconsistent with that to take an equal care of their wives and children as they would of themselves; and that he did not design, when he led them to freedom and glorious liberty, that they should leave that better part of themselves to perish by the hand of the tyrant’s whip. But if there were a woman among them so degenerate from love and virtue to choose slavery before the pursuit of her husband, and with the hazard of her life to share with him in his fortunes, that such a one ought to be abandoned, and left as a prey to the common enemy.

To which they all agreed—and bowed. After this, he spoke of the impassable woods and rivers, and convinced ‘em, the more danger, the more glory. He told them that he had heard of one Hannibal, a great captain, had cut his way through mountains of solid rocks;<sup>2</sup> and should a few shrubs oppose them, which they could fire before ‘em? No, ‘twas a trifling excuse to men resolved to die or overcome. As for bogs, they are with a little labor filled and hardened; and the rivers could be no obstacle, since they swam by nature, at least by custom, from their first hour of their birth. That when the children were weary they must carry them by turns, and the woods and their own industry would afford them food. To this they all assented with joy.

Tuscan then demanded what he would do. He said, they would travel towards the sea, plant a new colony, and defend it by their valor; and when they could find a ship, either driven by stress of weather or guided by Providence that way, they would seize it and make it a prize, till it had transported them to their own countries; at least, they should be made free in his kingdom, and be esteemed as his fellow sufferers, and men that had the courage and the bravery to attempt, at least, for liberty; and if they died in the attempt it would be more brave than to live in perpetual slavery.

They bowed and kissed his feet at this resolution, and with one accord vowed to follow him to death. And that night was appointed to begin their march; they made it known to their wives, and directed them to tie their hamaca<sup>8</sup> about their shoulder and under their arm like a scarf, and to lead their children that could go, and carry those that could not. The wives, who pay an entire obedience to their husbands, obeyed, and stayed for 'em where they were appointed. The men stayed but to furnish themselves with what defensive arms they could get; and all met at the rendezvous, where Caesar made a new encouraging speech to 'em, and led 'em out.

But as they could not march far that night, on Monday early, when the overseers went to call 'em all together to go to work, they were extremely surprised to find not one upon the place, but all fled with what baggage they had. You may imagine this news was not only suddenly spread all over the plantation, but soon reached the neighboring ones; and we had by noon about six hundred men they call the militia of the county, that came to assist us in the pursuit of the fugitives. But never did one see so comical an army march forth to war. The men of any fashion would not concern themselves, though it were almost the common cause; for such revoltings are very ill examples, and have very fatal consequences oftentimes in many colonies. But they had a respect for Caesar, and all hands were against the Parhamites, as they called those of Parham plantation, because they did not, in the first place, love the Lord Governor, and secondly they would have it that Caesar was ill used, and baffled with;<sup>9</sup> and 'tis not impossible but some of the best in the country was of his counsel in this flight, and depriving us of all the slaves; so that they of the better sort would not meddle in the matter. The deputy governor,<sup>1</sup> of whom I have had no great occasion to speak, and who was the most fawning fair-tongued fellow in the world and one that pretended the most friendship to Caesar, was now the only violent man against him; and though he had nothing, and so need fear nothing, yet talked and looked bigger than any man. He was a fellow whose character is not fit to be mentioned with the worst of the slaves. This fellow would lead his army forth to meet Caesar, or rather to pursue him; most of their arms were of those sort of cruel whips they call cat with nine tails; some had rusty useless guns for show, others old basket hilts<sup>2</sup> whose blades had never seen the light in this age, and others had long staffs and clubs. Mr. Trefry went along, rather to be a mediator than a conqueror in such a battle; for he foresaw and knew, if by fighting they put the Negroes into despair, they were a sort of sullen fellows that would drown or kill themselves before they would yield; and he advised that fair means was best. But Byam was one that abounded in his own wit and would take his own measures.

It was not hard to find these fugitives; for as they fled they were forced to fire and cut the woods before 'em, so that night or day they pursued 'em by the light they made and by the path they had cleared. But as soon as Caesar found he was pursued, he put himself in a posture of defense, placing all the women and children in the rear, and himself with Tuscan by his side, or next to him, all promising to die or conquer. Encouraged thus, they never stood to parley, but fell on pell-mell upon the English, and killed some and wounded a good many, they having recourse to their whips as the best of their weapons. And as they observed no order, they perplexed the enemy so sorely with lashing 'em in the eyes; and the women and children seeing their husbands so treated, being of fearful cowardly dispositions, and hearing the English cry out, "Yield and live, yield and be pardoned," they all run in amongst their husbands and fathers, and hung about 'em, crying out, "Yield, yield; and leave Caesar to their revenge"; that by degrees the slaves abandoned Caesar, and left him only Tuscan and his heroic Imoinda; who, grown big as she was, did nevertheless press near her lord, having a bow and a quiver full of poisoned arrows, which she managed with such dexterity that she wounded several, and shot the governor<sup>3</sup> into the shoulder; of which wound he had like to have died, but that an Indian woman, his mistress, sucked the wound and cleansed it from the venom. But however, he stirred not from the place till he had parleyed with Caesar, who he found was resolved to die fighting, and would not be taken; no more would Tuscan, or Imoinda. But he, more thirsting after revenge of another sort than that of depriving him of life, now made use of all his art of talking and dissembling, and besought Caesar to yield himself upon terms which he himself should propose, and should be sacredly assented to and kept by him. He told him, it was not that he any longer feared him, or could believe the force of two men, and a young heroine, could overcome all them, with all the slaves now on their side also; but it was the vast esteem he had for his person, the desire he had to serve so gallant a man, and to hinder himself from the reproach hereafter of having been the occasion of the death of a prince whose valor and magnanimity deserved the empire of the world. He protested to him, he looked upon this action as gallant and brave, however tending to the prejudice of his lord and master, who would by it have lost so considerable a number of slaves; that this flight of his should be looked on as a heat of youth, and rashness of a too forward courage, and an unconsidered impatience of liberty, and no more; and that he labored in vain to accomplish that which they would effectually perform as soon as any ship arrived that would touch on his coast. "So that if you will be pleased," continued he, "to surrender yourself, all imaginable respect shall be paid you; and yourself, your wife, and child, if it be here born, shall depart free out of our land."

But Caesar would hear of no composition;<sup>4</sup> though Byam urged, if he pursued and went on in his design, he would inevitably perish, either by great snakes, wild beasts, or hunger; and he ought to have regard to his wife, whose condition required ease, and not the fatigues of tedious travel, where she could not be secured from being devoured. But Caesar told him, there was no faith in the white men or the gods they adored, who instructed 'em in principles so false that honest men could not live amongst 'em; though no people professed so much, none performed so little; that he knew what he had to do when he dealt with men of honor, but with them a man ought to be eternally on his guard, and never to eat and drink with Christians without his weapon of defense in his hand; and for his own security, never to credit one word they spoke. As for the rashness and inconsiderateness of his action, he would confess the governor is in the right; and that he was ashamed of what he had done, in endeavoring to make those free who were by nature slaves, poor wretched rogues, fit to be used as Christians' tools; dogs, treacherous and cowardly, fit for such masters; and they wanted only but to be whipped into the knowledge of the Christian gods to be the vilest of all creeping things, to learn to worship such deities as had not power to make 'em just, brave, or honest. In fine, after a thousand things of this nature, not fit here to be recited, he told Byam he had rather die than live upon the same earth with such dogs. But Trefry and Byam pleaded and protested together so much that Trefry, believing the governor to mean what he said, and speaking very cordially himself, generously put himself into Caesar's hands, and took him aside and persuaded him, even with tears, to live, by surrendering himself, and to name his conditions. Caesar was overcome by his wit and reasons, and in consideration of Imoinda; and demanding what he desired, and that it should be ratified by their hands in writing, because he had perceived that was the common way of contract between man and man, amongst the whites. All this was performed, and Tuscan's pardon was put in, and they surrender to the governor, who walked peaceably down into the plantation with 'em, after giving order to bury their dead. Caesar was very much toiled with the bustle of the day, for he had fought like a fury; and what mischief was done he and Tuscan performed alone, and gave their enemies a fatal proof that they durst do anything and feared no mortal force.

But they were no sooner arrived at the place where all the slaves receive their punishments of whipping, but they laid hands on Caesar and Tuscan, faint with heat and toil; and surprising them, bound them to two several stakes, and whipped them in a most deplorable and inhuman manner, rending the very flesh from their bones; especially Caesar, who was not perceived to make any moan or to alter his face, only to roll his eyes on the faithless governor, and those he believed guilty, with fierceness and indignation; and to complete his rage, he saw every one of those slaves, who but a few days before adored him as something more than mortal, now had a whip to give him some lashes, while he strove not to break his fetters; though if he had, it were impossible. But he pronounced a woe and revenge from his eyes, that darted fire that 'twas at once both awful and terrible to behold.

When they thought they were sufficiently revenged on him, they untied him, almost fainting with loss of blood from a thousand wounds all over his body, from which they had rent his clothes, and led him bleeding and naked as he was, and loaded him all over with irons; and then rubbed his wounds, to complete their cruelty, with Indian pepper, which had like to have made him raving mad; and in this condition made him so fast to the ground that he could not stir, if his pains and wounds would have given him leave. They spared Imoinda, and did not let her see this barbarity committed towards her lord, but carried her down to Parham and shut her up; which was not in kindness to her, but for fear she should die with the sight, or miscarry, and then they should lose a young slave and perhaps the mother.

You must know, that when the news was brought on Monday morning that Caesar had betaken himself to the woods and carried with him all the Negroes, we were possessed with extreme fear, which no persuasions could dissipate, that he would secure himself till night, and then that he would come down and cut all our throats. This apprehension made all the females of us fly down the river, to be secured; and while we were away they acted this cruelty. For I suppose I had authority and interest enough there, had I suspected any such thing, to have prevented it; but we had not gone many leagues but the news overtook us that Caesar was taken and whipped like a common slave. We met on the river with Colonel Martin, a man of great gallantry, wit, and goodness, and whom I have celebrated in a character of my new comedy<sup>5</sup> by his own name, in memory of so brave a man. He was wise and eloquent and, from the fineness of his parts, bore a great sway over the hearts of all the colony. He was a friend to Caesar, and resented this false dealing with him very much. We carried him back to Parham, thinking to have made an accommodation; when we came, the first news we heard was that the governor was dead of a wound Imoinda had given him; but it was not so well. But it seems he would have the pleasure of beholding the revenge he took on Caesar, and before the cruel ceremony was finished, he dropped down; and then they perceived the wound he had on his shoulder was by a venomed arrow, which, as I said, his Indian mistress healed by sucking the wound.

We were no sooner arrived but we went up to the plantation to see Caesar, whom we found in a very miserable and unexpressible condition; and I have a thousand times admired how he lived, in so much tormenting pain. We said all things to him that trouble, pity, and good nature could suggest, protesting our innocency of the fact and our abhorrence of such cruelties; making a thousand professions of services to him and begging as many pardons for the offenders, till we said so much that he believed we had no hand in his ill treatment; but told us he could never pardon Byam; as for Trefry, he confessed he saw his grief and sorrow for his suffering, which he could not hinder, but was like to have been beaten down by the very slaves for speaking in his defense. But for Byam, who was their leader, their head—and should, by his justice and honor, have been an example to 'em—for him, he wished to live, to take a dire revenge of him, and said, "It had been well for him if he had sacrificed me, instead of giving me the contemptible<sup>6</sup> whip." He refused to talk much, but begging us to give him our hands, he took 'em, and protested never to lift up his to do us any harm. He had a great respect for Colonel Martin, and always took his counsel like that of a parent, and assured him he would obey him in anything but his revenge on Byam. "Therefore," said he, "for his own safety, let him speedily dispatch me; for if I could dispatch myself I would not, till that justice were done to my injured person,<sup>7</sup> and the contempt of a soldier. No, I would not kill myself, even after a whipping, but will be content to live with that infamy, and be pointed at by every grinning slave, till I have completed my revenge; and then you shall see that Oroonoko scorns to live with the indignity that was put on Caesar." All we could do could get no more words from him; and we took care to have him put immediately into a healing bath to rid him of his pepper, and ordered a surgeon<sup>8</sup> to anoint him with healing balm, which he suffered; and in some time he began to be able to walk and eat. We failed not to visit him every day, and to that end had him brought to an apartment at Parham.

The governor was no sooner recovered, and had heard of the menaces of Caesar, but he called his council; who (not to disgrace them, or burlesque the government there) consisted of such notorious villains as Newgate<sup>9</sup> never transported; and possibly originally were such who understood neither the laws of God or man, and had no sort of principles to make 'em worthy the name of men; but at the very council table would contradict and fight with one another, and swear so bloodily that 'twas terrible to hear and see 'em. (Some of 'em were afterwards hanged when the Dutch took possession of the place, others sent off in chains.) But calling these special rulers of the nation together, and requiring their counsel in this weighty affair, they all concluded that (Damn 'em) it might be their own cases; and that Caesar ought to be made an example to all the Negroes, to fright 'em from daring to threaten their betters, their lords and masters; and at this rate no man was safe from his own slaves; and concluded, nemine contradicente,<sup>1</sup> that Caesar should be hanged.

Trefry then thought it time to use his authority, and told Byam his command did not extend to his lord's plantation, and that Parham was as much exempt from the law as Whitehall,<sup>2</sup> and that they ought no more to touch the servants of the Lord — (who there represented the King's person) than they could those about the King himself; and that Parham was a sanctuary; and though his lord were absent in person, his power was still in being there, which he had entrusted with him as far as the dominions of his particular plantations reached, and all that belonged to it; the rest of the country, as Byam was lieutenant to his lord, he might exercise his tyranny upon. Trefry had others as powerful, or more, that interested themselves in Caesar's life, and absolutely said he should be defended. So turning the governor and his wise council out of doors (for they sat at Parham House), they set a guard upon our landing place, and would admit none but those we called friends to us and Caesar.

The governor having remained wounded at Parham till his recovery was completed, Caesar did not know but he was still there; and indeed, for the most part his time was spent there, for he was one that loved to live at other people's expense; and if he were a day absent, he was ten present there, and used to play and walk and hunt and fish with Caesar. So that Caesar did not at all doubt, if he once recovered strength, but he should find an opportunity of being revenged on him. Though after such a revenge, he could not hope to live, for if he escaped the fury of the English mobile,<sup>3</sup> who perhaps would have been glad of the occasion to have killed him, he was resolved not to survive his whipping; yet he had, some tender hours, a repenting softness, which he called his fits of coward, wherein he struggled with Love for the victory of his heart, which took part with his charming Imoinda there; but for the most part his time was passed in melancholy thought and black designs. He considered, if he should do this deed and die, either in the attempt or after it, he left his lovely Imoinda a prey, or at best a slave, to the enraged multitude; his great heart could not endure that thought. "Perhaps," said he, "she may be first ravished by every brute, exposed first to their nasty lusts and then a shameful death." No; he could not live a moment under that apprehension, too insupportable to be borne. These were his thoughts and his silent arguments with his heart, as he told us afterwards; so that now resolving not only to kill Byam but all those he thought had enraged him, pleasing his great heart with the fancied slaughter he should make over the whole face of the plantation, he first resolved on a deed, that (however horrid it at first appeared to us all), when we had heard his reasons, we thought it brave and just. Being able to walk and, as he believed, fit for the execution of his great design, he begged Trefry to trust him into the air, believing a walk would do him good, which was granted him; and taking Imoinda with him, as he used to do in his more happy and calmer days, he led her up into a wood, where, after (with a thousand sighs, and long gazing silently on her face, while tears gushed, in spite of him, from his eyes) he told her his design first of killing her, and then his enemies, and next himself, and the impossibility of escaping, and therefore he told her the necessity of dying, he found the heroic wife faster pleading for death than he was to propose it, when she found his fixed resolution, and on her knees besought him not to leave her a prey to his enemies. He (grieved to death) yet pleased at her noble resolution, took her up, and embracing her with all the passion and languishment of a dying lover, drew his knife to kill this treasure of his soul, this pleasure of his eyes; while tears trickled down his cheeks, hers were smiling with joy she should die by so noble a hand, and be sent in her own country (for that's their notion of the next world) by him she so tenderly loved and so truly adored in this; for wives have a respect for their husbands equal to what any other people pay a deity, and when a man finds any occasion to quit his wife, if he love her, she dies by his hand; if not, he sells her, or suffers some other to kill her. It being thus, you may believe the deed was soon resolved on; and 'tis not to be doubted but the parting, the eternal leave-taking of two such lovers, so greatly born, so sensible,<sup>4</sup> so beautiful, so young, and so fond, must be very moving, as the relation of it was to me afterwards.

C. Grignion, after J. Barralet, Mr. Savigny in the Character of Oroonoko; engraving, 1785. Through the 18th century, the story of Oroonoko was known mostly from a 1696 play adapted from Behn's work by Thomas Southerne. His version makes Imoinda White, as this scene from a 1775 production shows. The actor plays Oroonoko in blackface and is here on the verge of killing Imoinda. From Oroonoko. A tragedy. Written by Thomas Southern, Marked with the variations in the manager's book, at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane (1785).

All that love could say in such cases being ended, and all the intermitting irresolutions being adjusted, the lovely, young, and adored victim lays herself down before the sacrificer; while he, with a hand resolved and a heart breaking within, gave the fatal stroke; first cutting her throat, and then severing her yet smiling face from that delicate body, pregnant as it was with fruits of tenderest love. As soon as he had done, he laid the body decently on leaves and flowers, of which he made a bed, and concealed it under the same coverlid of nature; only her face he left yet bare to look on. But when he found she was dead and past all retrieve, never more to bless him with her eyes and soft language, his grief swelled up to rage; he tore, he raved, he roared, like some monster of the wood, calling on the loved name of Imoinda. A thousand times he turned the fatal knife that did the deed toward his own heart, with a resolution to go immediately after her; but dire revenge, which now was a thousand times more fierce in his soul than before, prevents him; and he would cry out, "No; since I have sacrificed Imoinda to my revenge, shall I lose that glory which I have purchased so dear as at the price of the fairest, dearest, softest creature that ever nature made? No, no!" Then, at her name, grief would get the ascendant of rage, and he would lie down by her side and water her face with showers of tears, which never were wont to fall from those eyes. And however bent he was on his intended slaughter, he had not power to stir from the sight of this dear object, now more beloved and more adored than ever.

He remained in this deploring condition for two days, and never rose from the ground where he had made his sad sacrifice. At last, rousing from her side, and accusing himself with living too long now Imoinda was dead, and that the deaths of those barbarous enemies were deferred too long, he resolved now to finish the great work; but offering to rise, he found his strength so decayed that he reeled to and fro, like boughs assailed by contrary winds; so that he was forced to lie down again, and try to summon all his courage to his aid. He found his brains turned round, and his eyes were dizzy, and objects appeared not the same to him they were wont to do; his breath was short, and all his limbs surprised with a faintness he had never felt before. He had not eat in two days, which was one occasion of this feebleness, but excess of grief was the greatest; yet still he hoped he should recover vigor to act his design, and lay expecting it yet six days longer, still mourning over the dead idol of his heart, and striving every day to rise, but could not.

In all this time you may believe we were in no little affliction for Caesar and his wife; some were of opinion he was escaped never to return; others thought some accident had happened to him. But however, we failed not to send out an hundred people several ways to search for him; a party of about forty went that way he took, among whom was Tuscan, who was perfectly reconciled to Byam. They had not gone very far into the wood but they smelt an unusual smell, as of a dead body; for stinks must be very noisome that can be distinguished among such a quantity of natural sweets as every inch of that land produces. So that they concluded they should find him dead, or somebody that was so. They passed on towards it, as loathsome as it was, and made such a rustling among the leaves that lie thick on the ground, by continual falling, that Caesar heard he was approached; and though he had during the space of these eight days endeavored to rise, but found he wanted strength, yet looking up and seeing his pursuers, he rose and reeled to a neighboring tree, against which he fixed his back; and being within a dozen yards of those that advanced and saw him, he called out to them and bid them approach no nearer, if they would be safe. So that they stood still, and hardly believing their eyes, that would persuade them that it was Caesar that spoke to 'em, so much was he altered, they asked him what he had done with his wife, for they smelt a stink that almost struck them dead. He, pointing to the dead body, sighing, cried, "Behold her there." They put off the flowers that covered her with their sticks, and found she was killed, and cried out, "Oh, monster! that hast murdered thy wife." Then asking him why he did so cruel a deed, he replied, he had no leisure to answer impertinent questions. "You may go back," continued he, "and tell the faithless governor he may thank fortune that I am breathing my last, and that my arm is too feeble to obey my heart in what it had designed him." But his tongue faltering, and trembling, he could scarce end what he was saying. The English, taking advantage by his weakness, cried, "Let us take him alive by all means." He heard 'em; and as if he had revived from a fainting, or a dream, he cried out, "No, gentlemen, you are deceived; you will find no more Caesars to be whipped, no more find a faith in me. Feeble as you think me, I have strength yet left to secure me from a second indignity." They swore all anew, and he only shook his head and beheld them with scorn. Then they cried out, "Who will venture on this single man? Will nobody?" They stood all silent while Caesar replied, "Fatal will be the attempt to the first adventurer, let him assure himself," and at that word, held up his knife in a menacing posture. "Look ye, ye faithless crew," said he, "'tis not life I seek, nor am I afraid of dying," and at that word cut a piece of flesh from his own throat, and threw it at 'em; "yet still I would live if I could, till I had perfected my revenge. But oh! it cannot be; I feel life gliding from my eyes and heart, and if I make not haste, I shall yet fall a victim to the shameful whip." At that, he ripped up his own belly, and took his bowels and pulled 'em out, with what strength he could; while some, on their knees imploring, besought him to hold his hand. But when they saw him tottering, they cried out, "Will none venture on him?" A bold English cried, "Yes, if he were the devil" (taking courage when he saw him almost dead); and swearing a horrid oath for his farewell to the world, he rushed on him; Caesar, with his armed hand, met him so fairly as stuck him to the heart, and he fell dead at his feet. Tuscan, seeing that, cried out, "I love thee, O Caesar, and therefore will not let thee die, if possible." And running to him, took him in his arms; but at the same time warding a blow that Caesar made at his bosom, he received it quite through his arm; and Caesar having not the strength to pluck the knife forth, though he attempted it, Tuscan neither pulled it out himself nor suffered it to be pulled out, but came down with it sticking in his arm; and the reason he gave for it was, because the air should not get into the wound. They put their hands across, and carried Caesar between six of 'em, fainted as he was, and they thought dead, or just dying; and they brought him to Parham, and laid him on a couch, and had the chirurgion immediately to him, who dressed his wounds and sewed up his belly, and used means to bring him to life, which they effected. We ran all to see him, and if before we thought him so beautiful a sight, he was now so altered that his face was like a death's head blacked over, nothing but teeth and eyeholes. For some days we suffered nobody to speak to him, but caused cordials to be poured down his throat, which sustained his life; and in six or seven days he recovered his senses. For you must know that wounds are almost to a miracle cured in the Indies, unless wounds in the legs, which rarely ever cure.

When he was well enough to speak, we talked to him, and asked him some questions about his wife, and the reasons why he killed her; and he then told us what I have related of that resolution, and of his parting; and he besought us we would let him die, and was extremely afflicted to think it was possible he might live; he assured us if we did not dispatch him, he would prove very fatal to a great many. We said all we could to make him live, and gave him new assurances; but he begged we would not think so poorly of him, or of his love to Imoinda, to imagine we could flatter him to life again; but the chirurgion assured him he could not live, and therefore he need not fear. We were all (but Caesar) afflicted at this news; and the sight was gashly;<sup>5</sup> his discourse was sad, and the earthly smell about him so strong that I was persuaded to leave the place for some time (being myself but sickly, and very apt to fall into fits of dangerous illness upon any extraordinary melancholy). The servants and Trefry and the chirurgions promised all to take what possible care they could of the life of Caesar, and I, taking boat, went with other company to Colonel Martin's, about three days' journey down the river; but I was no sooner gone, but the governor taking Trefry about some pretended earnest business a day's journey up the river, having communicated his design to one Banister, a wild Irishman and one of the council, a fellow of absolute barbarity, and fit to execute any villainy, but was rich: he came up to Parham, and forcibly took Caesar, and had him carried to the same post where he was whipped; and causing him to be tied to it, and a great fire made before him, he told him he should die like a dog, as he was. Caesar replied, this was the first piece of bravery that ever Banister did, and he never spoke sense till he pronounced that word; and if he would keep it, he would declare, in the other world, that he was the only man of all the whites that ever he heard speak truth. And turning to the men that bound him, he said, "My friends, am I to die, or to be whipped?" And they cried, "Whipped! No, you shall not escape so well." And then he replied, smiling, "A blessing on thee," and assured them they need not tie him, for he would stand fixed like a rock, and endure death so as should encourage them to die. "But if you whip me," said he, "be sure you tie me fast."

He had learned to take tobacco; and when he was assured he should die, he desired they would give him a pipe in his mouth, ready lighted, which they did; and the executioner came, and first cut off his members,<sup>6</sup> and threw them into the fire; after that, with an ill-favored knife, they cut his ears, and his nose, and burned them; he still smoked on, as if nothing had touched him. Then they hacked off one of his arms, and still he bore up, and held his pipe; but at the cutting off the other arm, his head sunk, and his pipe dropped, and he gave up the ghost, without a groan or a reproach. My mother and sister were by him all the while, but not suffered to save him, so rude and wild were the rabble, and so inhuman were the justices, who stood by to see the execution, who after paid dearly enough for their insolence. They cut Caesar in quarters, and sent them to several of the chief plantations. One quarter was sent to Colonel Martin, who refused it, and swore he had rather see the quarters of Banister and the governor himself than those of Caesar on his plantations, and that he could govern his Negroes without terrifying and grieving them with frightful spectacles of a mangled king.

Thus died this great man, worthy of a better fate, and a more sublime wit than mine to write his praise; yet, I hope, the reputation of my pen is considerable enough to make his glorious name to survive to all ages, with that of the brave, the beautiful, and the constant Imoinda.

ANNE FINCH, COUNTESS OF WINCHILSEA 1661–1720

Born into an ancient country family, Anne Kingsmill became a maid of honor at the court of Charles II. There she met Colonel Heneage Finch; in 1684 they married. During the short reign of James II, they prospered at court. The king's fall in 1688, however, changed their fortunes: they were forced to leave court, and Heaneage was briefly arrested. For the rest of their lives, the Finches remained Nonjurors, refusing to swear allegiance to the new monarch, William III, and, instead, retaining Jacobite sympathies to the deposed James and his line. Eventually, they settled on a beautiful family estate at Eastwell, in Kent, near the south coast of England. At Eastwell, Finch wrote many of her poems, influenced, she said, by the "solitude and security of the country" and by "objects naturally inspiring soft and poetical imaginations." In their later years, the Finches returned to London, where Finch moved in influential literary circles, and in 1712 her husband became the Earl of Winchilsea. Their marriage was a happy one, and her husband supported her poetry.

Finch offers a fascinating example of a woman writer navigating issues surrounding gender, poetry, and print. Early in her career, she circulated her work among friends and their social networks in thoughtfully designed manuscript books. In the "Introduction" to those volumes, she roundly critiqued societal expectations for women, as she explained her reasons for not printing her poems. In later years, though, her thinking about print changed. She contributed individual poems to popular miscellany collections, and in 1713 she published a volume entirely of her own verse, Miscellany Poems on Several Occasions, Written by a Lady. In the printed volume's introductory poem, "Mercury and the Elephant," she framed her work very differently, cleverly brushing aside the criticisms that might meet her poetry. Finch was savvy about the possibilities and pitfalls of print, strategically choosing which poems to publish where (never publishing some political poems, for instance).

Finch's reputation today was shaped by William Wordsworth, who in the nineteenth century praised her carefully observed nature poetry, especially "Nocturnal Reverie." It was also shaped by Virginia Woolf, who in the early twentieth century emphasized the Finch of "The Introduction," the woman alone and indignant in her garden who can only "To some few friends, and to [her] sorrows sing." But both of these are very partial depictions: Finch was celebrated in her moment and wrote not only nature poetry but also fables, ballads, plays, and poems on politics, religion, and fashionable society. Principled, pious, witty, and brilliant, Finch is her own best example of what a poet can be.

The Introduction<sup>1</sup>

Did I, my lines intend for public view,
How many censures would their faults pursue,
Some would, because such words they do affect,
Cry they're insipid, empty, uncorrect.
5 And many have attained, dull and untaught,
The name of wit, only by finding fault.
True judges might condemn their want of wit,
And all might say, they're by a woman writ.
Alas! a woman that attempts the pen,
Such an intruder on the rights of men,
10 Such a presumptuous creature is esteemed,
The fault can by no virtue be redeemed.
They tell us, we mistake our sex and way;
Good breeding, fashion, dancing, dressing, play
Are the accomplishments we should desire;
15 To write, or read, or think, or to enquire,
Would cloud our beauty, and exhaust our time,
And interrupt the conquests of our prime;
Whilst the dull manage<sup>o</sup> of a servile house
Is held by some our outmost art, and use.
20       Sure 'twas not ever thus, nor are we told
Fables,<sup>o</sup> of women that excelled of old;
To whom, by the diffusive hand of heaven
Some share of wit, and poetry was given.
On that glad day, on which the Ark returned,
25 The holy pledge, for which the land had mourned,
The joyful tribes attend it on the way,
The Levites<sup>2</sup> do the sacred charge convey,
Whilst various instruments before it play;
30 Here holy virgins in the concert join,

The louder notes, to soften and refine,
And with alternate verse,<sup>3</sup> complete the hymn divine.

Lo! the young Poet, after God's own heart,<sup>4</sup>

By Him inspired, and taught the Muses art,
Returned from conquest, a bright chorus meets,
35 That sing his slain ten thousand in the streets.<sup>5</sup>
In such loud numbers<sup>6</sup> they his acts declare,
Proclaim the wonders of his early war,
That Saul upon the vast applause does frown,
And feels its mighty thunder shake the crown.
40 What can the threatened judgment now prolong?<sup>7</sup>
Half of the kingdom is already gone;
The fairest half, whose influence guides the rest,
Have David's empire o'er their hearts confessed.

A woman here, leads fainting Israel on,
45 She fights, she wins, she triumphs with a song,<sup>8</sup>
Devout, majestic, for the subject fit,
And far above her arms, exalts her wit,
Then, to the peaceful, shady palm withdraws,
And rules the rescued nation with her laws.

50 How are we fall'n, fall'n by mistaken rules,
And education's, more than nature's fools;
Debarred from all improvements of the mind,
And to be dull, expected and designed;<sup>9</sup>
And if some one would soar above the rest,
55 With warmer fancy, and ambition pressed,
So strong th' opposing faction still appears,
The hopes to thrive can ne'er outweigh the fears.
Be cautioned, then, my Muse, and still retired;
Nor be despised, aiming to be admired;
60 Conscious of wants,<sup>10</sup> still with contracted wing,
To some few friends, and to thy sorrows sing;
For groves of laurel,<sup>11</sup> thou wert never meant;

Be dark enough thy shades, and be thou there content.

Mercury and the Elephant: A Prefatory Fable<sup>1</sup>

As Merc'ry travelled through a wood,
(Whose errands are more fleet than good)<sup>2</sup>
An elephant before him lay,
That much encumbered had the way:
The messenger, who's still in haste,
5 Would fain<sup>o</sup> have bowed, and so have passed;
When up arose th' unwieldy brute,
And would repeat a late dispute,
In which (he said) he'd gained the prize
From a wild boar of monstrous size:
10 But Fame (quoth he) with all her tongues,
Who lawyers, ladies, soldiers wrongs,
Has, to my disadvantage, told
An action throughly<sup>o</sup> bright and bold;
Has said, that I foul play had used,
15 And with my weight th' opposer bruised;
Had laid my trunk about his brawn,
Before his tushes<sup>o</sup> could be drawn;
Had stunned him with a hideous roar,
And twenty-thousand scandals more:
20 But I defy the talk of men,
Or voice of brutes in ev'ry den;
Th' impartial skies are all my care,
And how it stands recorded there.
Amongst you Gods, pray, what is thought?
25 Quoth Mercury—Then have you fought!
Solicitous<sup>o</sup> thus should I be
For what's said of my verse and me;
Or should my friends excuses frame,

30 And beg the criticks not to blame
 (Since from a female hand it came)
 Defects in judgment, or in wit;
 They'd but reply—Then has she writ!<sup>3</sup> }
 Our vanity we more betray,
 In asking what the world will say,
 35 Than if, in trivial things like these,
 We wait on the event<sup>o</sup> with ease;
 Nor make long prefaces, to show
 What men are not concerned to know:
 For still untouched how we succeed,
 40 'Tis for themselves, not us, they read;
 Whilst that proceeding to requite,<sup>o</sup>
 We own (who in the Muse delight)
 'Tis for ourselves, not them, we write. }
 Betrayed by solitude to try
 45 Amusements, which the prosp'rous fly;<sup>o</sup>
 And only to the press repair,
 To fix our scattered papers there;
 Tho' whilst our labors are preserved,
 The printers may, indeed, be starved.

Endnotes

1713

- Note 1: This prefatory poem to Finch's 1713 printed collection exhibits a strikingly different attitude toward print, women's authorship, and reputation than the "Introduction." The fable was one of Finch's most popular modes. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The Roman god Mercury was messenger and trickster, associated with swift ("fleet") movement. His name was used in many newspaper titles, and thus fitting for this meditation on print and reputation. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The elephant in the fable is an example of what not to do. Overly concerned about his reputation, he spreads the very rumor that he hopes the gods have not heard. Applying the moral to her own authorship, Finch embraces the fact that she might matter as little to the critics as the elephant to Mercury, but she also refuses to offer conventional apologies for “defects in judgment, or in wit” that prefaced many texts.Return to reference 3

From The Spleen<sup>1</sup>

What art thou, Spleen, which ev'ry thing dost ape<sup>o</sup>?
Thou Proteus<sup>2</sup> to abused mankind,
Who never yet thy real cause could find,
Or fix thee to remain in one continued shape.
Still varying thy perplexing form,
5 Now a dead sea thou'lt<sup>o</sup> represent,
A calm of stupid discontent,
Then, dashing on the rocks wilt rage into a storm.
Trembling sometimes thou dost appear,
Dissolved into a panic fear;
10 On sleep intruding dost thy shadows spread,
Thy gloomy terrors round the silent bed,
And crowd with boading<sup>o</sup> dreams the melancholy head: }
Or, when the midnight hour is told,
And drooping lids thou still dost waking hold,
15 Thy fond delusions cheat the eyes,
Before them antic<sup>o</sup> specters dance,
Unusual fires their pointed heads advance,
And airy phantoms rise.
Such was the monstrous vision seen,
20 When Brutus (now beneath his cares oppressed,
And all Rome's fortunes rolling in his breast,
Before Philippi's latest field,
Before his fate did to Octavius lead)
25 Was vanquished by the Spleen.<sup>3</sup>

Falsely, the mortal part we blame
Of our depressed, and pond'rous frame,<sup>o</sup>
Which, till the first degrading sin

Let Thee, its dull attendant, in,<sup>4</sup>
Still with the other did comply,
30 Nor clogged the active soul, disposed to fly,
And range the mansions of its native sky. }
Nor, whilst in his own heaven he dwelt,
Whilst man his paradise possessed,
His fertile garden in the fragrant East,<sup>o</sup>
35 And all united odors smelt,
No arméd sweets, until thy reign,
Could shock the sense, or in the face
A flushed, unhandsome color place.
Now the jonquil<sup>o</sup> o'ercomes the feeble brain;
40 We faint beneath the aromatic pain,
Till some offensive scent thy pow'rs appease,
And pleasure we resign for short, and nauseous
ease.

In ev'ry one thou dost possess,
New are thy motions, and thy dress:
45 Now in some grove a list'ning friend
Thy false suggestions must attend,
Thy whispered griefs, thy fancied sorrows hear,
Breathed in a sigh, and witnessed by a tear;
Whilst in the light, and vulgar crowd,
50 Thy slaves, more clamorous and loud,
By laughters unprovoked, thy influence too confess.
In the imperious wife thou vapors art,
Which from o'erheated passions rise
In clouds to the attractive<sup>o</sup> brain,
55 Until descending thence again,
Thro' the o'er-cast, and show'ring eyes,
Upon her husband's softened heart,
He the disputed point must yield,
Something resign of the contested field;
60 Till lordly man, born to imperial sway,

Compounds for peace, to make that right away,<sup>5</sup>
And woman, armed with Spleen, does servilely obey.

65       The fool, to imitate the wits,
          Complains of thy pretended fits,
          And dullness, born with him, would lay<sup>o</sup>
          Upon thy accidental sway;<sup>6</sup>
          Because, sometimes, thou dost presume
          Into the ablest heads to come:
70       That, often, men of thoughts refined,
          Impatient of unequal sense,
          Such slow returns, where they so much dispense,
          Retiring from the crowd, are to thy shades inclined.
          O'er me alas! thou dost too much prevail:
75       I feel thy force, whilst I against thee rail;
          I feel my verse decay, and my cramped numbers fail.

          Thro' thy black jaundice<sup>7</sup> I all objects see,
          As dark, and terrible as thee,
          My lines decried,<sup>o</sup> and my employment thought
          An useless folly, or presumptuous fault:
80       Whilst in the Muses' paths I stray,
          Whilst in their groves, and by their secret springs
          My hand delights to trace unusual things,
          And deviates from the known, and common way;<sup>8</sup>
          Nor will in fading silks compose
85       Faintly th' inimitable Rose,
          Fill up an ill-drawn bird, or paint on glass
          The sov'reign's blurred and undistinguished
          face,
          The threatening Angel, and the speaking
          Ass.<sup>9</sup>

1713

- Note 1: "The Spleen" was Finch's most famous poem in her lifetime. Disorders of the spleen, often called "vapors" or just "the spleen" (after what was understood as their bodily cause), were common and associated with a wide range of what we today think of as psychological symptoms: depression, melancholy, sluggishness, mood swings, delusions, or anger. Finch's poem about the relationship between body and mind bears comparison with the "Cave of Spleen" in Pope's The Rape of the Lock (see p. 538).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A mythological god capable of changing shapes.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar (4.3.278), a "monstrous apparition," the ghost of Julius Caesar, appears to Brutus (Marcus Junius Brutus, ca. 85–42 B.C.E.) and says he will see Brutus at the upcoming Battle of Philippi (42 B.C.E.) between forces of Brutus and Cassius on one side, and those of Octavian ("Octavius," 63 B.C.E.–14 C.E., later Emperor Caesar Augustus) and Marc Antony on the other. After losing the battle, Brutus commits suicide.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, the original sin that caused humans to be cast out of Eden also "let in" bodily pain and diseases like the spleen.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Man surrenders, and legally signs away his "imperial" rights. "Compounds": settles by concession.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The spleen was a fashionable complaint, sometimes feigned.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A particular problem involving the spleen; Finch is interested in how it could impact vision.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: While Finch earlier described the spleen hindering her writing, here it seems enabling.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: Finch distinguishes her writing from more traditional feminine crafts of embroidery and glass painting. She also distinguishes its themes: she's not copying the picture of a bird, a rose, the king, or a scene from a Bible story. "Threatning Angel, the speaking ass": reference to Numbers 22:21–35. After this, the poem continues for some sixty more lines. Return to reference 9

Upon the Hurricane<sup>1</sup>

You have obeyed, you winds, that must fulfill
The Great Disposer's<sup>o</sup> righteous will;
Throughout the land, unlimited you flew,
Nor sought, as heretofore, with friendly aid
Only, new motion to bestow
5 Upon the sluggish vapors, bred below,
Condensing into mists, and melancholy shade.
No more such gentle methods you pursue,
But marching now in terrible array,
Undistinguished was your prey:
10 In vain the shrubs, with lowly bent,
Sought their destruction to prevent;
The beech in vain, with out-stretched arms,
Deprecates<sup>o</sup> th' approaching harms;
In vain the oak (so often stormed)
15 Relied upon that native force,
By which already was performed
So much of his appointed course,
As made him, fearless of decay,
Wait but the accomplished time
20 Of his long-wished and useful prime,
To be removed, with honor, to the sea.<sup>2</sup>
The straight and ornamental pine
Did in the like ambition join,
And thought his fame should ever last,
25 When in some royal ship he stood the planted mast;
And should again his length of timber rear,
And new engrafted branches wear
Of fibrous cordage and impending shrouds,<sup>3</sup>

Still trimmed with human care, and watered by the clouds.

But oh, you trees! who solitary stood;
Or you, whose numbers formed a wood;
You, who on mountains chose to rise,
And drew them nearer to the skies;
Or you, whom valleys late did hold
35 In flexible and lighter mold;
You num'rous brethren of the leafy kind,
To whatsoever use designed,
Now, vain you found it to contend
With not, alas! one element your friend;
40 Your Mother Earth, thro' long preceding rains,
(Which undermining sink below)
No more her wonted strength retains;
Nor you so fixed within her bosom grow,
That for your sakes she can resolve to bear
45 These furious shocks of hurrying air;
But finding all your ruin did conspire,
She soon her beauteous progeny resigned
To this destructive, this imperious wind,
That checked your nobler aims, and gives you to the 50 fire.

Thus! have thy cedars, Libanus, been struck
As the lithe osiers twisted round;
Thus! Cadez, has thy wilderness been shook,
When the appalling, and tremendous sound
55 Of rattling tempests o'er you broke,
And made your stubborn glories bow,
When in such whirlwinds the Almighty spoke,
Warning Judea then, as our Britannia now.
Yet these were the remoter harms,
Foreign the care, and distant the alarms:
60 Whilst but sheltring trees alone,
Mastered soon, and soon o'erthrown,

Felt those gusts, which since prevail,
And loftier palaces assail;
Whose shaken turrets now give way,
65 With vain inscriptions, which the frieze has borne<sup>5</sup>
Through ages past, t'extol<sup>o</sup> and to adorn,
And to our latter times convey;
Who did the structures' deep foundation lay,
Forcing his praise upon the gazing crowd,
70 And, whilst he molders in a scanty shroud,
Telling both earth and skies, he when alive was proud.
Now down at once comes the superfluous load,
The costly fret-work<sup>o</sup> with it yields,
Whose imitated fruits and flow'rs are strewed,
75 Like those of real growth o'er the autumnal fields.
The present owner lifts his eyes,
And the swift change with sad affrightment
spies:
The ceiling gone, that late<sup>o</sup> the roof concealed;
The roof untiled, thro' which the heav'ns
80 revealed,
Exposes now his head, when all defense has failed.

What, alas, is to be done!
Those, who in cities would from dangers run,
Do but increasing dangers meet,
And Death, in various shapes, attending in the 85 street;
Where some, too tardy in their flight,
O'ertaken by a worse mischance,
Their upward parts do scarce advance,
When on their following limbs th' extending ruins light.<sup>o</sup>
90 One half's interred, the other yet survives,
And for release with fainting vigor strives;

95                    Implores the aid of absent friends in vain;
                      With fault'ring speech, and dying wishes calls
                      Those, whom perhaps, their own domestic walls
By parallel distress, or swifter death retains.

                      O Wells! thy Bishop's mansion we lament,<sup>6</sup>
                      So tragical the fall, so dire th' event!
                      But let no daring thought presume
                      To point a cause for that oppressive doom.
100                    Yet strictly pious Ken!<sup>7</sup> had'st thou been there,
This fate, we think, had not become thy share;
                      Nor had that awful fabric<sup>o</sup> bowed,
                      Sliding from its loosened bands;
                      Nor yielding timbers been allowed
                      To crush thy ever-lifted hands,
105                    Or interrupt thy pray'r.
                      Those orisons,<sup>o</sup> that nightly watches keep,
Had called thee from thy bed, or there secured thy sleep.

                      Whilst you, bold winds and storms! his Word
obeyed,
110                    Whilst you his scourge the Great Jehova made,
And into ruined heaps our edifices laid.
                      You South and West<sup>8</sup> the tragedy began,
As, with disordered haste, you o'er the surface ran;
                      Forgetting, that you were designed
                      (Chiefly thou Zephyrus,<sup>o</sup> thou softest wind!)

115                    Only our heats, when sultry, to allay,
And chase the od'rous gums by your dispersing play.
                      Now, by new orders and decrees,
                      For our chastisement<sup>o</sup> issued forth,
120                    You on his confines the alarmed North<sup>9</sup>
                      With equal fury sees,
                      And summons swiftly to his aid

Eurus,<sup>o</sup> his confederate made,
His eager second in th' opposing fight,
That even the winds may keep the balance
125 right,
Nor yield increase of sway to arbitrary might.
Meeting now, they all contend,
Those assail, while these defend;
Fierce and turbulent the war,
And in the loud tumultuous jar
130 Winds their own fifes, and clarions<sup>1</sup> are.
Each cavity, which art or nature leaves,
Their inspiration<sup>2</sup> hastily receives;
Whence, from their various forms and size,
As various symphonies arise,
135 Their trumpet ev'ry hollow tube is made,
And, when more solid bodies they invade,
Enraged, they can no farther come,
The beaten flat,<sup>o</sup> whilst it repels the noise,
Resembles but with more outrageous voice
140 The soldier's threatening drum:
And when they compass thus our world around,
When they our rocks and mountains rend,<sup>o</sup>
When they our sacred piles to their foundations send,
No wonder if our echoing caves rebound;
145 No wonder if our listening sense they wound,
When armed with so much force, and ushered with such sound.

Nor scarce, amidst the terrors of that night,
When you, fierce winds, such desolations
wrought,
When you from out his stores the Great Commander 150 brought,
Could the most righteous stand upright;

Scarcely the holiest man performs
The service, that becomes it best,
By ardent vows, or solemn pray'rs addressed;
Nor finds the calm, so usual to his breast,
155 Full proof<sup>o</sup> against such storms.
How should the guilty then be found,
The men in wine, or looser pleasures drowned,
To fix a steadfast hope, or to maintain their ground!
When at his glass the late companion feels,
160 That giddy, like himself, the tott'ring mansion reels!
The miser, who with many a chest
His gloomy tenement oppressed,
Now fears the overburthened floor,
And trembles for his life, but for his treasure more.
165 What shall he do, or to what pow'rs apply?
To those, which threaten from on high,
By him ne'er called upon before,
Who also will suggest th' impossible restore?
No; Mammon,<sup>3</sup> to thy laws he will be true,
170 And, rather than his wealth, will bid the world adieu.
The rafters sink, and buried with his coin
That fate does with his living thoughts combine;
For still his heart's enclosed within a golden mine.

Contention with its angry brawls
175 By storms o'er-clamored, shrinks and falls;
Nor Whig, nor Tory now the rash contender calls.
Those, who but vanity allowed,
Nor thought it reached the name of sin,
To be of their perfections proud,
180 Too much adorned without, or too much raised within,
Now find, that even the lightest things,
As the minuter parts of air,
When number to their weight addition brings,

185           Can, like the small, but numerous insects' stings,
Can, like th' assembled winds, urge ruin and despair.

          Thus you've obeyed, you winds, that must fulfill
              The Great Disposer's righteous will:
          Thus did your breath a strict inquiry make,
          Thus did you our most secret sins awake,
190           And thus chastised their ill.◊

              Whilst vainly those, of a rapacious◊ mind,
              Fields to other fields had laid,
              By force, or by injurious bargains joined,
195           With fences for their guard impenetrable made;
              The juster tempest mocks the wrong,
              And sweeps, in its directed flight,
              Th' enclosures of another's right,<sup>4</sup>
          Driving at once the bounds, and licensed◊ herds along.

200           The Earth again one general scene appears;
              No regular distinction now,
              Betwixt the grounds for pasture, or the plough,
              The face of Nature wears.

205           Free as the men, who wild confusion love,
              And lawless liberty approve,
              Their fellow-brutes pursue their way,
              To their own loss, and disadvantage
              stray, }
As wretched in their choice, as unadvised as } they.

210           The tim'rous deer, whilst he forsakes the park,
              And wanders on, in the misguiding dark,
              Believes, a foe from ev'ry unknown bush
              Will on his trembling body rush,
              Taking the winds, that vary in their notes,

For hot pursuing hounds with deeply bellowing throats.
 215 Th' awaked birds, shook from their nightly seats,
     Their unavailing pinions<sup>o</sup> ply,
     Repulsed, as they attempt to fly
 In hopes they might attain to more secure retreats.
     But, where ye wildered<sup>o</sup> fowls would you repair?
     When this your happy portion given,
 220 Your upward lot, your firmament of heaven,
     Your unentailed, your undivided air,<sup>5</sup>
     Where no proprietor was ever known,
     Where no litigious suits have ever grown,
 225 Whilst none from star to star could call the space his own;
     When this no more your middle flights can bear,
     But some rough blast too far above conveys,
 Or to unquitted Earth confines your weak essays.<sup>o</sup>
     Nor you, nor wiser man could find repose,
     Nor could our industry produce
 230 Expedients of the smallest use,
     To ward our greater cares, or mitigate<sup>o</sup> your woes.
     Ye clouds! that pitied our distress,<sup>6</sup>
     And by your pacifying showers
     (The soft and usual methods of success)
 235 Kindly assayed<sup>o</sup> to make this tempest less;
     Vainly your aid was now alas! employed,
 In vain you wept o'er those destructive hours,
     In which the winds full tyranny enjoyed,
     Nor would allow you to prevail,
 240 But drove your scorned, and scattered tears to wail
     The land that lay destroyed.
     Whilst you obeyed, you winds! that must fulfill
     The just Disposer's righteous will;
 245 Whilst not the Earth alone, you disarray,

But to more ruined seas winged your impetuous way.

Which to foreshew, the still portentuous Sun<sup>7</sup>
Beamless, and pale of late, his race begun,<sup>8</sup>
Quenching the rays, he had no joy to keep,
In the obscure, and sadly threatened deep.
250 Farther than we, that Eye of Heaven discerns,
And nearer placed to our malignant stars,<sup>9</sup>
Our brooding tempests, and approaching wars
Anticipating learns.

When now, too soon the dark event
255 Shows what that faded planet meant;
Whilst more the liquid empire<sup>o</sup> undergoes,
More she resigns of her entrusted stores,
The wealth, the strength, the pride of diff'rent shores

In one devoted,<sup>o</sup> one recorded night, 260 Than years had known destroyed by generous fight,

Or privateering foes.<sup>1</sup>
All rules of conduct laid aside,
No more the baffled pilot steers,
Or knows an art, when it each moment veers,
265 To vary with the winds, or stem th' unusual tide.
Dispersed and loose, the shattered vessels stray,
Some perish within sight of shore,
Some, happier thought, obtain a wider sea,
But never to return, or cast an anchor more!
270 Some on the Northern coasts are thrown,
And by congealing<sup>o</sup> surges compassed round,
To fixed and certain ruin bound,
Immoveable are grown:

The fatal Goodwin<sup>2</sup> swallows all that come 275 Within the limits of that dangerous sand,
Amphibious in its kind, nor sea nor land;

Yet kin to both, a false and faithless strand,
 Known only to our cost for a devouring tomb.
 Nor seemed the hurricane content,
 280      Whilst only ships were wrecked, and tackle rent;
     —      The sailors too must fall a prey,
             Those that command, with those that did obey;
             The best supporters of thy pompous style,<sup>3</sup>
             Thou far renowned, thou powerful British Isle!
 285      Foremost in naval strength, and sov'reign of the sea!
             These from thy aid that wrathful night divides,
             Plunged in those waves, o'er which this title rides.

             What art thou, envied Greatness, at the best,
             In thy deluding splendors dressed?
 290      What are thy glorious titles, and thy forms?
             Which cannot give security, or rest
             To favored men, or kingdoms that contest
             With popular assaults, or providential storms!
             Whilst on th' Omnipotent our fate depends,
 295      And they are only safe, whom He alone defends.
             Then let to Heaven our general praise be sent,
             Which did our farther loss, our total wreck prevent.
             And as our aspirations do ascend,
             Let every thing be summoned to attend;
 300      And let the poet after God's own heart<sup>4</sup>
             Direct our skill in that sublimer part,
             And our weak numbers○ mend!

- Note 1: The poem's full title is "A Pindaric Poem Upon the Hurricane in November 1703, referring to this Text in Psalm 148. ver. 8. Winds and Storms fulfilling his Word." In November 1703, a terrible storm caused destruction in the south of England: Daniel Defoe estimated over 8,000 deaths and stopped counting fallen trees in Kent after 17,000. Finch's poem tries to understand how this catastrophic event fits into a divine plan, pointedly not offering a simple political moral as many contemporaries did.Return to reference 1

A Nocturnal Reverie

In such a night,<sup>1</sup> when every louder wind
Is to its distant cavern safe confined;
And only gentle Zephyr fans his wings,
And lonely Philomel,<sup>o</sup> still waking, sings;
Or from some tree, famed for the owl's delight,
5 She, hollowing clear, directs the wanderer right:
In such a night, when passing clouds give place,
Or thinly veil the heavens' mysterious face;
When in some river, overhung with green,
The waving moon and trembling leaves are seen;
10 When freshened grass now bears itself upright,
And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite,
Whence springs the woodbind, and the bramble-
rose,
And where the sleepy cowslip sheltered grows;
Whilst now a paler hue the foxglove takes,
15 Yet checkers still with red the dusky brakes:<sup>o</sup>
When scattered glow-worms, but in twilight fine,
Show trivial beauties watch their hour to shine;
Whilst Salisbury<sup>2</sup> stands the test of every light,
In perfect charms, and perfect virtue bright:
20 When odors, which declined repelling day,
Through temperate air uninterrupted stray;
When darkened groves their softest shadows wear,
And falling waters we distinctly hear;
When through the gloom more venerable shows
25 Some ancient fabric,<sup>o</sup> awful in repose,
While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conceal,
And swelling haycocks thicken up the vale:
When the loosed horse now, as his pasture leads,
Comes slowly grazing through the adjoining meads,

30 Whose stealing pace, and lengthened shade we fear,
 Till torn-up forage in his teeth we hear:
 When nibbling sheep at large pursue their food,
 And unmolested kine rechew the cud;
 35 When curlews cry beneath the village walls,
 And to her straggling brood the partridge calls;
 Their shortlived jubilee the creatures keep,
 Which but endures, whilst tyrant man does sleep;
 When a sedate content the spirit feels,
 And no fierce light disturbs, whilst it reveals;
 40 But silent musings urge the mind to seek Something, too high for syllables to speak;
 Till the free soul to a composedness charmed,
 Finding the elements of rage disarmed,
 O'er all below a solemn quiet grown,
 45 Joys in the inferior world,<sup>3</sup> and thinks it like her own:
 In such a night let me abroad remain,
 Till morning breaks, and all's confused again;
 Our cares, our toils, our clamors are renewed,
 Or pleasures, seldom reached, again pursued.

MARY ASTELL

1666–1731

The term feminism would not enter the language until some 150 years after her death, but Mary Astell's powerful advocacy for women's education and rights in marriage has led scholars to see her as a founder of the modern women's movement. Daughter of a Newcastle merchant, Astell was encouraged and educated by her uncle, a clergyman. She never forgot what he taught her: a confidence in her own reason and a religious faith entirely compatible with reason. In her twenties she moved to Chelsea, on the outskirts of London, where she spent the rest of her life. There she championed the causes of women and the Church of England, and her vigorous way of arguing (not only in print but in person) won her many admirers, among both men and women. Her political and religious polemics also put her at odds with many important writers, including John Locke and Daniel Defoe. One of her best-known works, A Serious Proposal to the Ladies (1694), was, like the rest of her writings, published anonymously ("by a Lover of her Sex"). It advocates the founding of a monastic school or retreat for women, where a rigorous, wide-ranging education could be combined with moral and religious discipline. Though the idea was never carried out, it had a broad influence on later plans for educating women, as well as on literature.

To question the customs and laws of marriage is to question society itself, its distribution of money and power and love. During the eighteenth century many of the terms of marriage were renegotiated. The older view of the wife as a chattel, bound by contract to a husband whom others had chosen for her and whom she was sworn to obey, was hotly debated and challenged. The witty arguments of Congreve's The Way of the World (1700) reflect this growing debate between the sexes. Another work published in the same year, Some Reflections upon Marriage, takes a more independent position. Marriage, according to Astell, is all too often a trap. She insists that a woman should be guided by reason, not only in choosing a mate but in choosing whether or not to marry at all (Astell herself never married). So long as the institution of marriage perpetuates inequality rather than a true partnership of minds, women had better beware of flattery and look to themselves or to God, not to men, for the hope of a better life. She added "A Preface, in Answer to Some Objections" to the Reflections in 1706; in this preface she directly challenges the thinking of Locke, making a famous retort to his Second Treatise of Government: "If all men are born free, how is it that all women are born slaves?" Astell's critique understands that politics extends to the domestic sphere, a contention that would inspire generations of feminist writers.

From Some Reflections upon Marriage<sup>1</sup>

If marriage be such a blessed state, how comes it, may you say, that there are so few happy marriages? Now in answer to this, it is not to be wondered that so few succeed; we should rather be surprised to find so many do, considering how imprudently men engage, the motives they act by, and the very strange conduct they observe throughout.

For pray, what do men propose to themselves in marriage? What qualifications do they look after in a spouse? What will she bring? is the first enquiry: How many acres? Or how much ready coin? Not that this is altogether an unnecessary question, for marriage without a competency, that is, not only a bare subsistence, but even a handsome and plentiful provision, according to the quality<sup>2</sup> and circumstances of the parties, is no very comfortable condition. They who marry for love, as they call it, find time enough to repent their rash folly, and are not long in being convinced, that whatever fine speeches might be made in the heat of passion, there could be no real kindness between those who can agree to make each other miserable. But as an estate is to be considered, so it should not be the main, much less the only consideration; for happiness does not depend on wealth.

But suppose a man does not marry for money, though for one that does not, perhaps there are thousands that do; suppose he marries for love, an heroic action, which makes a mighty noise in the world, partly because of its rarity, and partly in regard of its extravagancy, and what does his marrying for love amount to? There's no great odds between his marrying for the love of money, or for the love of beauty; the man does not act according to reason in either case, but is governed by irregular appetites. But he loves her wit perhaps, and this, you'll say, is more spiritual, more refined: not at all, if you examine it to the bottom. For what is that which nowadays passes under the name of wit? A bitter and ill-natured raillery, a pert repartee, or a confident talking at all; and in such a multitude of words, it's odds if something or other does not pass that is surprising, though every thing that surprises does not please; some things are wondered at for their ugliness, as well as others for their beauty. True wit, durst one venture to describe it, is quite another thing; it consists in such a sprightliness of imagination, such a reach and turn of thought, so properly expressed, as strikes and pleases a judicious taste.<sup>3</sup>

Thus, whether it be wit or beauty that a man's in love with, there's no great hopes of a lasting happiness; beauty, with all the helps of art, is of no very lasting date; the more it is helped, the sooner it decays; and he, who only or chiefly chose for beauty, will in a little time find the same reason for another choice. Nor is that sort of wit which he prefers, of a more sure tenure; or allowing it to last, it will not always please. For that which has not a real excellency and value in itself entertains no longer than that giddy humor which recommended it to us holds; and when we can like on no just, or on very little ground, 'tis certain a dislike will arise, as lightly and as unaccountably. And it is not improbable that such a husband may in a little time, by ill usage, provoke such a wife to exercise her wit, that is, her spleen<sup>4</sup> on him, and then it is not hard to guess how very agreeable it will be to him.

* * *

But do the women never choose amiss? Are the men only in fault? That is not pretended; for he who will be just must be forced to acknowledge that neither sex is always in the right. A woman, indeed, can't properly be said to choose; all that is allowed her, is to refuse or accept what is offered. And when we have made such reasonable allowances as are due to the sex, perhaps they may not appear so much in fault as one would at first imagine, and a generous spirit will find more occasion to pity than to reprove. But sure I transgress—it must not be supposed that the ladies can do amiss! He is but an ill-bred fellow who pretends that they need amendment! They are, no doubt on't, always in the right, and most of all when they take pity on distressed lovers; whatever they say carries an authority that no reason can resist, and all that they do must needs be exemplary! This is the modish language, nor is there a man of honor amongst the whole tribe that would not venture his life, nay and his salvation too, in their defense, if any but himself attempts to injure them. But I must ask pardon if I can't come up to these heights, nor flatter them with the having no faults, which is only a malicious way of continuing and increasing their mistakes.

* * *

But, alas! what poor woman is ever taught that she should have a higher design than to get her a husband? Heaven will fall in of course; and if she make but an obedient and dutiful wife, she cannot miss of it. A husband indeed is thought by both sexes so very valuable, that scarce a man who can keep himself clean and make a bow, but thinks he is good enough to pretend<sup>5</sup> to any woman; no matter for the difference of birth or fortune, a husband is such a wonder-working name as to make an equality, or something more, whenever it is pronounced.

* * *

To wind up this matter: if a woman were duly principled and taught to know the world, especially the true sentiments that men have of her, and the traps they lay for her under so many gilded compliments, and such a seemingly great respect, that disgrace would be prevented which is brought upon too many families; women would marry more discreetly, and demean<sup>6</sup> themselves better in a married state than some people say they do.

* * *

But some sage persons may perhaps object, that were women allowed to improve themselves, and not, amongst other discouragements, driven back by the wise jests and scoffs that are put upon a woman of sense or learning, a philosophical lady, as she is called by way of ridicule, they would be too wise, and too good for the men. I grant it, for vicious and foolish men. Nor is it to be wondered that he is afraid he should not be able to govern them were their understandings improved, who is resolved not to take too much pains with his own. But these, 'tis to be hoped, are no very considerable number, the foolish at least; and therefore this is so far from being an argument against their improvement, that it is a strong one for it, if we do but suppose the men to be as capable of improvement as the women; but much more if, according to tradition, we believe they have greater capacities. This, if anything, would stir them up to be what they ought, not permit them to waste their time and abuse their faculties in the service of their irregular appetites and unreasonable desires, and so let poor contemptible women, who have been their slaves, excel them in all that is truly excellent. This would make them blush at employing an immortal mind no better than in making provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof, since women, by a wiser conduct, have brought themselves to such a reach of thought, to such exactness of judgment, such clearness and strength of reasoning, such purity and elevation of mind, such command of their passions, such regularity of will and affection, and, in a word, to such a pitch of perfection as the human soul is capable of attaining even in this life by the grace of God; such true wisdom, such real greatness, as though it does not qualify them to make a noise in this world, to found or overturn empires, yet it qualifies them for what is infinitely better, a Kingdom that cannot be moved, an incorruptible crown of glory.

* * *

Again, it may be said, if a wife's case be as it is here represented, it is not good for a woman to marry, and so there's an end of human race. But this is no fair consequence, for all that can justly be inferred from hence is that a woman has no mighty obligations to the man who makes love to her; she has no reason to be fond of being a wife, or to reckon it a piece of preferment when she is taken to be a man's upper-servant;<sup>7</sup> it is no advantage to her in this world; if rightly managed it may prove one as to the next. For she who marries purely to do good, to educate souls for heaven, who can be so truly mortified as to lay aside her own will and desires, to pay such an entire submission for life, to one whom she cannot be sure will always deserve it, does certainly perform a more heroic action than all the famous masculine heroes can boast of; she suffers a continual martyrdom to bring glory to God, and benefit to mankind; which consideration indeed may carry her through all difficulties, I know not what else can, and engage her to love him who proves perhaps so much worse than a brute, as to make this condition yet more grievous than it needed to be. She has need of a strong reason, of a truly Christian and well-tempered spirit, of all the assistance the best education can give her, and ought to have some good assurance of her own firmness and virtue, who ventures on such a trial; and for this reason 'tis less to be wondered at that women marry off in haste, for perhaps if they took time to consider and reflect upon it, they seldom would.

From A Preface, in Answer to Some Objections to Reflections upon Marriage

[T]his design, which is unfortunately accused of being so destructive to the government, of the men I mean, is entirely her own.<sup>1</sup> She neither advised with friends, nor turned over <sup>2</sup> ancient or modern authors, nor prudently submitted to the correction of such as are, or such as think they are good judges, but with an English spirit and genius set out upon the forlorn hope, meaning no hurt to anybody, nor designing any thing but the public good, and to retrieve, if possible, the native liberty, the rights and privileges of the subject.

Far be it from her to stir up sedition of any sort, none can abhor it more; and she heartily wishes that our masters<sup>3</sup> would pay their civil and ecclesiastical governors the same submission which they themselves exact from their domestic subjects. Nor can she imagine how she any way undermines the masculine empire or blows the trumpet of rebellion to the moiety<sup>4</sup> of mankind. Is it by exhorting women not to expect to have their own will in any thing, but to be entirely submissive when once they have made choice of a lord and master, though he happen not to be so wise, so kind, or even so just a governor as was expected?<sup>5</sup> She did not indeed advise them to think his folly wisdom, nor his brutality that love and worship he promised in his matrimonial oath, for this required a flight of wit and sense much above her poor ability, and proper only to masculine understandings. However she did not in any manner prompt them to resist or to abdicate the perjured spouse, though the laws of God and the land make special provision for it in a case wherein, as is to be feared, few men can truly plead not guilty.<sup>6</sup>

* * *

If mankind had never sinned, reason would always have been obeyed, there would have been no struggle for dominion, and brutal power would not have prevailed. But in the lapsed state of mankind, and now that men will not be guided by their reason but by their appetites, and do not what they ought but what they can, the reason, or that which stands for it, the will and pleasure of the governor, is to be the reason of those who will not be guided by their own, and must take place for order's sake, although it should not be conformable to right reason. Nor can there be any society great or little, from empires down to private families, without a last resort to determine the affairs of the society by an irresistible sentence.<sup>7</sup> Now unless this supremacy be fixed somewhere, there will be a perpetual contention about it, such is the love of dominion; and let the reason of things be what it may, those who have least force or cunning to supply it<sup>8</sup> will have the disadvantage. So that since women are acknowledged to have least bodily strength, their being commanded to obey is in pure kindness to them, and for their quiet and security, as well as for the exercise of their virtue.<sup>9</sup> But does it follow that domestic governors have more sense than their subjects, any more than that other governors have? We do not find any man thinks the worse of his own understanding because another has superior power; or concludes himself less capable of a post of honor and authority because he is not preferred<sup>1</sup> to it. How much time would lie on men's hands, how empty would the places of concourse be, and how silent most companies, did men forbear to censure their governors; that is, in effect, to think themselves wiser. Indeed, government would be much more desirable than it is did it invest the possessor with a superior understanding as well as power. And if mere power gives a right to rule, there can be no such thing as usurpation; but a highway-man, so long as he has strength to force, has also a right to require our obedience.

Again, if absolute sovereignty be not necessary in a state, how comes it to be so in a family? or if in a family why not in a state; since no reason can be alleged for the one that will not hold more strongly for the other? If the authority of the husband, so far as it extends, is sacred and inalienable, why not of the prince? The domestic sovereign is without dispute elected,<sup>2</sup> and the stipulations and contracts are mutual. Is it not then partial<sup>3</sup> in men to the last degree to contend for and practice that arbitrary dominion in their families which they abhor and exclaim against in the state? For if arbitrary power is evil in itself, and an improper method of governing rational and free agents, it ought not to be practiced anywhere. Nor is it less but rather more mischievous in families than in kingdoms, by how much 100,000 tyrants are worse than one. What though a husband can't deprive a wife of life without being responsible to the law, he may however do what is much more grievous to a generous mind, render life miserable, for which she has no redress, scarce pity, which is afforded to every other complainant; it being thought a wife's duty to suffer everything without complaint. If all men are born free, how is it that all women are born slaves? as they must be if the being subjected to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of men be the perfect condition of slavery? and if the essence of freedom consists, as our masters say it does, in having a standing rule to live by?<sup>4</sup> And why is slavery so much condemned and strove against in one case and so highly applauded and held so necessary and so sacred in another?

* * *

Again, men are possessed of all places of power, trust, and profit; they make laws and exercise the magistracy. Not only the sharpest sword, but even all the swords and blunderbusses are theirs, which by the strongest logic in the world gives them the best title to everything they please to claim as their prerogative. Who shall contend with them? Immemorial prescription<sup>5</sup> is on their side in these parts of the world, ancient tradition and modern usage! Our fathers have all along both taught and practiced superiority over the weaker sex, and consequently women are by nature inferior to men, as was to be demonstrated. An argument which must be acknowledged unanswerable; for as well as I love my sex, I will not pretend a reply to such demonstration!

Only let me beg to be informed, to whom we poor fatherless maids and widows who have lost their masters owe subjection? It can't be to all men in general, unless all men were agreed to give the same commands. Do we then fall as strays to the first who finds us? By the maxims of some men and the conduct of some women, one would think so. But whoever he be that thus happens to become our master, if he allows us to be reasonable creatures and does not merely compliment us with that title, since no man denies our readiness to use our tongues, it would tend I should think to our master's advantage, and therefore he may please to be advised, to teach us to improve our reason. But if reason is only allowed us by way of raillery, and the secret maxim is that we have none, or little more than brutes, 'tis the best way to confine us with chain and block to the chimney-corner, which probably might save the estates of some families and the honor of others.

I do not propose this to prevent a rebellion, for women are not so well united as to form an insurrection. They are for the most part wise enough to love their chains and to discern how very becomingly they set. They think as humbly of themselves as their masters can wish with respect to the other sex, but in regard to their own they have a spice of masculine ambition: every one would lead, and none would follow—both sexes being too apt to envy and too backward in emulating, and take more delight in detracting from their neighbor's virtue than in improving their own. And therefore as to those women who find themselves born for slavery and are so sensible of their own meanness as to conclude it impossible to attain to anything excellent, since they are or ought to be best acquainted with their own strength and genius, she's a fool who would attempt their deliverance or improvement. No, let them enjoy the great honor and felicity of their tame, submissive, and depending temper! Let the men applaud and let them glory in this wonderful humility! Let them receive the flatteries and grimaces of the other sex, live unenvied by their own, and be as much beloved as one such woman can afford to love another! Let them enjoy the glory of treading in the footsteps of their predecessors, and of having the prudence to avoid that audacious attempt of soaring beyond their sphere! Let them housewife<sup>6</sup> or play, dress, and be pretty entertaining company! Or, which is better, relieve the poor to ease their own compassions, read pious books, say their prayers and go to church, because they have been taught and used to do so, without being able to give a better reason for their faith and practice! Let them not by any means aspire at being women of understanding, because no man can endure a woman of superior sense or would treat a reasonable woman civilly, but that he thinks he stands on higher ground and that she is so wise as to make exceptions in his favor and to take her measures by his directions. They may pretend to sense indeed since mere pretences only render one the more ridiculous! Let them in short be what is called very women, for this is most acceptable to all sorts of men; or let them aim at the title of good devout women, since some men can bear with this; but let them not judge of the sex by their own scantling.<sup>7</sup> For the great Author of nature and fountain of all perfection never designed that the mean and imperfect, but that the most complete and excellent, of his creatures in every kind should be the standard to the rest.

WILLIAM CONGREVE

1670–1729

Both of William Congreve's parents came from well-to-do and prominent county families. His father, a younger son, obtained a commission as lieutenant in the army and moved to Ireland in 1674. There the future playwright was educated at Kilkenny School and Trinity College, Dublin; at both places he was a younger contemporary of Swift. In 1691 he took rooms in the Middle Temple in London and began to study law, but soon found he preferred the wit of the coffeehouses and the theater. Within a year he had so distinguished himself at Will's Coffeehouse that he had become intimate with the great Dryden himself, and his brief career as a dramatist began shortly thereafter.

The success of The Old Bachelor (produced in 1693) immediately established him as the most promising young dramatist in London. It had the then phenomenally long run of fourteen days, and Dryden declared it the best first play he had ever read. The Double Dealer (produced in 1693) was a near failure, though it evoked one of Dryden's most graceful and gracious poems, in which he praised Congreve as the superior of Jonson and Fletcher and the equal of Shakespeare. Love for Love (produced in 1695) was an unqualified success and remains Congreve's most frequently revived play. In 1697 he brought out a well-received tragedy, The Mourning Bride. Congreve's most elegant comedy of manners, The Way of the World, received a brilliant production in 1700, but it did not have a long run.

During the rest of his life he wrote no more plays. Instead he held a minor government post, which, although a Whig, he was allowed to keep during the Tory ministry of Oxford and Bolingbroke; after the accession of George I he was given a more lucrative government sinecure. Despite the political animosities of the first two decades of the century, he managed to remain on friendly terms with Swift and Pope, and Pope dedicated to him his translation of the Iliad. Congreve's final years were perplexed by poor health but were made bearable by the love of Henrietta, second Duchess of Marlborough, whose last child, a daughter, was in all probability the playwright's.

The Way of the World is one of the wittiest plays ever written, a play to read slowly and savor. Like an expert jeweler, Congreve polished the Restoration comedy of manners to its ultimate sparkle and gloss. The dialogue is epigrammatic and brilliant, the plot is an intricate puzzle, and the characters shine with surprisingly complex facets. Yet the play is not all dazzling surface; it also has depths. Most Restoration comedies begin with the struggle for power, sex, and money and end with a marriage. In an age that viewed property, not romance, as the basis of marriage, the hero shows his prowess by catching an heiress. The Way of the World reflects that standard plot; it is a battle more over a legacy than over a woman, a battle in which sexual attraction is used as a weapon. Yet Congreve, writing after such conventions had been thoroughly explored, reveals the weakness of those who treat love as a war or a game: "each deceiver to his cost may find / That marriage frauds too oft are paid in kind." If "the way of the world" is cynical self-interest, it is also the worldly prudence that sees through the ruses of power and turns them to better ends. In this world generosity and affection win the day and true love conquers—with the help of some clever plotting.

At the center of the action are four fully realized characters—Mirabell and Millamant, the hero and heroine, and Fainall and Mrs. Marwood, the two villains—whose stratagems and relations move the play. Around them are characters who serve in one way or another as foils: Witwoud, the would-be wit, with whom we contrast the true wit of Mirabell and Millamant; Petulant, a “humor” character, who affects bluff candor and cynical realism, but succeeds only in being offensive; and Sir Wilfull Witwoud, the booby squire from the country, who serves with Petulant to throw into relief the high good breeding and fineness of nature of the protagonists. Finally there is one of Congreve’s most striking creations, Lady Wishfort (“wish for it”), who though aging still longs for love, gallantry, and courtship and who is led by her appetites into the trap that Mirabell lays for her.

Because of the complexity of the plot, a summary of the situation at the play’s opening may prove helpful. Mirabell (a reformed rake) is sincerely in love with and wishes to marry Millamant, who, though a coquette and a highly sophisticated wit, is a virtuous woman. Mirabell some time before has married off his former mistress, the daughter of Lady Wishfort, to his friend Fainall. Fainall has grown tired of his wife and has been squandering her money on his mistress, Mrs. Marwood. In order to gain access to Millamant, Mirabell has pretended to pay court to the elderly and amorous Lady Wishfort, who is the guardian of Millamant and as such controls half her fortune. But his game has been spoiled by Mrs. Marwood, who nourishes a secret love for Mirabell and, to separate him from Millamant, has made Lady Wishfort aware of Mirabell’s duplicity. Lady Wishfort now loathes Mirabell for making a fool of her—an awkward situation, because if Millamant should marry without her guardian’s consent she would lose half her fortune, and Mirabell cannot afford to marry any but a rich wife. It is at this point that the action begins. Mirabell perfects a plot to get such power over Lady Wishfort as to force her to agree to the marriage, while Millamant continues to doubt whether she wishes to marry at all.

- Note 1:

As was conventional in the period's plays, the names of the principal characters reveal their dominant traits: for example, Fainall would fain have all, with perhaps also the suggestion that he is the complete hypocrite, who feigns. Witwoud is the would-be wit. Wishfort suggests wish for it. Millamant is the lady with a thousand lovers (French mille amants). Marwood would willingly mar (injure) the lovers. Mincing has an air of affected gentility (that is, she minces), which clashes with her vulgar English. "Mrs." is "Mistress," a title then used by young unmarried ladies as well as by the married Mrs. Fainall.

Prologue

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON<sup>2</sup>

Of those few fools, who with ill stars are cursed,
Sure scribbling fools, called poets, fare the worst:
For they're a sort of fools which Fortune makes,
And after she has made 'em fools, forsakes.
With nature's oafs 'tis quite a different case,
For Fortune favors all her idiot race.
In her own nest the cuckoo eggs we find,
O'er which she broods to hatch the changeling kind.<sup>3</sup>
No portion for her own she has to spare,
So much she dotes on her adopted care.

Poets are bubbles,<sup>o</sup> by the town drawn in,
Suffered at first some trifling stakes to win:
But what unequal hazards do they run!
Each time they write they venture all they've won:
The squire that's buttered still,<sup>o</sup> is sure to be undone.
This author, heretofore, has found your favor,
But pleads no merit from his past behavior;
To build on that might prove a vain presumption,
Should grants to poets made, admit resumption:<sup>4</sup>
And in Parnassus<sup>5</sup> he must lose his seat,
If that be found a forfeited estate.<sup>6</sup>

He owns,<sup>o</sup> with toil he wrought the following scenes,
But if they're naught ne'er spare him for his pains:
Damn him the more; have no commiseration
For dullness on mature deliberation.
He swears he'll not resent one hissed-off scene
Nor, like those peevish wits, his play maintain,<sup>o</sup>
Who, to assert their sense, your taste arraign.
Some plot we think he has, and some new thought;
Some humor too, no farce; but that's a fault.

Satire, he thinks, you ought not to expect,
 For so reformed a town,<sup>7</sup> who dares correct?
 To please, this time, has been his sole pretense,
 He'll not instruct, lest it should give offense.
 Should he by chance a knave or fool expose,
 That hurts none here; sure here are none of those.
 In short, our play shall (with your leave to show it)
 Give you one instance of a passive poet
 Who to your judgments yields all resignation;
 So save or damn after your own discretion.

Act 1—A chocolate house

MIRABELL and FAINALL rising from cards, BETTY waiting.

MIRABELL You are a fortunate man, Mr. Fainall.

FAINALL Have we done?

MIRABELL What you please. I'll play on to entertain you.

FAINALL No, I'll give you your revenge another time, when you are not so indifferent; you are thinking of something else now, and play too negligently. The coldness of a losing gamester lessens the pleasure of the winner. I'd no more play with a man that slighted his ill fortune than I'd make love to a woman who undervalued the loss of her reputation.

MIRABELL You have a taste extremely delicate, and are for refining on your pleasures.

FAINALL Prithee, why so reserved? Something has put you out of humor.

MIRABELL Not at all. I happen to be grave today, and you are gay; that's all.

FAINALL Confess, Millamant and you quarreled last night after I left you; my fair cousin has some humors that would tempt the patience of a stoic. What, some coxcomb came in, and was well received by her, while you were by?

MIRABELL Witwoud and Petulant; and what was worse, her aunt, your wife's mother, my evil genius; or to sum up all in her own name, my old Lady Wishfort came in.

FAINALL O, there it is then—she has a lasting passion for you, and with reason. What, then my wife was there?

MIRABELL Yes, and Mrs. Marwood and three or four more, whom I never saw before. Seeing me, they all put on their grave faces, whispered one another; then complained aloud of the vapors,<sup>8</sup> and after fell into a profound silence.

FAINALL They had a mind to be rid of you.

MIRABELL For which good reason I resolved not to stir. At last the good old lady broke through her painful taciturnity, with an invective against long visits. I would not have understood her, but Millamant joining in the argument, I rose and with a constrained smile told her I thought nothing was so easy as to know when a visit began to be troublesome. She reddened and I withdrew, without expecting<sup>9</sup> her reply.

FAINALL You were to blame to resent what she spoke only in compliance with her aunt.

MIRABELL She is more mistress of herself than to be under the necessity of such a resignation.

FAINALL What? though half her fortune depends upon her marrying with my lady's approbation?

MIRABELL I was then in such a humor that I should have been better pleased if she had been less discreet.

FAINALL Now I remember, I wonder not they were weary of you: last night was one of their cabal<sup>1</sup> nights; they have 'em three times a week, and meet by turns, at one another's apartments, where they come together like the coroner's inquest, to sit upon the murdered reputations of the week. You and I are excluded; and it was once proposed that all the male sex should be excepted; but somebody moved that to avoid scandal there might be one man of the community; upon which Witwoud and Petulant were enrolled members.

MIRABELL And who may have been the foundress of this sect? My Lady Wishfort, I warrant, who publishes her detestation of mankind, and full of the vigor of fifty-five, declares for a friend and ratafia;<sup>2</sup> and let posterity shift for itself, she'll breed no more.

FAINALL The discovery of your sham addresses to her, to conceal your love to her niece, has provoked this separation. Had you dissembled better, things might have continued in the state of nature.<sup>3</sup>

MIRABELL I did as much as man could, with any reasonable conscience: I proceeded to the very last act of flattery with her, and was guilty of a song in her commendation. Nay, I got a friend to put her into a lampoon and compliment her with the imputation of an affair with a young fellow, which I carried so far that I told her the malicious town took notice that she was grown fat of a sudden; and when she lay in of a dropsy, persuaded her she was reported to be in labor. The devil's in't, if an old woman is to be flattered further, unless a man should endeavor downright personally to debauch her; and that my virtue forbade me. But for the discovery of this amour, I am indebted to your friend, or your wife's friend, Mrs. Marwood.

FAINALL What should provoke her to be your enemy, unless she has made you advances, which you have slighted? Women do not easily forgive omissions of that nature.

MIRABELL She was always civil to me, till of late. I confess I am not one of those coxcombs who are apt to interpret a woman's good manners to her prejudice, and think that she who does not refuse 'em everything, can refuse 'em nothing.

FAINALL You are a gallant man, Mirabell; and though you may have cruelty enough not to satisfy a lady's longing, you have too much generosity not to be tender of her honor. Yet you speak with an indifference which seems to be affected, and confesses you are conscious of a negligence.

MIRABELL You pursue the argument with a distrust that seems to be unaffected, and confesses you are conscious of a concern for which the lady is more indebted to you than is your wife.

FAINALL Fie, fie, friend, if you grow censorious I must leave you.— I'll look upon the gamesters in the next room.

MIRABELL Who are they?

FAINALL Petulant and Witwoud. [To BETTY.] Bring me some chocolate. [Exit FAINALL.]

MIRABELL Betty, what says your clock?

BETTY Turned of the last canonical hour,<sup>4</sup> sir. [Exit BETTY.]

MIRABELL How pertinently the jade answers me! Ha? almost one a clock! [Looking on his watch.]—O, y'are come—
[Enter a FOOTMAN.]

MIRABELL Well, is the grand affair over? You have been something tedious.<sup>5</sup>

FOOTMAN Sir, there's such coupling at Pancras<sup>6</sup> that they stand behind one another, as 'twere in a country dance. Ours was the last couple to lead up; and no hopes appearing of dispatch, besides, the parson growing hoarse, we were afraid his lungs would have failed before it came to our turn; so we drove around to Duke's Place, and there they were riveted in a trice.

MIRABELL     So, so, you are sure they are married?

FOOTMAN     Married and bedded, sir. I am witness.

MIRABELL     Have you the certificate?

FOOTMAN     Here it is, sir.

MIRABELL     Has the tailor brought Waitwell's clothes home, and the new liveries?

FOOTMAN     Yes, sir.

MIRABELL     That's well. Do you go home again, d'ye hear, and adjourn the consummation till farther order. Bid Waitwell shake his ears, and Dame Partlet rustle up her feathers, and meet me at one a clock by Rosamond's Pond, that I may see her before she returns to her lady: and as you tender your ears,<sup>7</sup> be secret. [Exit

FOOTMAN.]

[Re-enter FAINALL, BETTY.]

FAINALL     Joy of your success, Mirabell; you look pleased.

MIRABELL     Aye, I have been engaged in a matter of some sort of mirth, which is not yet ripe for discovery. I am glad this is not a cabal night. I wonder, Fainall, that you who are married, and of consequence should be discreet, will suffer your wife to be of such a party.

FAINALL     Faith, I am not jealous. Besides, most who are engaged are women and relations; and for the men, they are of a kind too contemptible to give scandal.

MIRABELL     I am of another opinion. The greater the coxcomb, always the more the scandal: for a woman who is not a fool can have but one reason for associating with a man who is one.

FAINALL     Are you jealous as often as you see Witwoud entertained by Millamant?

MIRABELL     Of her understanding I am, if not of her person.

FAINALL     You do her wrong; for to give her her due, she has wit.

MIRABELL She has beauty enough to make any man think so; and complaisance enough not to contradict him who shall tell her so.

FAINALL For a passionate lover, methinks you are a man somewhat too discerning in the failings of your mistress.
